tract foreign alliances. If the Transvaal and the Orange River desire real independence they will suffer no hardship from diplomatic isolation. No legitimate purpose would be served by a connexion with any European Power. Foreigners are not really injured by a political monopoly which is rendered innocuous by the English system of freedom of trade. Sir Bartle Frere in a recently published letter expresses a reasonable apprehension of the establishment of a South African settlement by the German Empire. The French are at present more reckless and more dangerous rivals. It may be possible to maintain friendly relations with the Transvaal; but the vassals of an ally or dependent of France would be a constant danger. The mode in which the Colonial Secretary and the Cabinet propose to deal with the Transvaal Convention is for the present properly kept secret. It is satisfactory to learn that in another part of South Africa the Government has not shrunk from resuming responsibility for the control of a territory occupied by natives. A Resident has been appointed for Basutoland, which is now definitely transferred from the Cape Colony to the Crown.

FRANCE AND ITS COLONIES.

IT is now long enough since the storm of Sontay to enable us to estimate the consequences of that feat of arms with some degree of accuracy. As far as they are visible, they can be summed up in a very few words. Admiral Courbet's victory has produced one more inspired article in the "leading journal," and that is all. The Admiral himself has gone back to Hanoi to look after the commissariat, and has taken the greater part of his army with him, leaving a garrison to occupy the captured town. It is apparently becoming the recognized practice in French colonial warfare for a victorious commander to retire after a success. No sooner had General Bouet gained a victory than he was sent off home on a mission, and now Admiral Courbet has been suddenly to convert himself into a commissary-general. Meanwhile, the French army is going to keep quiet until further reinforcements have arrived, and the rainy season has come round again. The Admiral may have good military reasons for not acting on the well-known principle that when you have an Asiatic on the run you should keep him on the run; but it certainly looks as if this is to be a war of fits and starts to the end of the chapter. While the French army is getting its breath again for a further advance on Bac Ninh, the diplomatists will have their turn. In this comparatively peaceful phase of the struggle the Marquess Tseng has made the first move in the shape of a scheme of compromise published in the Times. There is scarcely even an affectation of secrecy about the authorship of the article on "China, and the Capture of Sontay," which has appeared in that favoured journal. The views of this document have been considered with much solemnity, and it has been apparently accepted by the English press as an authoritative statement of the policy of the Chinese Empire. The honour is perhaps somewhat prematurely given. Before the Marquess Tseng can expect that the French will consider the terms of the compromise which he suggests, he must first convince them that he is authorized to propose it. Until that is done discussion is little better than waste of time. Now the Marquess Tseng has so acted of late, no doubt involuntarily, as to deprive his declarations of almost all importance. An ambassador who roundly asserts that certain consequences will follow a certain event, and who, when it occurs, is compelled to confess that he has been left without instructions, who then comes forward with a plan for a compromise, prefaced by an explicit confession that his country has no policy until an indefinite number of conflicting authorities have succeeded in making one among them, can scarcely expect to be taken seriously. If the Chinese Ambassador is still waiting to hear what the Tsungli Yamen and the Council of the Imperial Family are going to do now that Sontay has been captured, by what right did he assert that an attack on the town would be considered an act of war? This uncertainty as to the action of the Chinese Government makes it a matter of absolutely no importance whether the Ambassador's scheme for an arrangement was presented to M. Ferry months ago or only last week. The essential point is that there is no reason to suppose that he speaks for anybody but himself. Nothing [illegible] the insulting language of the French press towards him. He has fought his diplomatic fight gallantly and skilfully, but it is fatally obvious that he is poorly supported. M. Ferry will have a perfect right to insist on receiving some satisfactory assurance that the Chinese Government has a policy before he enters into any further negotiations with its Ambassador. However unwise the Tonquin adventure may be, it is not to be supposed that the French will retire before the unsupported threats of the Marquess Tseng. The whole business stands where it has stood for months. The French are still resolved to go on by slow steps, and when they have got a little further we shall see what we shall see.

There is more satisfaction to be got from learning that the Chamber can decide a colonial question on principles of justice and sound policy. It has rejected an iniquitous proposal to expropriate the owners of 400,000 hectares of land in Algeria, and evict the inhabitants in order to make room for French colonists. It was, indeed, proposed to compensate the victims; but they were to be left at the mercy of a French jury, and the whole amount to be set aside for the purpose was 2,000,000*l.*, one of which fund were to be found for assisting the European immigrants. That such a plan should have been rejected by the Chamber is, no doubt, to its honour; but when it is stated in all its naked absurdity, it is hard to realize the state of mind of the Ministry which brought it forward. If M. Jerry had designed to drive the Arabs into rebellion, he could hardly have taken more effectual means to secure success. No native inhabitant of Algeria could have been sure of remaining unmolested for a year if this policy had once been begun. The credit due to the Chamber for its greater wisdom is largely counterbalanced by its tardiness in recognizing the folly and iniquity of what it was being asked to do. The scheme, which is the work of M. Tirman, the Governor-General of Algeria, was made public months ago. It was denounced from the first by M. Leroy Beaulieu with all the vigour and good sense which have secured him the honour of a violent Ministerial opposition to his candidature at Lodève. If Frenchmen took an intelligent interest in colonial affairs, M. Tirman's egregious scheme would have been drummed out of court at its first appearance. But the great majority of Frenchmen neither know nor care anything about their colonies. They have a vague idea that these possessions help to support the dignity of the country, and form a happy hunting-ground for the unfortunates who cannot succeed at home; for the rest they leave everything to the Administration. In the present case the Government has gone too far and has suffered accordingly. It is no offence against charity to suppose that a fair proportion of the majority which voted against the Ministry's Bill were less interested to defend the Algerian Arabs than to save the Budget from the burden of another two millions; but it is something that they were not misled by the specious arguments of M. Ferry and M. Tirman, and Algeria has been saved from being made the subject of a most dangerous experiment. There is no sign that the defeat has affected M. Ferry's position, or will modify his general colonial policy in any way.

In Tunis the French Government is at last beginning to reap the benefits of a highly ingenious policy of obstruction. Ever since M. Cambon succeeded M. Roustan he has steadily acted in such a way as to make all decent government impossible in the Regency, with the object of forcing foreign nations to surrender the right of holding Consular Courts and controlling the Bey's finance. The French Government, in fact, has deliberately adopted in Tunis the policy of Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet in Egypt. It has hampered the native rulers, and refused to rule itself. There is, however, one considerable difference between the two cases. Her Majesty's Ministers have fostered anarchy from sheer vacillation, but the French have worked with a perfectly definite aim. They have from the first avowed their intention of retaining Tunis; and it is obvious that, if they are to govern the country, they must get rid of the capitulations by which European nations have provided for the defence of their subjects against the injustice and violence of Oriental methods of administration. At last they have succeeded. The English Government has surrendered its right of holding Consular Courts in Tunis, and it is known that other States will follow our example. It was so much a matter of course that this concession should be made that there is some reason to be surprised at the delay. From the moment that Europe agreed to recognise the sovereignty of France in Tunis, it must have been prepared to surrender the privileges extorted from the BEY as defences against a barbarian Government. No civilized Western State would submit to the holding of foreign Consular Courts in its dominions. France has adopted a singularly undignified method of gaining its diplomatic victory. England at least, we may believe, would have been ready to treat for a satisfactory arrangement, even though its Maltese subjects had not been injured in their interests by the deliberate obstruction of M. CAMBON. Dignity, however, has long ceased to be a feature of French politics. If the Ministry at Paris think it necessary to keep up the form of a sham native Government in the Regency, that also is among their sovereign rights. We have practically agreed to recognize their possession of Tunis, and it follows as an inevitable consequence that we must be prepared to see British subjects hold in the Regency exactly the same position as they do in other French dominions.

FIRES IN THEATRES.

IT is the business of at least three functionaries to see that theatres are made as nearly fireproof as possible. The first, in rank if not in order, is the Lord Chamberlain; the second is the Inspector nominated by the Insurance Company; and the third is the manager or proprietor of the theatre. Besides these three, there is such a person as Mr. ARTHUR W. C. SHEAN, who writes to the Times of Wednesday, and who adds to his name "Captain and Vice-"President Fire Brigade Association, and Consulting Fire "Brigade Engineer." No one can be better qualified. We have thus three people and Mr. SHEAN concerned in the inspection of theatres; and, if there is indeed safety in numbers, we are safe. But what does Mr. SHEAN say? He visited the other night a large London theatre which had been inspected but recently by the LORD CHAMBERLAIN or his deputy. This is the state of things he discovered and reveals:—The fire buckets were in their places, but empty, for the "cleaners must have "been using them"; the fireman in charge was ignorant as to the pressure on the hydrant, never having tried it; a line of hose to extinguish fire in the flies was projected as a future improvement; there were no hand pumps, and no fire-axe ready for cutting away burning scenery; finally, though three firemen are employed in the theatre, they have no system of concerted action and no signal by which to give alarm of fire without alarming the public. The LORD CHAMBERLAIN'S visit was unfortunately timed a few minutes after, instead of before, the arrival of a few lengths of hose, otherwise his decision might have been different. The manager is a cynic, apparently. When Mr. SHEAN asked him "Have you timed your exits?" he calmly replied, "No; but it does not matter to us if the "place is burnt, as the LORD CHAMBERLAIN has passed it." Were he a railway director he could not have shown more indifference to human life and suffering, but we cannot help wishing Mr. SHEAN had gone a little further and given us some better clue to his identity. The quality of cynicism is not sufficient. True, Mr. SHEAN might incur, under our law, a prosecution for libel, but other theatrical managers should subscribe to protect him by an indemnity fund. In the United States the whole truth would have come out. As it is, we have all London theatres more or less injured, in the opinion of the public, and no very obvious remedy possible. The officials of the Chamberlain's Office are already too hard-worked. They cannot go round to find out which is the theatre intended by Mr. SHEAN. "In the event of the burning of a "London theatre with serious loss of life, doubtless," as Mr. SHEAN remarks, "the greatest public indignation would "be manifested." Mr. SHEAN has done perhaps the best he could by writing to the Times and putting us on our guard, which, in the present case, however, only means ruining the pleasure of a large number of timid and nervous people, and keeping some of them at home just at the season when theatres put forth their greatest attractions. At the Vienna Electrical Exhibition the other day a wonderful invention was shown to which attention should be called in this country. It has been applied with success at Pesth and various other places. A watchman sits on the stage beside a row of buttons. When he presses one, down comes a vast iron shutter which divides the theatre into two fireproof compartments, and separates the auditorium from the stage. He presses another, and instantly additional means of exit are automatically opened. Lastly, a cascade descends, at the touch of a third button, from a tank on the roof, and pours over the flames. The only omission we note is that of a mechanical watchman. As at present arranged, a touch of the wrong button will add drowning to the other horrors of the situation. But some such contrivance is sadly needed. We are, it is true, forewarned by Mr. SHEAN and many other people, but we are not forearmed. It is the manifest but unpleasant duty of every one who has the power of doing something to arouse public attention not to let this question sleep, but to ventilate it on all possible occasions. What is true of our theatres is still more true of churches, only that churches are seldom crowded oftener than once a week. It is true of concert-halls and meeting-rooms of all kinds. When some awful catastrophe has occurred, some people will say, "I told you so," and perhaps others that "We "ought to reform the Municipality"—which seems at present the remedy for every urban ill. But every theatre in London may be burnt long before a new Municipality has been got into working order; and it is almost certain in the meanwhile that the present law is enough, if it is properly enforced. Clearly it is not properly enforced by the LORD CHAMBERLAIN.

CUT-THROAT EUCHRE AND POKER.

IN nothing do the national characteristics of a country show themselves more thoroughly than in its sports and games. When at play one must perforce be natural; in the practice of old amusements, or in the invention of new ones, the mind follows its natural bent, and the amusements in their turn react on the mind, and bring out or emphasize the leading traits of character. As with their songs and their proverbs, so would it be easy to predicate the distinguishing characteristics of a people from a study of their national games. Nowhere is this better seen than in America. It is hardly possible to understand, and certainly impossible to appreciate thoroughly, that class of American literature, of which the writings of "Mark Twain" and of Mr. Bret Harte may be taken as types, without some acquaintance with two essentially American games of cards—Euchre and Poker; so completely are Western modes of speech and thought permeated with illustrations drawn from the practice and terminology of these games.

Who, for instance, could understand the description of a luncheon in the Innocents Abroad, at which every one "passes," unless he were familiar with the game of euchre? Or who could, without such knowledge, properly appreciate the allusions in the poem of "The Heathen Chinee," in which one player has his sleeve

> Stuffed full of aces and bowers,
> And the same with intent to deceive?

Yet the "Chinee" contrives to score points over his two Californian adversaries until his game is exposed and the catastrophe, brought on by the unfortunate fact that

> At last he put down a right bower,
> Which the same Nye had dealt unto me.

Euchre, as will be seen below, like most other games of cards requires a good memory and a certain rapidity of judgment in order to secure success, combined, of course, with average luck in the matter of holding high cards. Poker, on the other hand, is a game that demands quite different qualities. You do not even need to hold good cards. Perfect coolness, impassibility of countenance, the finest nerve, keen discrimination, and an almost intuitive perception of the motives of play in others, together with constant variety in your own style of play, so that your adversaries may never be able to draw inferences from it as to your motives—these are the main characteristics of a good poker player. Quite some of the best American stories are about cards, or, at all events, contain allusions to them. The reason that they are the best is that they bring out the national traits and peculiarities. The essence of poker consists in "bluffing," which is the result or expression of that habit of self-assertion which, without intending to impute anything offensive to our kinsmen over the sea, one cannot help remarking as peculiarly American. It is a great mistake to suppose that this arises from a mere vulgar spirit of boastfulness. On the contrary, it was in its origin merely their form of entering their protest against British superciliousness and assumption of superiority, and it has no doubt contributed greatly to making the United States what they have become in the short space of a single century. To go back to our games. Euchre is probably German in its origin, as is proved by the name given to the highest card in the game—the knave of trumps—which is called the right Bower, evidently a corruption of the German Baur, or knave. It may be played by two, three, or four persons. It is in its nature and general rules of play akin to Ecarté; but has several peculiarities which give it a character of its own. It is played with a short pack of thirty-two cards. The principal point to remember is the value of the two Bowers; the highest card is, as has been already said, the right Bower, or knave of trumps, and the next highest the left Bower, or knave of the same colour, i.e. if hearts are trumps the knave of diamonds is the left Bower; and not only is it the second highest card, but it becomes a trump, and you must follow suit with it as such; for instance, if the knave of hearts, being right Bower, is led, and you have the knave of diamonds, but no hearts, you must play the knave of diamonds. It is a little difficult for a beginner to remember that the left Bower is not of the suit which it professes to be, but is a trump. The other cards follow in their usual order of value, the ace of trumps being consequently the third highest. If two persons are playing, the dealer deals five cards to each, and turns up the next one; but this does not necessarily become the trumps card. The first player looks at his hand, and if he thinks himself strong enough in that suit to make the odd trick, he says, "I order it up"; on which the dealer discards face downwards the weakest card in his hand, and the turn-up card becomes confirmed as trumps, and forms part of the dealer's hand. It remains, however, on the table face upwards, to be played by him when necessary. Should the first player not feel himself sufficiently strong in the suit turned up, he says, "I pass"; it then falls to the dealer to approve or not of the card; if he wishes to confirm it as trumps, he discards his weakest card without saying a word, and his adversary then leads; but if the dealer, too, is not strong enough in that suit, he signifies his intention of "passing" by turning the card face downwards; for the game is played with as few words as possible between the players. If the dealer passes, it becomes the turn of the first player to select any suit excepting that originally turned up as trumps, which he announces by saying, "I make so-and-so trumps"; if not strong enough in any, he says, "Pass again." The dealer then in his turn may "make" any suit; or, if he too is weak all round, he throws down his cards, saying, "Pass out," and his adversary then deals afresh. Whichever player "orders up" or "makes" any suit trumps, takes on himself the responsibility of making at least the third, or odd, trick; and should he fail to do so, he is "euchred," and the other player scores double. The game consists of five points; three or four tricks counting one, and all five of them two, as at écarté. When there are four players, the two opposite to each other are partners, and play of course into each other's hands; but if any one feels himself sufficiently strong to make the odd trick by himself, without aid from his partner, he may say, "I play it single"; his partner then lays his hand on the table face downwards, and the player plays alone against the other two, and in this case scores double if he wins, but only loses single if he fails to make the odd trick. A curious variety of the game is three-handed or "cut-throat" euchre. In this the hands are dealt to each of the three players as usual, and each of them scores for himself, on his own account, but whichever of them "orders up," "takes up," or "makes" any suit trumps, has to play that hand alone against the other two, who become for the nonce temporary partners. It will thus be seen that the three are constantly changing partnership or playing single in the course of a single game. The "cut-throat" part of the business does not come in till towards the end of the game. Suppose A. and B. are temporary partners and A. has scored 1 or 2, while B. has scored 3, and C. 3 or less; in this case C. having "made" something trumps is "euchred" if he fails to secure the odd trick; this would add 2 to each of the scores of the others, and A. would thus be 3 or 4 at most, whereas B. would be 5 and therefore win the game. If C., on the other hand, makes the odd trick, he will only add 1 to his score, and will not be out. It is therefore evident that it will better answer A.'s purpose to "cut his own throat" by playing badly on purpose so as to lose the trick for himself and his partner, rather than win it with that partner, and thus lose the game himself. "Cut-throat" euchre, however, at best, must be considered a poor and a badly constructed game; it cannot be right to have to play deliberately to lose; and there must occur conjunctures in which one player must in any case lose; for instance, suppose that A. stands at 2, B. at 4, and C. at 3, and that B. "orders up"; if he wins the trick, he is of course out, and wins the game; while, if the partners A. and C. "euchre" him, A. will only be 4, but C. will be 5; thus, whether A. plays his cards well or ill, he must lose, and he might be in a position to make terms with either of the others as to how he should play, which of course is undesirable. Cut-throat euchre might fairly be cited as another instance of the truth of the old adage that two is company, while three is none.

Poker is essentially a gambling game. In fact, it is impossible to play it for love, as the only check against utter recklessness—namely, the fear of losing your money—would be wanting. Nevertheless, it is not too much to say that the chief excitement of it consists, not so much in winning the stakes as in the pleasure of outwitting your adversary, especially when you have induced him to throw up his hand while you have all the time got a much worse one yourself. A recent American representative, accredited to the Court of St. James's, who was neither a historian nor a poet, favoured London society some ten years ago with a little treatise on the game, and an article in these columns has dealt with the same subject. The game has become, therefore, tolerably well known in England, and it is unnecessary to go at length into its somewhat complicated rules and terminology. Suffice it to say that it is an adaptation of and an improvement on the old-fashioned English game of "brag." Each hand consists of five cards, instead of three, as in its English prototype; so the variety of combinations, and consequent difficulty of forming an estimate of what the other players hold, is infinitely greater. Each player has the opportunity of changing any or all of his cards once; this process, of course, must be carefully watched, so as to gain some indication of what your adversaries are trying for. It is, at best, a very slight and uncertain one that can be thus gained, as an experienced player will discard differently at different times from precisely the same hand, and resort to all sorts of devices to throw his adversaries off the scent. The hands rank in a strictly defined order of value, which is easily mastered; and it is practically impossible that two of the same value should ever be out at the same time. The play simply consists in each player in turn increasing his stake so as to make it equal to the total stake of the last preceding player, and, if he sees fit, he may, whenever it comes to his turn to play, "raise" it by as much as he likes; any one who does not choose to "see the raise"—i.e. to cover it with a like amount—can at any time "run," i.e. throw down his cards and abandon all claim to share in the pool; whenever the stakes are equal all round, and the last player does not "raise," he can "call"; the best hand shown then takes the pool, but those who do not claim it are not obliged to show, and thereby expose their style of play. Frequently all but one go out; and all the money is taken, without his even showing his hand, by the player who has "gone better" than any one else. Euchre, as we have seen, is played in a grave, sententious manner, as few words being used as possible. "Poker talk," on the contrary, has passed into a proverb; you may say as much as you like "with intent to deceive," the great object being to throw your adversary off his guard. With a really good hand much judgment is required to draw on the others into betting high; if you "raise" too much yourself you may frighten them off prematurely; yet if you bet too cautiously, they may divine that you are trying to egg them on. At one time Poker was played by simply betting on the five cards originally dealt, without the hands being "helped" to any new ones. But this last method, which is called "draw-poker," or even for short alluded to as "a little game of draw," is now the one universally adopted. Since the introduction of the game into Europe, and especially since it has been so much played by English and American ladies at French watering-places, certain abominations, such as "jack pots," and other novel practices, have been introduced. These form no part of the pure and original game, and are regarded as heresies by all true lovers thereof. Poker is unquestionably the national game of America, notwithstanding the fact that base-ball has arrogated to itself that title. Expressions derived from it permeate the whole language, and are familiar among certain classes in the mouths of young and old—from the rough who, in the menacing presence of a hostile "five-shooter," put up his "Arkansas toothpick," with the remark, "A full hand's good by— !" to the child who in the course of a geography lesson met the "School-marm's" question, "What is a strait?" with the prompt reply "Beats two pairs."

UNHISTORICAL SOCIALISM.

SOCIALISM, we are frequently told, is in the air; and it is only the flippancy of the bourgeois which remembers that that phrase has two meanings. The great Mr. George is coming to tell us our misdeeds at St. James's Hall next week. There is a new Socialist magazine, with one good poet and some not so good prose writers on its staff; and Mr. Hyndman has written an Historical Basis of Socialism, which Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. have published. The title is promising, and invites reading; for, if Socialism has hitherto been a remarkably slippery thing, history, at any rate, offers something to the grasp. We know where to have history; and it is at least probable that we shall know where to have Mr. Hyndman when he becomes historical.

As a matter of fact, there are several results which may be supposed to follow from the reading of his book. A note of his on Bakunin—"Very pretty reading it is for comfortable fathers of snug, respectable, middle-class households"—may or may not define the effect which he himself intended to produce by his own work. It may irritate some people, dismay some people, furnish some with matter for a great deal of cynical amusement. From the last point of view it is certainly a great success. When the cynic finds Mr. Hyndman eulogizing the fifteenth century as a time of something like Paradise for the worker in England, when he finds that worker described as generally owning land and not obliged to fight unless he liked, and (as he foresees long before the quotation turns up) discovers this statement to be justified only by the well-known account of Latimer's father, who "had no land of his own" and who did the King service with man and horse whenever he was called on, the modern Diogenes is fully entitled to laugh. He may repeat his cachinnation if he likes when he finds Mr. Hyndman so accurate as to speak of Sir James Ramsden, as to allege that Lord Salisbury has an interest in one of the worst dens of St. Giles's, as to cite Sir James Matheson (who lavished a vast fortune like water on improving the condition of his tenants) among examples of "infamous exactions," and to mention complacently "the records of the Sutherland clearances," as if those records, as regards any hardship inflicted, were not proven lies. It is still pleasanter when Mr. Hyndman is discovered stigmatizing his friend Mr. George's theories as "fundamentally unsound"; and complaining as mildly as it is his nature to complain of anything, that he has read Bakunin and cannot quite make out what the desirable anarchy of that great economist so much as means. Nor is it unfruitful of delight to the wicked man who aims constantly at the discovery of Mr. Carlyle's blue dahlia—the greatest fool living—to meet with a brother man who dismisses Edmund Burke as having "sold himself to the nobles." When a soi-disant economist describes the feudal incidents which were commuted at the Restoration as having been "twenty-five per cent. of the value of the holdings," an historical student, with a turn for sneering, who remembers what these incidents were estimated at and what the rental of their subjects then was, may be pardoned a quiet chuckle. But this is not the line of review that we at this present incline to take. To quote Cœur-de-Lion's words apud Sir Walter:—"If we have vantage on our head [which as regards Mr. Hyndman we think we certainly have] we will have none on our hand." We shall for some minutes try to make ourselves as ignorant of the facts of history as Mr. Hyndman is point of detail. We shall treat him as a well-meaning person who has a proposal to make, or who says he has one, and consider without prejudice and without digression what that proposal is.

Unfortunately the most diligent reading of Mr. Hyndman is quite insufficient to discover what we should be only too glad to communicate to our readers. After wading through some five hundred pages of history, according to Mr. Hyndman, we can discover nothing except that whatever is, is wrong. How it is to be set right Mr. Hyndman appears to be utterly unable to tell us. It is not that he does not try. His book is by no means merely what it might be taken as being from its title—a review of the history of England from the Socialist point of view. It is this, no doubt; but it is much more. After Mr. Hyndman has, with innumerable blunders of detail, established the undeniable and (by reasonable economists of the school he calls bourgeois) undenied propositions—that after the abolition of villenage, and during the scarcity of labour caused by the Black Death and the Hundred Years' War and the dispute of the Roses, the English labourer and yeoman had palmy times; that the discovery of America, the dissolution of monasteries, and other economic events of the sixteenth century put an end to those times; that the first Poor-law was in effect an acknowledgment of the lien which the English pauper had on the confiscated property of the Church; that the growth of the middle class has relatively depressed the lower—we naturally look to him for some plan which, taking the present as it stands, may make it and keep it, according to his views, a better present and a still better future. We look in vain; though, in fact, half the book is devoted to a rambling discussion of this point. Mr. Hyndman has ransacked Blue-books and newspapers for details of the miseries of the lower classes—which, by the way, he treats as inaccurately and sophistically as he treats history. Thus, to glance in passing at an awkward subject, he constantly asserts that it is misery which produces prostitution—a theory hopelessly unsound from the scientific point of view. He plods laboriously through the German Rodbertusiaden to try and get up a theory opposite to the "bourgeois" theory. He gives us in a note the programme of the Democratic Federation for taxing income progressively, nationalizing land, nationalizing labour, nationalizing the money trade, and what not. But how a population which, by his own account, has been created and adjusted by capital and labour economies, is to be adjusted to a state of economies where there are to be practically no capitalists, he does not attempt to explain. Wiser in one sense, and unwiser in another, than the new Fourierists, who sketch elaborate plans of co-operative national subdivision, in which somehow or other everybody is to be forced to produce, and everybody is to be forced to consume, his quota, Mr. Hyndman breathes not one word of the means whereby the new state of things is to be kept in operation. That not merely "all landlords are devils," as the Irishman said the other day, but all capitalists are devils, Mr. Hyndman is quite sure. But what is to be put in the capitalists' and landlords' places he as evidently has no idea. We turn over his pages and examine his citations from the robust Rodbertus and the eminent Engels in vain to discover even a hint of how to solve the great problem of adjusting a people formed, bred, and nourished on the capitalist and industrial system to the hand-to-mouth or patriarchal system. One brief passage only tells us that, in Mr. Hyndman's opinion, the security of individual property is not necessary to induce men to invent, to discover, and so forth. Even in that passage there is no trace of Mr. Hyndman's knowledge, if it exists, of the certain and obvious fact that, though invention and discovery may go on without the spur of gain, the utilization of invention and discovery generally has never taken place without the aid of the industrial and capitalist system which he hates. But if this passage contains no evidence of such saving knowledge, it contains plenty of evidence of destructive ignorance and paralogism. "Wealth," says Mr. Hyndman, "may easily be made as plentiful as water. But its distribution must be for each according to his needs, as the rule will be for each according to his abilities." Here are three propositions, two of which, if not the third, are by experience absurd. But, granting that experience only can show their absurdity, what is to be said of the man who can simultaneously announce the two last? For as surely as any man rules according to his abilities, so surely will the distribution to each not be according to his needs. If the rule of life is that each is to have (apparently by the allotment of some supernatural power) according to his needs, abilities do not come into the problem: and, as soon as abilities come in, woe to the needs. Given a society consisting of a prizefighter and an infant in arms, even with wealth as plentiful as water, it would go hard with the needs of the infant if the abilities of the prizefighter took a fancy to the infant's bottle.

In short, Mr. Hyndman has signally failed. If he were as accurate a relater of the facts of the past as he is an inaccurate, if his arguments in the historical part of his book were as indisputable in premisses and as logical in conclusion as they are baseless in fact and illicit in process, his book would still be subject to one unsurmountable objection. Everybody has heard of Coleridge, who was an excellent talker if he was allowed to start from no premisses and come to no conclusion. Mr. Hyndman is not an excellent economist, not even if he be allowed to start from false premisses and to come to no conclusion. A kinsman (intellectually) of his who is languishing at Astrachan or thereabouts wrote a famous novel entitled What is to be Done? That is the Socialist question, no doubt. Mr. Hyndman has not even indicated what is to be done, despite all his Democratic Federation programmes. He has produced no evidence to show, he has not even endeavoured to grapple with the grand objection that the reforms of the Democratic Federation, supposing them to be quietly accepted to-morrow, could not stand for a month. He has shown not the least comprehension of the fact that the present state of society, good or bad, is the result of natural causes, and that to prevent its recurring you must expel nature. He is not even aware, to judge from his own words, that the very anomalies which he produces are in effect the most hopeless condemnation of his theories. He tells us somewhere triumphantly that, according to somebody's statistics, every fisherman nets three hundred pounds worth of fish per annum, and gets only thirty pounds. The fact is extremely dubious, though far from impossible. But it is much more damaging to Mr. Hyndman's position to admit it than to deny it. For who supply the means for equipping the large fishing fleets which at once secure this great mass of fish and by competition cut down the wages of the individual fisherman? The capitalists whom Mr. Hyndman would send to a moral if not a physical lanterne. Who built the railways that take the fish hundreds of miles from the point of landing—the steam carriers that enable it to be used instead of wasting? The capitalists. Who buy the fish? The capitalists, small and great, the non-producing inhabitants of Mr. Hyndman's "lounger-towns," the tradesmen, the clerks, the professional men, whom his ideal must surely annihilate. Under the scheme of the Democratic Federation it will be necessary to reconcile the population of the nineteenth century with the economics of the fifteenth. Even the Democratic Federation itself has not proposed anything like the Salt-law of the ancien régime, to the effect that any one of a certain income shall buy a certain weight of fish. Fifty Democratic Federations could not get such a law obeyed if they passed it. The same is the case with every industry. The capital fallacy (we beg Mr. Hyndman's pardon for the employment of the odious adjective) of all Socialists, no matter of what colour or kidney, is the notion that a population which is the result and the inevitable equation of a given social state can be adjusted to a state entirely different; that wealth-producing, commodity-desiring, and all the other conditions of the present economic atmosphere will remain undisturbed when that economic atmosphere is exchanged for one entirely different. Mr. Hyndman would like to keep with one hand Mr. Chamberlain the orchid-fancier, the weekly-tradesman's-bookpayer, the salary issuer, and do away with Mr. Chamberlain the screw manufacturer, the fundholder, the drawer of some thousands a year from the State, the owner of a costly house and acres of costly ground. He would like to have his Mr. Chamberlain, and eat him too—a result equally unjust to Mr. Chamberlain and impossible in itself. It is the same with all the opponents of bourgeois economy; they always wish to have their Mr. Chamberlain, and eat him too—to kill the capitalist goose, and yet retain the income of golden eggs. It is hard on Mr. Chamberlain and the goose; but it is, perhaps, harder on the reasonable minority of mankind that in all these centuries the fable of Menenius Agrippa should still be necessary to repeat and not understanded of those to whom it is repeated.

LAZZARONI AND GALANTUOMINI.

THE Lazzaroni who played so great a part in the painting and fiction of an earlier generation have disappeared from the harbour and the mole of Naples. The observant traveller is obliged to omit them from his note-book, the sentimental tourist inquires after them in vain. Even Mr. Cook's enterprise cannot discover and reinstate them, though many of his excursionists resent their absence as a personal injury, and look upon the improved police arrangements of the city as a gross fraud practised upon themselves. In a word, the Lazzaroni of our youth "have had their day and ceased to be." But of late years their name has been applied by many Italian authors to all Neapolitans of the lower class; and, though it can hardly be considered a courteous term, it is a convenient one, and, as it has become current, we may adopt it in this sense without adopting the hostility in which it had its origin.

The very aversion and contempt which to Italian ears the designation implies are characteristic, for nowhere is class feeling so strong and so bitter as in Naples. In other cities the various strata of society merge gradually into one another, here they are divided by a hard and fast line. The old nobility, the middle class, and the populace live side by side, and yet apart; the very sympathy which exists between the two extremes of the social scale is in great part due to their common dislike of the body that "unites by separating" them. In each of these great divisions there are, of course, distinctions of wealth and position, through which a man of ability and ambition may rise; but he is seldom able to surmount the barriers that divide them from each other, and he rarely desires to do so, for he holds the class immediately above him in profound contempt; he ridicules its pretensions, and abhors its religious and political ideals. It is not a question of wealth, but of caste. Among the Lazzaroni there are men who are in possession of considerable means, yet they still remain true to the dress, the habits, and the opinions of their forefathers; while the poorest Galantuomo, as he styles himself, endeavours to proclaim by his costume and manner that he is not as those among whom he lives. Hence the mutual repulsion is strongest at the very point where it might have been supposed that the two classes would have passed into each other. The distinction between them is obvious to every eye, and it is accentuated in all the relations of life from the smallest to the greatest. The Galantuomo is studious of his personal appearance. His hat, coat, and boots are always carefully brushed, and in as close an approach to the newest fashion as his means will allow. If he is poor, he will submit to a long course of asceticism to provide himself with a walking-stick, and abstain from sundry dinners to procure a pair of gloves. As the Lazzaroni say, "he spends more on hair than salad oil." He loves public places, and frequents the doors of cafés; but it is in a political meeting that he feels he shows himself to the greatest advantage, for there he can display, not only his elegance, but his manliness, by speaking, or at least voting, against the Pope, the Government, and all existing powers. There is a certain inherited sense of danger that lends zest to these safe and harmless exhibitions. He knows that no one in authority will think of calling in question the way in which he speaks and votes; but his father and uncle may very likely have been imprisoned for years because they advocated far less extreme opinions, and his advance beyond their point of view ought, he thinks, to entitle him to share their recognized position as heroes. It certainly is not his fault that there are now no dungeons or galleys to be dared; in despondent hours he sometimes thinks it rather hard that this gate to the temple of fame should have been closed against him, and to do him justice this shabby genteel dandy would probably have borne himself with as much self-conscious grace on a barricade or before a reactionary court as he now does at the door of a theatre.

At home he shows to less advantage. "He leaves his opinions with his shoe dust on the door-mat." Though a Radical, he insists on slavish obedience; though a rationalist, he desires that his wife and daughters should be sincere adherents of the Catholic Church. For their morals he has an especial care. When he goes out, not content with locking them in, he takes away their hats and shoes, so that even if another key were found, it would be impossible for them to make a decent appearance in the streets, and their vanity, he thinks, will prevent them from issuing bare-headed or barefooted. On Sundays and Saints' days, sometimes even daily, they are permitted to go to mass, but on such occasions they are always accompanied by some old woman, who enjoys the confidence of the husband and father. Here, however, he is generally content to set a limit to his authority. The ladies of the household may sit upon their balcony, and there listen to any compliments they can hear, or receive any little presents that may be thrown from the windows above or around. If the head of the family were to be told of such a thing, he would simply whistle, "I have my birds in my cage."

It is difficult to form a clear conception of the Galantuomo's sentiments with respect to religion. While in good health nothing delights him more than a[illegible]ttack on the Church, unless indeed it be a bitter jest about the clergy. As soon as he is seriously ill, however, he sends for the priest as well as the doctor, and it is curious to remark how confirmed invalids of this class will oscillate between blasphemy and devotion, as the symptoms improve or grow threatening. If such a man is restored to health, he of course declares that he only allowed the priest to be called out of consideration for his wife: and so great is the value that Neapolitans of the middle-class attach to external appearances, that it may fairly be questioned whether it is anxiety for his funeral or for his future state that induces the sick man to summon his spiritual adviser.

In all these respects the Lazzaroni differ widely from the middle class. They care little for dress, except in so far as it denotes their station, and prefer a ragged jacket to a gentleman's cast-off coat—not because they object to second-hand clothing, but because any costume but that common to their profession would excite the ridicule of their acquaintances. Their usual life is one of extreme frugality; but they delight in occasional banquets of four or five courses, and on the eve of a great festival they will even pawn their bedding to provide the means for such a feast. Their wives and daughters of course possess a feminine love of finery, but it is shown in a liking for bright colours rather than in an attempt to imitate the fashion of the day. For the South, these women are allowed a large amount of liberty, but their brothers and husbands are inexorable in punishing the smallest abuse of it. Nor will their lovers endure their maiden caprices with anything like the patience a young lady has a right to expect. A peasant or fisherman who has been jilted considers himself bound in honour either to stab his successful rival, or to inflict a gash on the face of his beloved in as public a manner as possible; and elderly women are said to show their scars with a certain pride, as so many indubitable testimonials to their former charms. Unless the girl is very clearly in the right, or has acted strictly in accordance with their orders, none of her male relations will think of avenging such a blow, though in other cases they are only too ready to answer with their knives any insult that may be offered her. For the Lazzaroni are the only class of Neapolitans who acknowledge a woman's right to have a decisive voice in determining her own marriage, and so they leave her to conduct her love affairs on her own responsibility. It might be thought that such a privilege would be valued; yet it is only among the younger women that any desire to rise in the social scale seems to exist. Perhaps it is a mere question of dress after all. They are compelled by custom to walk the streets bare-headed, whereas a Galantuomo would starve rather than allow one of his female relations to appear in public without a hat. To possess such a piece of finery is often a poor girl's highest aspiration. She cannot buy it for herself, for that would expose her to endless ridicule; but if she is in service of any kind and her mistress tells her to wear one, she will look upon the command as more than equivalent to a considerable increase of wages; for then she can say to her sisters and cousins as she puts on the new head-dress, "You see I am obliged to wear it," and at the same time feel that she is rising above them by doing so.

The life of the Lazzaroni, like that of most of us, falls far short of the Christian ideal, yet they are sincere believers in their Church, and are not ashamed of the faith they hold. Though they rarely take an active part in politics, their opinions are clerical; they remember the dethroned dynasty with an affection which others find it difficult to understand, and entertain a half-sentimental and now wholly despairing wish to see it restored. "She alone can do it," an old woman will often say with a sigh, pointing to the gaudy print of the Madonna which is sure to be hanging somewhere near the head of her bed. This feeling does not arise simply from that longing for "the good old times" which is common in every age and country; for in the hour of danger the Lazzaroni have often given convincing proof of their loyalty to their Kings. In Nelson's days, for instance, while the middle class strongly sympathized with the French, they thronged to Cardinal Ruffo's banner, and in 1848 they overthrew by a popular movement the Ministry which the middle class had forced upon the Court, and thus struck the first serious blow at the Italian Revolution. When Garibaldi entered the city, it is true, they joined the crowd that greeted him with enthusiastic cheers; but as soon as the hero had refused to sanction the miracle of the liquefaction by his presence, they withdrew, whispering to each other that he must be guilty of some strange and hidden crime which he knew would be made manifest if he ventured to attend so holy a service. Indeed the more pious among them still regard every increase of taxation as a new penance inflicted on them for their having made common cause with the Liberals, though it was only for so short a time. Thus both their religious and their political convictions are serious enough, though they are often displayed in a grotesque way. On one of their favourite festivals, for instance, they sacrifice birds to the Madonna by bringing them to church with them, and letting them fly as soon as the bells ring for the Gloria. They are fond of attending funeral masses: but on such occasions their prayers, though sincere, are not quite disinterested, as they expect the dead to prove their gratitude by revealing lotto numbers to them in a dream. In evil days they are inclined to trust to Santa Anna rather than to their own exertions, and in the best nights they tremble at the thought of sleeping without a light.

It is not, therefore, difficult to explain the dislike which the Neapolitans of the middle and the lower classes feel for each other. They disagree on the most important points on which men can differ. The contrast between them is obvious at a glance; and there is no action of their daily lives in which it does not appear. They repel each other instinctively, intellectually, and morally. For all practical purposes the men who belong to the middle class are the most important; the whole government and the most important business of the city are in their hands; but for the mere observer the Lazzaroni are more interesting, as they possess an unwritten code of manners and morals which in many respects resembles that of the middle ages more closely than any that is recognized in modern times.

OLD WRITERS AND MODERN READERS.

FIELDING, in his History of Tom Jones, after describing "the outside of Sophia," his charming heroine, continues:—"Nor was this beautiful frame disgraced by an inhabitant unworthy of it." Here, however, his description stops short. Her bodily charms he had painted, for he had no other way of bringing them before his reader's eyes. But with her character he dealt in quite another way. "As there are," he writes, "no perfections of the mind which do not discover themselves in that perfect intimacy to which we intend to introduce our reader with this charming young creature, so it is needless to mention them here: nay, it is a kind of tacit affront to our reader's understanding, and may also rob him of that pleasure which he will receive in forming his own judgment of her character."

If to introduce a character with a minute description is an affront to the reader's understanding, it is one that has of late years been very commonly offered. Perhaps our modern novelists assume that their readers have no understanding; in many cases we should not be prepared to say that in this assumption they are wrong. Be that as it may, neither authors nor readers seem to know anything of that pleasure which Fielding mentions. In fact, to the reading world in general it has, we fear, lost most of its relish. We see that, as regards some of the pleasures of the body, there is on the part of many persons willingness enough to add to their enjoyment by taking a share in the preparations that they need. At no time, perhaps, has there been a greater liking for roughing it, as it is called. A great number of people every year spend their holidays in camping out, and before they eat their dinner sometimes catch it, and very often cook it. Before they can sleep they must first pitch their tent and arrange their own couch. Before they can breakfast, they must light their own fire and boil their own kettle. But with all this activity of the body, there has come an indolence of the mind even in respect of enjoyments. The reader of the present day does not wish, in Lamb's pleasant words, "to cry halves to anything that he finds." He has not indeed any wish we still borrow the thought from Elia—to "find." All that he asks is that the author should "bring." He would have every writer like the "true Caledonian," who "brings his total wealth into company, and gravely unpacks it." He wants to have all trouble spared him, so that he may make his way through a book with as little effort as is made by an idle man who on a summer's day, without laying hand to oar, is carried in his boat down some stream, as quick-flowing as it is shallow. He knows nothing of that pleasure which Fielding describes which comes to us as we form our own judgment of the character of a hero or a heroine. He asks in all things for the direction of the court. He requires that the judge should sum up before the facts have been set forth, and even before the trial has fairly begun. He would have all the characters labelled like the Greek pictures of old—and carefully labelled too. Each story must begin with a full descriptive catalogue. He must be told what he must look for and what he will find, just as if he were going to spend a day at the Fisheries Exhibition.

No doubt there have been in most ages, if not perhaps in all, readers of this indolent disposition. One of them complained to Johnson that he found Richardson very tedious. "Why, sir," Johnson answered, "if you were to read Richardson for the story, your impatience would be so much fretted that you would hang yourself. But you must read him for the sentiment, and consider the story as only giving occasion to the sentiment." He used to say of Clarissa that "it was the first book in the world for the knowledge it displays of the human heart.' Now to enter into this sentiment, to master this knowledge, an effort, and a long effort, must be made. To the author's lesson the reader must bring an understanding. He must bring patience also. One of Richardson's novels is not to be swallowed down in an afternoon. The sentiment of a long story cannot be seized by one who reads and skips, nor without some trouble can the human heart be studied. There is one great advantage that is afforded by a novel that is written on Fielding's method. It supplies so many more interesting subjects of conversation. When each reader is left to form his own judgment of the hero or heroine there must always be a considerable variety of opinion. Eager discussions can be raised, and characters can be fought over with as much ardour as if they had lived either on the world's great stage or in the next parish. Thus there are many Sophias. There is Fielding's Sophia and there is Tom Jones's Sophia. "But I also have my Sophia," each reader may say; "and you, my dear sir, you also have yours. Yours is not the real Sophia; not, if I may so express myself, Sophia's Sophia; but as a study of character it is not uninteresting." Round a story told on such a plan as this rise much the same discussions as those which endlessly rise round Hamlet. Was the Prince of Denmark wholly mad? Was he partly mad, and partly feigning to be mad? Was he wholly sane? What a loss of interest would there have been had Shakspeare in his dramatis personæ entered Hamlet as a mad prince, or a sane prince, or a prince sometimes sane, sometimes mad, and sometimes feigning madness! Fielding, in his Journey from this World to the Next, pleasantly describes how he saw "Shakspeare standing between Betterton and Booth, and deciding a difference between those two great actors concerning the placing an accent in one of his lines." In reciting "Put out the light and then put out the light," where was the emphasis to be laid? Being appealed to, Shakspeare said:—"Faith, gentlemen, it is so long since I wrote the line, I have forgot my meaning." In much the same way we could well believe that if Fielding, not in the next world, but in this, had been asked for his own judgment of Sophia's or Jones's character, and if he had given it, and then had been pressed with some apparent contradiction in some particular incident, he might have replied:—"Faith, gentlemen, it is so long since I wrote down the incident that you mention that I have forgotten it. When I did write it, it seemed to me no doubt what the lady or the gentleman would in the circumstances have done. But I leave every one free to form his own judgment. You have all the facts before you, and you are each of you quite as capable as I am of arriving at a just estimate of the characters of my hero and heroine." When we thus take the trouble to form our own judgment, we have moreover this further pleasure, that we are convinced that we are right, and that those who differ from us are wrong. Our self-esteem is pleasantly flattered. But what chance have we of being pleased with our own sagacity when nothing is left by the writer on which it can be exercised? In every work of fancy and imagination a partnership must be established between the author and the reader. But if one does all and leaves nothing for the other to do, it will, we fear, too often prove on the reader's part a kind of sleeping partnership.

In works of a very different order from novels the reader of our time shows the same indolence. As regards these he is too restless to remain contentedly in entire ignorance, and too lazy to arrive at any real knowledge. Hence we have in shoals these handbooks of literature and abridgments of great authors. A man may pass very well through life and know nothing of Pepys, nothing of Boswell, nothing of Horace Walpole's Letters, and nothing of Madame D'Arblay's Diary. But if such works as these are to be known they must be read. They cannot be reduced to an essence. It may be an objection to whipped cream that it takes up so much space; but by any method of compression it would cease to be whipped cream. The common excuse is made that in so busy an age as this there is no time to read such long books. We do not know that this age is so much busier than those that have gone before it. The complaint is a very old one, and even in the present day a good deal of time seems to be rather killed than lived. Be that as it may, if there is not time to read big books, big books cannot be read. But then let us not be tricked into the belief that we can still either enjoy them or know them. A little knowledge, if not a dangerous thing, is in such cases a foolish thing. At all events it often leads its possessor into folly. It tempts him to make a display of knowledge of which he has not the reality. But if there is not time for original works that are big there is at least time for those that are small. If a man is frightened by the size of Boswell, there can be nothing to scare him in the Autobiography of Gibbon. If he dare not try the nine big volumes of Walpole's Letters, he may with good heart attempt the two small ones which contain Swift's Letters to Stella. If in Tom Jones and Sir Charles Grandison the beginning seems separated by too great a space from the end, a summer day or a winter's evening will be long enough for accompanying either Joseph Andrews or Evelina from their birth to their marriage.

Among all the evils that follow in the train of a regular system of examinations, we know of none greater than a certain habit of indolence which it forms in the mind. It encourages a student—nay, even, in the press of competition it almost forces him to accept his judgments ready-made. He wants to know what others say of a writer, not what the writer himself says. He has no time to take a book home, as it were, and make it part of himself. He never "travels over the mind" of a great author till he becomes as familiar with its beauties and its nooks, its heights, its levels, and its depths as a Cumberland shepherd with the mountains and valleys round about his home. He never looks upon his books as his friends. It is to his head, and not to his heart, that he wishes to take them; and he only cares to keep them there till they have served their purpose at the next examination. How different was the way in which Macaulay and his sister read! "When they were discoursing together," says Mr. Trevelyan, "about a work of history or biography, a bystander would have supposed that they had lived in the times of which the author treated, and had a personal acquaintance with every human being who was mentioned in his pages. Pepys, Addison, Horace Walpole, Dr. Johnson, Madame de Genlis, the Duc de St. Simon [Macaulay, by the way, would have written the Duke of St. Simon], and the several societies in which those worthies moved, excited in their minds precisely the same sort of concern, and gave matter for discussions of exactly the same type, as most people bestow upon the proceedings of their own contemporaries. The past was to them as the present and the fictitious as the actual." Now, though Macaulay's power is given to few indeed, yet many—perhaps most people—have quite enough understanding and imagination from nature to enable them to live from time to time moments, it may be brief moments, both in the past and in the world of fiction and of fancy. A child in his games, as he fills "his humorous stage" with the different persons, shows how natural this is. It is not so much the growth of years that kills in him the habit as education and the scorn of his elder playfellows. The loss is indeed a great one, and the massacre of these simple feelings is a second massacre of the innocents. There is but one way to retain them. We must choose our books wisely, and when we have chosen them we must make a wise use of them. We cannot hope to live in all the ages that are past. The most that any but the most favoured among us can attain is to have one century, or one half-century, in which he has, as it were, his second home, whither he can withdraw himself for a brief space from the troubles and cares of the days in which he lives. But a place of retreat like this is not raised by an idle wish. Effort must be made, and a prolonged effort too. Yet it is a labour that, even while it is being made, is fully repaid. When guides to literature and manuals are all thrown on one side, and we begin "a pleasant loitering journey" through some tract of literature, "thought following thought, and step by step led on," the sense of joyous freedom and of eager curiosity more than supports us. One book leads us to another, and the circle of our friends widens as widens the circle of our knowledge. Then, too, we have that pleasure of which Fielding wrote. Both in the world of men and in the world of fiction we form our own judgments. We almost feel as if we had some share—however small a one—with a favourite author in a favourite book. For, when we find in how different a light some character appears to other readers, we half suspect that he is partly of our own creation. If the author's claim to the whole were put in, we might each be tempted to say, with a slight change in the poet's line:—"That but half of it was his, and one half of it was mine."

Happily, in such a course of reading as this, we need not be greatly deterred by the cost. Works of great excellence can often be picked up at the bookstalls for less money than is asked for some hash of them that has been just served up. A shilling a volume goes a good way in stocking our shelves, if we think nothing of fashion or the run of modern thought, and only ask that in good type and a fair binding we shall have a work of sterling worth. The young reader is naturally dazzled by the brilliant prospect that rises before him as he surveys the various series of literature that are in course of publication. With great epochs and great minds he hopes to become acquainted at the cost for each of two shillings of his money and a few hours of his time. Let him remember that a few warm friends are better than a host of nodding acquaintances, and let him reflect that, whether among the living or the dead, among men or among books, a friend is only made at the cost of much trouble and of much time.

THE WORLD'S FAIR.

THE association of pleasure with noise is doubtless common to all races in all times. That the ordinary Englishman should like his pleasure accompanied with as much noise as can be procured is, therefore, no matter for surprise. Perhaps, if he had more frequent opportunities for amusing himself, and if the Art of Recreation were intelligently studied and taught, he might "do" with less noise, and have that regulated and brought under some kind of discipline. If, for instance, he could sit in the open air of an evening and hear good music constantly, as may be done in softer climates, he might gradually learn to abhor bad and discordant music. If he heard good singing daily he might distinguish between bawling and singing. As it is, with only his Christmas and Easter weeks and his two days in the summer, he is at holiday-times like a sailor coming ashore after a long cruise, and whether he takes a day at Southend or at the "Robin Hood," or voyages to Margate by boat, he is not happy unless he can symbolize and make manifest his happiness by a great noise. He generally makes this, with his friends, for himself; and it has been generally supposed that his chief joy lies in the making of the noise. But this, we have quite recently discovered, is not the case. There is, though it has hitherto been unsuspected, a joy beyond that of opening the mouth and bawling; that, indeed, is only an instinctive effort to supply the chief ingredient in a day's pleasure when it is wanting. If, however, one pays a visit to the "World's Fair," now being celebrated at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, it will be presently discovered that to have a noise made for him is better, in the holiday-maker's sight, than to make one for himself. In the presence of a really thundering noise he is silent; he does not try to increase or add to it: he receives it in silence; he enjoys it; to sing or shout, or in any way to join in it, would spoil his gratification. To be sure, in order to produce the feeling of full and satisfying content, the noise must be of the very loudest; it must be a noise made up of the thumping of heavy hammers on anvils (this is done on pretence of trying the strength); the rolling of bowls and the falling of skittles on floors; the bawling of showmen; the roaring and bellowing of angry wild animals in cages; the blare of trumpets, horns, and brass bands playing all together, and each playing a different tune; the beating of drums, and the clashing of cymbals; the roll and thunder of organs; the firing of guns and the smashing of bottles; the whistle of steam-engines, and the clatter of miniature trains; and, over and above, the rolling echoes of all these component noises in a hollow and resounding roof. Such a noise as this becomes for the People as a soothing mixture which composes their spirits and tranquillizes their nerves. Their faces, as they wander about the broad hall and listen, are wreathed with smiles and smoothed out with contentment; there is no profane swearing heard, nor any quarrelling or disagreement, or exhibition of temper; all are happy alike. Under the benign influence of Noise, the husband treats his wife with a tender consideration, and carries in his own arms the year-old baby whose placid eyes and infantine smile show that he, too, feels how much more blessed a thing it is to hear a noise than to make one; the little London lover marches about with his little London lass, showing in the soft content visible in his eyes how beautifully a really good honest Row goes with love; in the more favoured parts of the Hall (which of course is the West End), where most of the brass bands are gathered, and the banging is loudest and the organs most hideous, the folk are found jammed together in crowds, which neither push, nor jostle, nor shout, but give themselves over to the enjoyment of the noise, and are carried away in rapture to an imaginary Paradise of Perpetual Row. A few years ago there was a certain preacher who had a church in the Strand; the din of the traffic and the clamour of the street continually disturbed and vexed him, so that he was fain to consider the subject in his sermon; and he was wont to illustrate the subject by reference to the famous crowd which went about crying, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" "as if," he would add, "the louder they bawled the greater she would be." So with this English crowd; the louder the bawling, the greater is their joy.

The arrangements and general plan of the fair have an American air, as of a machine-made thing turned out to order, as, of course, the show really is. There is, to begin with, too much of it for a real fair; and there are omissions which one acquainted with an English country fair of the genuine kind would be ashamed of making. For instance, there is not, so far as could be learned in a single visit, one gingerbread stall in the whole fair, nor is there a stall for toys, nor a bookstall, nor a glove and ribbon stall; in fact, there is no possibility of buying a fairing. Who, in the good old days, would care for a fair unless one could bring home a fairing? Would the memory of a thousand steam whistles satisfy the soul if there was no fairing? Next, there is a magnificent refreshment bar instead of a booth with wooden seats; and instead of a tent with rough boards for dancing, they have got a saloon. There are no targets to fire at for nuts, but bottles hung up in a row; and only barren honour rewards him who breaks a bottle with a lucky shot. There are none of the old-fashioned Aunt Sallies and "shies" with sticks at cocoa-nuts. On the other hand, there is every other possible kind of new-fangled "shy"—Salvation Army figures whose heads are to be knocked off, buckets into which you have to pitch the wooden ball, upright sticks on which you have to pitch a quoit. Then the humble old merry-go-round, with its single circle of horses, worked by hand, is supplanted by the great steam-worked machine, with its triple circle of horses, or, worse still, with the newly-invented circle of yachts, whose motion is artfully contrived to produce as much sea-sickness for twopence as one could get off Margate jetty on a breezy day for eighteenpence. And there are no gipsies, no telling of fortunes, no brown and tattered children running about among the tents, no pot hanging over a fire of sticks, supposed to contain a toothsome stew of stolen poultry, poached pheasant, wired hare, and hedgehog. Fancy a fair without its gipsies! There is, again, no "fun of the fair" in the shape of wooden rattles and penny dolls; but this we need not regret. On the other hand, the shows are overdone. There are not only too many of them, but they should be placed under some kind of management; the showmen should not be left entirely to themselves. Without stinting the visitors of their noise, it might be so arranged that when the performing monkeys are outside, their next-door neighbours, called Richardson's Show (but it is not the Richardson's Show of our childhood) might be performing within; and when the troupe of the Variety Show are dancing on their platform, the Circus people next to them might be performing their unrivalled feats behind their flaring pictures. One does not know who is responsible for the management, if anybody. Perhaps the performers pay for the right to their places; perhaps they get some of the entrance money; perhaps they are simply enjoined to make as much noise as they possibly can. Certainly, they are so energetic that they cannot be mere hirelings, but must have a direct interest in the success of their shows. Only there must be, one thinks, some general manager, who has allotted them their positions, and given them permission to perform; and really a great opportunity is lost, after all the materials for an admirable fair are got together, when they are tossed carelessly into the great hall, there to arrange themselves and do what is right in their own eyes. A fair must certainly have the outward appearance of bustle, life, and competition; there must not be too much stage management; but in an artificial fair there should be some.

The good old rule, found out years ago, and long successfully practised at Bartholomew Fair, that the best part of the performance must take place outside the tent, is, we are glad to say, thoroughly recognized at the Agricultural Hall. The most beautiful marionettes are those which pirouette on the platform beside the organ; the cleverest of the performing monkeys play and swing for everybody to see; Richardson's troupe, outside, appears to be a company numerous enough for Drury Lane; the people of the Variety Show might emulate a Gaiety chorus for numbers and display of legs; there could not be room in any ordinary circus for all the Tom Fools and Jack Puddings doing a clog dance on the platform. After the parade outside the performers vanish, bells ring, the most frantic invitations are made to the crowd to walk up and step within for threepence; but for a time there is no response, and one sadly feels that perhaps the performance may be held to empty benches. The proprietor, however, knows his people; he descends, grasps the nearest lady in the crowd, and shoves her, without asking her consent, up the steps; her friends follow; the populace, like the sheep of the Sieur, Dindenault, go after; the circus or theatre becomes immediately full, and it is not till next day that one remembers how much better they acted outside, and asks why only half-a-dozen appeared in the arena or on the stage, and where were the remaining thirty? In fact, the remaining thirty are supers; no amount of admission threepences could maintain so enormous a troupe if they were all sociétaires: the Tom Fools and the ladies in gilt armour and tights are wanted for the outside only; they do not belong to the hereditary clan which, from generation to generation, keeps up the supply of acrobat, circus rider, clown, and buffoon. It is satisfactory to learn from the conductor of the circus that "biz" is very fair—"very fair, indeed." The house, at threepence a head, seems able to hold, when full, about six-and-thirty shillings, so that there must be a good many performances every day to satisfy even a modest estimate of fair business.

Besides the larger entertainments, with their bands and gaily-dressed companies, there are a great number of smaller shows, which perhaps offer "better value for money" than the theatre or the circus. For instance, there is a giant, and a very good giant, too. His birthplace was Dublin; like all giants, he is young—Charles Dickens long ago found out what becomes of superannuated giants and dwarfs: like all giants, he breaks down in the knees; his head is not so big as it ought to be, considering his length; and if he showed in his expression some approach to interest in the proceedings, it would give a higher tone, so to speak, to the nature of the exhibition. However, he walks round, shakes hands with everybody and goes behind his curtain again. Next to him are the Performing Zulus. There are nine of them, and they have a platform quite as large as an ordinary dining-table for their evolutions. It may be remarked, as a general rule, that whenever there is an exhibition of Caffres, Hottentots, or niggers, every gentleman of African descent who happens to be in the neighbourhood always goes to see it. There was a delightfully black person, a shiny black person, with a skin like a mirror of polished ebony, watching these Zulus; and he bore an expression on his face of interest and wonder at the ways of coloured people, which was very pretty to witness. After the evolutions, the headman, a prince in his own country, went round with a tin box and made a collection and shook hands. In the gallery there was a Bearded Lady in a kind of wooden box, with whom you might shake hands for a penny; but there seemed little eagerness to enjoy that privilege; perhaps bearded ladies have had their day. There were, besides, pigs with two heads and eight legs, and an awful monster of the deep. There was the murder of Carey, and the hanging of O'Donnell. There was a swimming family. There were peepshows, and wax figures; and a wild-beast show, with the most superior and contemptuous Polar bear ever seen; and there was, finally, to take leave of the Fair, a wondrous Lady, in a short frock and bare arms, accompanied by her husband, a dwarf two feet six inches high, with a pale face and grisly beard, and one of her children, who carries the box for coppers. The lady is stout, and appears to be of an intrepid and resolute disposition. Her "claims" for exhibition, however, are based not upon her strength of mind or even on the fact that her husband is a dwarf; but on the wonderful circumstance that she, one out of a million, so to speak, has been privileged to give birth to triplets and has received the Queen's Bounty. She is proud, and with good reason, of this: it gives her a niche in the World's Fair; but she shakes hands with affability, and the child, accompanied by the dwarf, her father, goes round and collects the pence in her tin box. As one comes away from this entertainment, one might make many admirable reflections if it were not for the awful headache it has caused. It is a harmless place: the people are good-natured; they are not drunk. One misses the accompaniments of the old country fair—the grass beneath one's feet, the gipsies and tramps, the cool evening air, the row of booths, and the gaping rustics; and there is not enough management: but the thing is full of go and is cheerful, and might have been much worse. Those who remember Greenwich Fair will remember how very, very much worse it might have been.

PARISIAN CONDUCTORS.

THE interest taken in orchestral music in England has received so much impulse of late, owing to Herr Richter's visits to London, and attention has been so widely called to the conductor's well-nigh limitless powers for good or evil over the instrumentalists who work under him, that it has seemed to us that it might prove interesting to consider the relative qualities of some other famous conductors.

Herr Richter can need no praise of ours, neither need we dwell upon the great debt of gratitude which the English public owes him for the magnificent series of concerts given by him in St. James's Hall. It would be idle to call attention to his extraordinary qualities as a musician; and his rehearsals have been so largely attended that there is no need for us to attempt any explanation of the methods by which he attains to those results which have given him the great name he bears in all places where the love of music exists. We will therefore for the present pass over matters that are well known to the London musical public, and devote most of our attention to work of a similar nature which is being done in Paris. It is a far cry from Herr Richter to M. Pasdeloup, to whom we first turn in considering the Paris conductors, on account of the fact that the Paris of to-day stands largely indebted to him for its musical education. The formation of the popular concerts at the "Cirque d'Hiver" some twenty years ago was a daring experiment, and one which required no ordinary amount of courage and perseverance on the part of its originator. The symphonies of Mozart and Beethoven—although it must be added that the Beethoven symphonies were often presented to the audience in a terribly mutilated and distorted condition—were known to a certain extent to Parisian concert-goers, through the interpretation of the orchestra of the Conservatoire, before M. Pasdeloup began his series of "Concerts populaires." But the Conservatoire concerts necessarily appealed to a strictly limited public, and it remained for M. Pasdeloup to render great music truly popular in Paris. His indomitable pluck and perseverance were made manifest when he undertook to make Wagner known to the French public. As soon as he raised his stick a storm of hisses burst from the audience; catcalls were heard on every side; and carefully-studied imitations of the farmyard, with crowing cocks, pigs in their death agony, and oxen struggling through a narrow gate, were executed with inimitable verve; while the orchestra, unabashed, played steadily on to the end of the score before them. Gradually a change took place. The inability to hear a note played by the orchestra remained the same; but the cause of the pitiless din had altered. A camp of Wagnerites had been slowly formed, whose members did grim battle with all opponents; benches were torn up, hard knocks freely exchanged, and "petits bancs," a missile we can heartily recommend to intending visitors to Paris in the case of disturbance in a theatre, hurtled through the air. At the present time Wagner's name on a programme is enough to ensure the presence of a thoughtful and attentive audience. Let it be remembered that this state of things is mainly owing to M. Pasdeloup's ceaseless patience and perseverance. Of his merits as a conductor we cannot honestly say very much; he invariably fails in the interpretation of Beethoven, and has of late developed a marked tendency towards putting insufficiently rehearsed work before the public. He has a distinctly unfortunate predilection for hurrying through the score before him, and music under his conductorship is often sadly wanting in sympathetic quality. M. Pasdeloup is perhaps most in his element in dealing with the scores of Haydn and of Mozart, and he has been highly successful in producing the works of Lully and Rameau, into which he instils more vigour and life than we usually find in his conducting. We must add that we have in former times heard some of Wagner's music satisfactorily interpreted at the Cirque d'Hiver; but this, owing to various causes which we cannot stop to consider, is no longer the case. M. Pasdeloup's most prominent faults as a conductor are heaviness and want of precision of attack; that these defects are in nowise chargeable to the executants under his command will be at once obvious to those who have seen the electric effect produced upon the orchestra of the "Concerts populaires" when Herr Rubinstein takes the bâton or when M. Heyman carries the musicians along with him, as on an irresistible stream, in Weber's "Concert-stück." M. Pasdeloup, far as he is from being a great conductor, has proved himself to be a great organizer of concerts, and he has spared no pains to introduce first-rate soloists to the public.

The Association Artistique, which gives its concerts at the Théâtre du Châtelet, under the leadership of M. Colonne, is of more recent formation, and has proved, as far as drawing a large public goes, a most successful venture. M. Colonne may be described as a conductor with a spécialité, which we need hardly add lies in the interpretation of Berlioz, to whom a certain class of British journalist delights to refer as "the eccentric but talented French composer." It may almost be said that those who have not heard Roméo et Juliette and L'Enfance du Christ under M. Colonne's direction have not heard them at all. It is hardly possible to account in any other way for the comparative failure of L'Enfance du Christ in London under Mr. Hallé's leadership. The lamentable fiasco of Roméo et Juliette, placed before the public by Mr. Cusins, has hardly any bearing on the case, as the result might easily have been predicted for very obvious reasons. In dealing with Roméo et Juliette M. Colonne shows that he is possessed of a delicate natural instinct for comprehending the intention of the master in this work, which is one of his highest achievements. It would take up more space than we can spare to dwell upon the beauties of the various numbers of this admirable work, and on the conductor's excellent interpretation of them; we must, however, pause to pay our tribute to his firm and delicate handling of the "scherzo de la reine Mab," one of the most exquisitely imagined triumphs of orchestration to be met with in the whole range of music, surpassing the famous "Ballet des sylphes" in its perfect delicacy of conception. In dealing with the tender and beautiful idyl, L'Enfance du Christ, M. Colonne proves himself to be the possessor of a poetic sentiment which is rarely to be met with, and which is absolutely necessary for the adequate interpretation of that beautiful poem in music. Of his interpretation of La Damnation de Faust it would be difficult to speak too highly. The prelude, with its infinite suggestions of the resurrection of Nature from the first timid, uncertain awakening to the grand burst of joy at the full possession of renewed strength and life, meets with consummate justice at the hands of M. Colonne. In the "Marche Hongroise" he fully realizes Berlioz's intention, of which the master has given us so vivid a description in his Memoirs. We wish that other conductors would exercise as much sobriety in dealing with the opening phrases. It cannot be too much insisted on that noisiness is the worst fault that can be shown in the interpretation of Berlioz. M. Colonne's skill is displayed to the highest advantage in the love passages of Faust and of Marguerite, which seem to us to have been somewhat tamely treated by Mr. Hallé. But, once away from Berlioz, M. Colonne is no longer the same man, and becomes apt to pander to the grossest errors of taste of the Parisian public. Some of the finest compositions of Wagner degenerate in his hands into mere noise; and, with Beethoven's Symphonies before him, he appears to think of nothing but his audience, and to remember only too well that that audience is a French one, delighting in clinquant and in being startled by unexpected effects.

The case is far different with M. Lamoureux, the founder of the "Société des Nouveaux Concerts," who is thoroughly incapable of committing any sin against art or of treating lightly the slightest production he may take in hand. Wherever M. Lamoureux's influence has been exerted a remarkable result has been obtained. We are, however, more immediately concerned with the consideration of what has been done by him in connexion with the series of concerts which he inaugurated in 1881 at the Théâtre du Château d'Eau. We need hardly speak of the difficulty of forming a new orchestra by the side of those which already existed in Paris, and we may add that the obstacles in the way of such an enterprise must have been harder to surmount than if the scene of M. Lamoureux's labours had been laid in London. The perfection of his orchestra at the present time in this, which is only his third season, shows the extent of the power he can bring to bear on the object before him. It would be difficult to single out any finer instrument for the interpretation of music than the noble orchestra which is now under M. Lamoureux's command, and it may not be amiss to call attention to the means by which this result has been brought about. M. Lamoureux possesses in common with Herr Richter the great advantage of being an accomplished instrumentalist, and like the great Viennese conductor he has a thorough contempt for fatigue, and is ready to go through any number of rehearsals that may be necessary for achieving faultless execution. Before proceeding to the actual study of a score, M. Lamoureux gives his executants a careful analysis of it, clearing up obscurities and fully explaining the composer's intention, and, as far as it is possible, taking into account the conditions under which the rehearsals take place, each group of instruments is exercised before an ensemble is attempted. But the secret of M. Lamoureux's great success as a chef d'orchestre lies in his power of communicating his own enthusiasm to those about him. To fully appreciate his commanding genius as a conductor he should be heard in the interpretation of Beethoven's Symphonies, in which, to our thinking, he attains to a more perfect realization of the intention of that great composer than any other musician we know of. Difficult as it is to choose any one performance for special comment where all is so excellent, we cannot help selecting the Ninth Symphony for particular consideration in this article. His treatment of the first movement is beyond all praise in its sobriety and poetical sympathy with the composer, and is to our thinking one of the greatest triumphs of orchestral interpretation. In the scherzo he has introduced a very slight, but, in our opinion, happy innovation, that of covering the sticks of the drums with flannel, on their first entrance. It may be remarked that neither M. Lamoureux nor Herr Richter follow the tempo indicated by Beethoven in the scherzo, M. Lamoureux taking it a little slower and Herr Richter decidedly faster. In executing such fragments of the works of Wagner as are capable of selection for concerts, M. Lamoureux, though perhaps he is occasionally wanting in the fiery dash which distinguishes Herr Richter, is very admirable, and we doubt if anything could surpass his beautiful rendering of the prelude to Parsifal. One of the most interesting events in connexion with the history of the "Nouveaux Concerts" has been the production of a very little known work of John Sebastian Bach's on the 2nd of this month. Before passing to any comment on the manner of its execution it may not be amiss to devote a brief space to the history of the work itself. Der Streit zwischen Phœbus und Pan; dramma per musica, of which Picander wrote the libretto, was composed and executed in 1731, and has hardly ever been given since. It is said that Bach's chief intention in this composition was to satirize one Scheibe, who had written some hostile articles on his music, and on whom he took vengeance by representing him in the character of Midas. The sprightly satire of the music, wholly different from Bach's usual style, is exquisitely enjoyable, and we know of nothing more heartily jovial than the chorus with which the work opens. There is a wonderfully effective contrast between the jolly, sensually-happy song of Pan and the noble melody of Phœbus, and much beautiful and lightly-conceived scoring in the part of Momus. Of the grandeur and large writing of the choruses we cannot say too much. Of the execution, with the exception of the singers, we can only say that it was faultless and thoroughly appreciative on the part of the conductor and of the orchestra. In conclusion, we can only hope that M. Lamoureux's intention of revisiting London to conduct a series of classical concerts may be carried out before another year passes.

MORE GHOSTS.

GHOSTS are livelier than ever. In the Nineteenth Century Mr. Herbert Spencer once more declares that ghosts are the origin of religion. It must not, however, be hastily assumed that Mr. Spencer is a believer in ghosts. In the Contemporary Review the Bishop of Carlisle "does something for" apparitions. Lastly, Mr. Arthur James Melhuish, F.R.A.S. and F.R.M.S., has published what he calls the "Truth About Ghosts," and probably thinks that he has settled the question of the existence of a bogie. "At Christmas-time," says Mr. Melhuish (whose style is rather American), "one always feels to want something uncanny." The demand for "something uncanny" is supplied by a collection of letters from the canny columns of the Daily Telegraph. Last autumn the Daily Telegraph, like other papers, was in want of a good stock topic for the silly season. The Parcels Post was, perhaps, exhausted. "Horrible London" had not come up. People were tired of servants and masters, clerks and early marriage, and it had not occurred to any one that O'Donnell was rather a meritorious person, who ought on no account to be hanged. Therefore, in the absence of anything better, a leading article on the "mysterious warning" supposed to be hereditary in the bonny house of Airlie was published in the Daily Telegraph. Then appeared a long letter on occult matters in general, by a "Master of Arts," who knew all about Buddhism, and the "Akash," and who may plausibly be conjectured to have an acquaintance with Pushto, "an excellent language to make a man friendly and independent." This learned correspondent cast all the light of Asia that he could on the Hindoo "occultists" and kindred topics. The ball was now kicked off, if we may borrow an expression from football, and there followed a regular "scrimmage" of sceptics and believers. The believers were more numerous than the sceptics, and perhaps may claim a goal. This, at least, seems to be the opinion of Mr. Melhuish. He says the sceptics are dogmatic (a highly improper thing in a sceptic), and not very weighty in argument, while he regards the letters of the believers as "an unequalled body of evidence." If the Telegraph's evidence is "unequalled," then the extant testimony for the existence of bogies would scarcely satisfy a jury. We have a lot of well-known tales, sometimes names are given, sometimes they are not. But a name alone does not carry weight, and when we track the suggestion to its inmost cell, we generally find that there is no producible witness at all. Seldom, indeed, will the ghost come into court, like the famous Irish spectre. "Suddenly," says the Hibernian tale, "a dreadful rumbling sound was heard, 'Here am I that was foully murthered.' After that there was no more to be said, and the judge put on the black cap," and condemned the accused on the testimony of the "dreadful rumbling sound."

Mr. Melhuish furnishes the unequalled body of evidence with a preface in which he disputes the ordinary sceptical arguments, with the ordinary replies. "That all apparitions are hallucinations is an axiom of science," says a modern sage, and certainly the hallucination theory has not always been quite fairly pressed. We blame believers for the staleness and paucity of their narratives. If we do that, it is scarcely fair to be always trotting out Sir David Brewster's "Mrs. A.," and the Berlin bookseller Nicolai. In the first place, who was Mrs. A.? We don't like Mrs. A.'s security. Mrs. A. certainly would not be accepted as evidence for a ghost. Why should Mrs. A. be accepted as evidence for a hallucination? Again, even if Mrs. A. and Nicolai were real trustworthy people, we get no forwarder. "Here we are," say these authorities; "we were always seeing hallucinations, and we never saw a ghost." "But how does that affect our position?" the seers reply. "We are not in the habit of being hallucinated; we have only seen one ghost apiece. It is not a practice with us, as having hallucinations is with you. And our vision of the ghost coincided with the death of the person whose apparition we beheld, while your visions coincided with nothing." Let us be fair, and admit that Mrs. A. and her backers have not the better of this controversy. We may deny that the seers ever saw anything abnormal. But if they did see things, then their position is not on a footing with that of Mrs. A., about whose credibility, or even existence, we have no precise information. Perhaps her name was Arris. Or, finally (and this is a favourite Spiritualist argument), it may as fairly be alleged that Mrs. A. and Nicolai saw ghosts, and thought them illusions, as that the true seers beheld illusions and took them for ghosts.

This reasoning, after all, is like the performances of the Rabelaisian Chimera Bombinans in vacuo. We have not attempted to ascertain the credibility of the witnesses either of spectral illusions or real spectres. That hallucinations may and do occur is certain. Scott mentions a famous example. He beheld Lord Byron suddenly in the hall of his house, we forget whether it was at Ashiestiel or Abbotsford. Had Lord Byron chanced to die on the day when Scott saw him, here would have been a splendid coincidence and an excellent ghost. The believers argue that the "coincidences" between apparition and event are too numerous to be explained as chance coincidences. Here, again, if proved true, their argument is not without weight. If men only see apparitions of the living just before the death of the persons seen, then the coincidence of the death completes the marvel. C'est là le miracle. But, unluckily, as some of these very letters from the Telegraph testify, and as we know to be true, apparitions of the living are beheld when nobody dies and nothing in particular happens at all. Just as those dreams only are remembered and recorded which are fulfilled, so people rarely speak of apparitions with which there is no coincident death. Thus the coincidence is made to seem a far more frequent feature of visionary illusions or appearances than it is in reality. But to return to Scott. Lord Byron did not die when Scott beheld his wraith, and, what is more, the wraith turned out, on inspection, to be a mere arrangement of hats and cloaks in the hall. Such illusions, caused by conditions of light and sight, are common enough. The writer has met on the road what he took to be three or four children leading a white horse. On a nearer approach this phenomenon resolved itself into two men carrying three or four beehives on a long pole. Illusions which have a basis in objective phenomena may even affect several persons at the same moment. There is a perfectly authentic case in which two persons, sitting in the opposite corners of a box at the theatre, saw in the stalls a lady with a severed head in her lap. Again, five or six people walking together saw the figure of a Cavalier of Charles I.'s time stopping the way. This warrior proved to be nothing more martial than a milkmaid. Yet the wrong impression was impressed on five different sets of eyes and brains. Thus hallucinations with an objective basis may be collective. It does not suit with the ideas of psychical researchers (who believe in the extraordinary influence of mind on mind) to deny that hallucinations with no objective basis may be collective too. Yet they do attempt to deny this, and trust that the appearance of a ghost may be established from the mouths of two or three witnesses. Now, suppose that some one had been with Scott when he saw the false spectre of Byron. Suppose that Scott's companion, like the people in the box at the theatre, had shared a common illusion. In such a case, many persons, instead of saying that Byron turned out to be an arrangement of great-coats, would have averred that Byron "disappeared." Here would have been collective testimony to Byron's wraith, and, if he had died within the year, here would have been collective testimony to a "coincidence."

People are not very particular about dates in those matters. The victim generally dies "the very hour" that his double is seen. But it is hard, if not impossible, to get evidence for this. One of the Telegraph's correspondents has a story of an officer who was killed in India, and appeared, at the same time, in three places in England. On the evidence of these apparitions, it is alleged, an error in Lord Clyde's despatch announcing the death was corrected by the Horse Guards! But who is the authority for all this? Only the signature "M.A. of Cambridge," which does not bear very much weight in evidence about matters spiritual. The case of the "Airlie Warning," which started all this flood of anecdote and argument, shows how lax people's ideas of evidence and of what makes coincidence really are. The usual tradition is that a spectral drummer beats a spectral drum, just before the death of members of the house of Airlie. The same legend runs, we believe, in an Irish family. The examples of the phenomena given in "The Truth about Ghosts" are curious. First an English gentleman, on his way to the Tulchan, on August 19, 1849, heard a brass band playing on the ridge of ground in front of him. Lord Airlie died next day. A brass band is not a drummer. If we are to be seriously asked to believe these things, we need an historical investigation. How old is the tradition of the brass band? Is it older than the introduction of brass bands beyond the Highland line? How old is the story of the drummer? Did the drummer resign in favour of the more modern and complicated entertainment? Now turn to the communication of F. H. Grove (p. 9), in which the "Story of the Drummer-boy" is confirmed on the evidence of "a lady," unnamed. Early in the spring of 1845 this lady visited Lord Airlie. On the night of her arrival she heard "a band of music at a distance." Some one told her "It was the drummer-boy you heard." How could a drummer-boy produce the same harmonious effect as "a band of music at a distance"? The boy or the band must be given up, unless we are to understand that the boy took to him seven other boys, worse than himself, and armed with trombones, trumpets, and other noisy instruments of brass. Of course this may have occurred; but how flimsy does the historical student find those narratives! As to the "coincidence," a lady belonging to the family died several months afterwards. The sceptic will ask why one family should be given such a "straight tip" as to when they should insure their lives, while other families are neglected; but this is hardly argument. Oddly enough, the maid of the lady who heard the distant band of music writes to say that she was more favoured, and was "startled by the beating of a drum." She also observes that, on hearing a fife, she expected to see a piper; and perhaps a piper may perform on a fife, when a boy with a drum can produce the effect of a brass band. To complicate matters, it seems that the lady congratulated her host on the possession of "an excellent piper." She seems to have held that a piper caused the sound of a band of music in the distance. In other details the lady's account and the lady's maid's account contradict each other, and a jury would probably be directed to dismiss the evidence of both witnesses from their minds. It does not stand cross examination for a moment, and this is almost always the case. First people have, or fancy they have, some experience of an abnormal kind. Then they half unconsciously embroider it, and supply it with "coincidences." Lastly, they publish it, many years after, to please some ghost society, and by that time the evidence is worth as much as that of an Irish witness to an Irish murderer's alibi. That is "the truth about ghosts."

AN APOLOGY FOR MORMONISM.

THIS is an age of apologies and rehabilitations. The blackest characters of history have been sedulously whitewashed—which however generally involves the blackwashing of others hitherto deemed respectable, if not immaculate—and we have been called upon to recognize Nero as a model of domestic affection and Henry VIII. as a singular example of conjugal fidelity. Societies, like individuals, have undergone a similar process of tidying up, to use a homely phrase. Their real or supposed incrustations of dirt have been "mopped with a mop and brushed with a broom," in the forcible language of the Baby's Début, till the reputed blackamoor becomes white as driven snow. That there are cases in which a revision, if not a reversal, of popular verdicts was demanded by a fuller and more impartial investigation of facts previously misunderstood or ignored we are far from denying. The Jesuits, for instance, whatever faults are fairly chargeable on them, are not quite the unredeemed villains Protestant imagination had painted them, nor can the Reformers en masse—especially the English ones—establish their claim to a place in the hagiology. But still there must be some limits to this crusade against all received opinions. Historical beliefs are not always based on illusion, and a passion for paradox may be as strong and as uncritical as the force of ingrained prejudice. There is less room however for the growth of legendary error as regards events of recent occurrence than in our estimate of those which happened centuries ago, and the Church of Latter Day Saints was founded in 1830. There is room for difference of opinion within certain limits as to the character of Mahomet and of the religion he founded; we should hardly have supposed there was much room for reasonable difference as to the character of Joe Smith. An apologist however has just come forward in the Nineteenth Century, in the person of Mr. Barclay, M.P., who intimates that he went to Utah prepared, like his fellows, to curse the Mormons, but who has come away blessing them altogether. His method of arriving at this conclusion is a very simple one. To be sure there are occasional admissions in what he does tell us which would go far, if analysed, to destroy the force of his argument, but it is based on a skilful presentation of one side of the evidence only, as presented to him by friendly witnesses at Utah, and an all but entire omission of the evidence on the other side, which is referred to, if at all, as untrustworthy, or at best "not fully authenticated." He is not of course an advocate for the Mormonite creed, as such, or he would be himself a Mormonite, but he fails apparently to perceive that, if not based on revelation, it is based on vulgar imposture—the history of its origin leaves little room for the charitable hypothesis of sincere enthusiasm—though he does incidentally suggest some of the purely mundane agencies which contributed to its certainly remarkable success. He tells us e.g. how "missionaries are despatched to all quarters of the globe," who manage to convoy from 2,000 to 3,000 neophytes a year to Utah. We may illustrate their method of procedure from the history of the Swedish contingent of the Salt Lake Church. As a rule the Scandinavian descendants of the wandering Goths, Jutes, and Norsemen are among the most pacific and sedentary of modern nations, although both in Denmark and Sweden there is perfect freedom of emigration. But of the small numbers who leave these northern parts the larger portion has been drawn to the Mormonite settlement. The Apostles of Utah fixed early on Copenhagen as a promising field of operations, and about 1850 established there both a regular Mormonite hierarchy and a well-managed journal. The Swedish law against abandoning the established Lutheranism rather helped than hindered a propaganda whose first doctrine was expatriation, and for many years there was a large annual influx of Swedish recruits to Utah. In Norway the extent and sterility of the highlands gave point to the promises of the Evangelists of a Western paradise, and from 1846 to 1855 about 3,000 Norwegian emigrants passed annually to the United States. M. Duval gives their own explanation of this fact in words significant of the not purely supernatural attractions of the Mormon Gospel:—"Il est si difficile d'arracher quelque chose aux sables de nos montagnes." It is clear that here the disciples, if not their teachers, had, like the founder of Mormonism, shrewdly calculated that "godliness is gain." The "promised land" of the Saints is thus described:—

> The valley of Salt Lake is 5,000 to 6,000 feet above sea-level, about 600 miles long north and south, and of irregular width, varying from 20 to 50 miles. On the east side the Wasatch range and on the west the Oquirrh Mountains rise abruptly, bare, rugged, and precipitous. To the north the valley is closed in by the mountain ranges, and southwards it rises up to the tableland of Arizona.
> Twenty miles south of Salt Lake City is Lake Utah, a beautiful sheet of pure water, and from it northwards through the valley flows a considerable stream, called the Jordan, to the Great Salt Lake, which without any outlet fills the bottom of the basin.
> The water of the Salt Lake contains about seventeen per cent. of solid matter, chiefly common salt, and is extremely bitter. Its height has varied as much in the last thirty years as nine feet, rising and falling irregularly. At one time the whole valley had been an inland sea, and the old margins are visible along the mountain-sides. One level at which the lake had stood for a long period is 800 feet above the present lake, but as the same margin varies 200 to 300 feet in height, changes have taken place in the level of the land as well as of the water. The lake lies nearly 20 miles north west of Salt Lake City, and is much frequented in summer by bathers, for whose accommodation the Mormons have built a railway. . . .
> Salt Lake City is the finest town of its size in the Western States. Instead of the bare, comfortless appearance of many new American towns, a large part of Salt Lake City is embowered in gardens and orchards. Rows of trees both shade and beautify the streets, and the houses have an air of comfort and look of home too frequently wanting in new settlements. Looking southwards from the higher grounds of the city, a chain of villages and hamlets extends along the base of the Wasatch range. At the mouth of every gorge, where a mountain stream struggles out on the plain, the church and schoolhouse of a village peep through the green foliage of the surrounding trees and orchards. Further out on the plain each homestead is surrounded by its grove of trees, an acceptable patch of green in the brown and arid landscape.

It is clear enough then that "Mormonism interests itself as much in the temporal as in the spiritual concerns of its members." To speak more plainly, of "spiritual concerns" it takes no heed at all.

We have said already that Mr. Barclay's line throughout is to state one side of the case, as if it were the whole. Thus he passes rapidly over the early history of Mormonism, giving us the authorized version of Joe Smith's divine commission and subsequent martyrdom, but saying not a word of the odious criminality and violence by which he drew the rough and irregular justice of lynch law on his own head. We are told, again, much of Brigham Young's indisputable capacities and force of character, but not a word of his murders and other crimes. That he was "endowed with extraordinary sagacity and organizing faculty" nobody ever dreamt of disputing. Mormonism, Mr. Barclay assures us, does not differ at all in its tenets from Christianity, except—it is a pretty considerable exception—"as regards polygamy." It accepts both the Old and New Testament; "its doctrines do not differ essentially from those of other (?) Christians, and with the exception of polygamy its morality is that of the New Testament." He seems to forget that it accepts the Book of Mormon also, which practically supersedes both Testaments. He forgets also that, if in the abstract Mormonites, or some of them, profess to accept the New Testament, there are many different ways of interpreting it. Brigham Young is reported to have been asked by a Christian visitor, to whom he made a similar profession, but who knew something of his character and habits, whether he fulfilled the Scriptural precept of praying for his enemies? "Certainly," was the prompt reply, "I pray for them daily, that they may all be damned." With this latitude of interpretation the acceptance of the New Testament may be compatible with all their worst enemies have charged upon the Mormonites. Mr. Barclay expresses a very proper disapproval of "the peculiar institution" of polygamy, but appears to consider it a minor matter, which may be left to adjust itself, and anticipates that in the future it will be quietly dropped.

> Mormonism, apart from polygamy, which seems to me a temporary excrescence, will in my opinion grow, and probably be the religion of the settlers or farming classes in the mountainous country between the great plains east of the Rocky Mountains and California on the west. In those districts irrigation is almost everywhere necessary for cultivation, and, with the scarcity of capital, irrigation works must be executed by co-operation among the settlers. The experience of the Mormons in irrigation and co-operation, coupled with their self-reliant and frugal habits, enables them to surmount difficulties from which outsiders shrink, and their sober and temperate habits specially qualify them for pastoral pursuits, either on their own account or as tenders of the herds and flocks on large ranches, for which only a very large portion of the country is suitable.

Meanwhile, he insists on the superior morality of the Mormonite to the non-Mormonite inhabitants of the Salt Lake City. It is obvious to reply to the latter point that a plurality of wives necessarily acts as a cure, or rather as a substitute, for certain kinds of vice. As to its being quietly dropped hereafter, he must surely have forgotten his own assertion that it is the sole distinctive tenet of Mormonism, which would otherwise differ in no respect from the ordinary forms of Christianity. We have too much respect ourselves for Christianity to agree with that view; but we most entirely believe that polygamy is at once one of the most characteristic institutions and, to many male proselytes, one of the chief attractions of the Church of the Latter Day Saints. That "the celestial law of marriage," first promulgated by Young in 1852, is sanctioned, without being specially dwelt upon, in the Mormon Bible may be true, but in most sects tradition and the personal influence of the founder counts for more than the written standards. Wesleyanism would be very different from what it is if it conformed its teaching and practice exclusively to the four volumes of Wesley's printed Sermons. The Mormonites at all events have announced their resolve to resist to the death all attempts to put down polygamy. As to their theology, the Mormonite Deity is a materialistic parody of the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. The distinction of marriage "for time" and "for eternity," to which Mr. Barclay refers vaguely, but of which he appears to be most imperfectly informed, is no doubt remarkable, and, if it be examined, equally repulsive, but into that we need not enter here. Of the despotic power of the hierarchy he has evidently no idea, though he quotes, without seeming at all to appreciate its force, the statements of Governor Murray, Chief Magistrate of Utah, who apprehends serious political difficulty from this cause. "The people," so runs an official document, "will be as much condemned if they do not obey Brother Brigham as they would be if they disobeyed the Lord God were He here in person. When the Lord comes He will take vengeance on those who do not obey the priesthood. The word of Brother Brigham is the word of the Lord." Both the doctrine of polygamy and the claims of the priesthood have led to schisms, and there are already two secessions from Mormonism, which is barely fifty years old. That they will have sooner or later to choose between abandoning polygamy and abandoning Utah seems pretty clear, and in the former case their very raison d'être would be at an end. On what grounds Mr. Barclay argues a great future for them is far from obvious. That he has lent a credulous ear to interested and artful advocates at Utah is sufficiently manifest. That he will induce any well-informed reader to reverse his previous judgment on one of the most baseless and most revolting of modern religious impostures is supremely improbable.

THE GROSVENOR GALLERY.

IN order to visit this Exhibition aright, one should go armed with a good edition of Boswell's Johnson. In these days of so-called éditions de luxe some enterprising publisher might do worse than bring out the immortal work with prints or photographs of a selection of the pictures now in the Grosvenor Gallery. Besides Johnson himself, with his unwieldy body, his great unhealthy-looking face, and his purblind eyes (97), we see Baretti, who was almost as blind, holding a book close to his nose (73); Burke (65), and Burke's conceited son (93); the Beckfords, father and son (179, 186); David Garrick (143), Warren Hastings (102), Miss Angelica Kaufmann (180), Edward Malone (108), Johnson's negro friend and servant, Francis Barber (42), and Reynolds's negro (15); Charles Rollin, the historian (122); Sheridan, a brilliant picture, well known (30); Lady Thomond (177), Mrs. Gwatkin (34), the nieces of Reynolds; Mrs. Thrale, of course, with her child (127); to say nothing of Reynolds himself, in no fewer than nine portraits, all by his own hand, and a case of relics lent by the descendants of his sister. Besides these objects and pictures, there are portraits of nearly every distinguished person and personage of the "Johnsonian period," from the unpopular Cumberland and Bute down to the too-popular Kitties and Nellies and Perditas who play so large a part in the action of Boswell's drama. Brave warriors and noble ladies, "old men and babes," youths and maidens, all living a hundred years ago, appear alive again now. In the dimness of the winter afternoon they look the less unreal. If it had not been for the Catalogue, with its annotations, a visitor with the slightest tinge of that form of historical sentimentalism which may be called association could not fail to be powerfully affected by the finest show of Sir Joshua's ever gathered into one place. But for the Catalogue—a few minutes' study is enough to dispel any illusions. Those gorgeous nobles, those lovely maidens, those dignified soldiers, those stately dames, were one and all no better than they ought to have been—no better than we are ourselves, at any rate. It comes upon us suddenly, like the close of that celebrated chapter in Gulliver's Travels, where the King of Brobdingnag pronounces as his opinion that it doth not appear "that men were ennobled on account of their virtue, that priests were advanced for their piety or learning, soldiers for their conduct or valour, judges for their integrity, senators for their love of their country, or counsellors for their wisdom." This girl with the sweet sad face was so wicked that one of her lovers had her painted as Circe. The fine old gentleman with a view of St. Paul's behind him had thirty children, of whom only one was born in wedlock. This splendid earl with his little son, and various sporting properties around them, was a vicious profligate, and deserted the gentle and beautiful countess whose portrait hangs next in order. It is distressing to read page after page of this kind of gossip. Fortunately there is abundant information of a much more valuable kind. We have the prices paid for many of the portraits. We are told how long the artist was employed on some of them. Anonymous heads are identified and erroneous descriptions corrected. But, besides all this, the annotator, a well-known critic, has gone to the trouble of raking up half-forgotten sins and scandals, and has gone rather to the pages of Walpole and Selwyn for his information than to those of Boswell and his Johnson. Before we leave this subject of the Catalogue something should also be said as to the style in which much of it is written. Let us try, for example, to make sense of such a passage as this; it relates to Mrs. Abington:—"Boswell tells us how Johnson boasted of her having 'insisted so much on my coming' when she played Charlotte for her benefit in April 1755, and how the doctor went to Drury Lane, with Reynolds and others, 'having secured forty places in the front boxes' and given to Boswell 'the honour to put me in the group.'" No one could possibly gather from this that the affair took place, not in April 1755, but on the 27th March, 1775, and that it was neither Dr. Johnson nor Mrs. Abington who took the forty places, but Sir Joshua Reynolds—in fact it would be almost impossible even to parse the sentence. It is perhaps as well, after this example, that Boswell is not more used in the Catalogue. We may take one more specimen, as it is amusing. Of Mrs. Nesbitt we are given some sadly scandalous particulars, though it is not quite clear whether some of them relate to her or to the Duchess of Kingston or to Lord Bristol. Then the annotator goes on:—"Dying in December 1779 Walpole wrote of him to Lady Upper Ossory, the mother of 'Collina' and 'Sylvia,' Dec. 23, 1779, Lord Coventry (husband of the beautiful 'Gunning girl,' see 'Miss Elizabeth Gunning'), as follows:—'Lord Coventry and Colonel Hervey are Lord Bristol's executors.'" We know that Walpole did not die in 1779, nor were Collina and Sylvia born to Lady Upper Ossory in that year, nor was Lord Coventry ever born to her. In short, nothing but the combination of happy guessing and experience which makes a Shakspearian commentator could unravel some of these extraordinary valuable notes. We observe, however, that Mr. Stephens marks his "Historical Notes" as being "in progress," which we must hope means subject to revision.

Perhaps the first thing which will strike the unprejudiced visitor is the extraordinary variety displayed in the pictures. We dread the sameness which characterizes too often the exhibition of one artist's work. It was painfully oppressive at the Rossetti exhibitions of last year. There is nothing of it here. It would be hard to class more than two, or at most three, pictures together as being in one manner or another. So, too, it may be observed that Reynolds did not go through "periods" like most other great artists. True there was an early, incomplete "Hudson period"; but, once emancipated from its influence, his genius expanded itself in all directions—trying, learning to the last, now bursting into a wholly new style, then reverting to some old method, and bringing it to greater perfection. Reynolds was essentially a learned artist. Even his experiments were conducted on well-founded theories. He had not, it is true, our modern love for the early Italian painters, and possibly knew little of Dürer and his pupils; but he was thoroughly conversant with the works and the styles of Rembrandt, Correggio, Murillo, Rubens, and all the great artists of the post-Raffaellite schools. He avowedly imitated Vandyke on occasions, and if he did not equal him, came very near it, as in "The First Marquis of Hertford" (37), and in the beautiful portrait of the Duke of Gloucester (53). His grand landscape, the "View from Richmond Hill" (165), must remind every one of Rubens. His nymphs, in gorgeous sunset tints, are nearer to Titian or Giorgione than to the great Flemish artist. But though many of his pictures will remind us of this painter or that, there are quite as many works which are wholly original—works the like of which had never been produced before, and which have been but feebly imitated since. As about nine-tenths of the pictures now exhibited are portraits, we can hardly tell what Reynolds might have attained to as a composer or historical painter. But there are enough of subject pictures here to show that we must not judge him by such comparatively feeble examples as the "Holy Family" in the National Gallery. Of these, incomparably the finest is the "Tragic Muse" (55), lent by the Duke of Westminster, a repetition of the famous picture at Dulwich, and allowed to be in better condition, if not originally a better work. "Master Wynn as the Infant St. John the Baptist" (18) is so completely cleaned away that we can only judge of the composition, which is not very interesting; nor is "Muscipula" (29), in which all Sir Joshua's mannerisms are exaggerated. The child's mouth is quite deformed. The same defect appears, but not to so great a degree, in "Guardian Angels" (36), which is little more than a sketch, and in "Robinetta" (34). The "Nymph" (39), notwithstanding the peculiar mouth, is a lovely picture. She seems to be chiding Cupid, who peers at her from behind a glowing curtain. The splendour of the colour has seldom been excelled by any painter, certainly by none born in this cold climate. With the "Nymph," which Lord Upper Ossory received as a bequest from Reynolds, we should compare "Cymon and Iphigenia" (160), which can be done by standing in the doorway between the two great rooms. There is the same glow, but in a less degree, and the figure is apparently from the same model. Close to it hangs "Moses in the Bulrushes" (155), in which a totally different scale of colour is presented. The child is pale, and lies on a white drapery. Only skill equal to that of Rubens could have successfully surmounted such a difficulty. Above the "Moses" is one of the designs for stained glass of which such magnificent examples appeared in the Royal Academy last year: magnificent, that is, as pictures, but miserable when regarded from the glass-painter's point of view. "The Adoration of the Shepherds" (156) is in a window of New College, Oxford, and shows the curious taste which would have abolished colour in glass in favour of monochromatic chiaro-scuro. The portraits of Reynolds himself and of the mistaken glass-painter give the picture an element of interest it would otherwise sadly want. Comparable only with the "Nymph" and with "Cymon and Iphigenia" is a lovely little picture, "Mrs. Hartley and her Child." It is, of course, really a portrait; but the treatment is so unconventional that it needs a glance at the Catalogue to show that it is not a subject-picture like the "Nymph." The lady holds the child as if he had flown to her, and was whispering a love secret in her ear. The landscape is as pleasing as the figures. Another pair of portraits are treated in a wholly different manner. "The Duchess of Devonshire and her Child" (81) is a scene from real life. It is too familiar from engravings to need description here; but never was maternal pride, never were infant spirits, so represented. Reynolds delighted in trying various methods of attaining the unattainable power of depicting maternity. He approached Raffaelle, perhaps, in the "Mother and Child," which belongs to Sir Richard Wallace, and which, unfortunately, is not in this exhibition. In the Devonshire picture he is himself, and nothing else. In "Mrs. Hartley" there is more than a reminiscence of Correggio. Very quiet but very original is another group of the kind, a group which to most visitors will seem almost as charming as the "Duchess." It is probably, like the others we have noticed, a portrait, but is described in the Catalogue only as a "Mother and Child" (48). The mother clasps her child with both arms, he leans towards her and holds a plait of her hair. The movement of the startled infant and the naturalness of the pose are wonderfully true to nature; so true, so unexpected, and so pleasing, as to amount to something very like poetry. The "Infant Academy" (62) was also a bequest, and has been long at Broadlands. As Mr. Stephens well says, "it comprises one of the most poetic landscape backgrounds Reynolds painted." The children form a charming group, and the colour is most harmonious; but the picture has either been over-cleaned, or should be varnished by some careful hand. On the whole it is slightly disappointing. We must defer a notice of the more ordinary portraits.

PANTOMIME AND PANTOMIMES.

PANTOMIME (so-called) is a national institution. Christmas comes but once a year, but when it comes it brings a thousand (so-called) pantomimes. Harlequins and clowns, viewless all the year beside—disguised as chimney-sweeps, it may be, or publicans—shoot out into publicity like reappearing stars; from unknown regions in mid-air a cloud of columbines descends; creation suddenly grows conscious of the presence of a battalion of pantaloons—mysteriously evolved, appearing from No-Whence and resolving into No-Whither. Out of the ground start legions of imps, crowds of fairies, armies of ballet-girls, myriads of masks. For some ten weeks the British theatre is a place of (so-called) pantomimes—a pandemonium of rallies and processions, of topical songs and mangled policemen and murderous butter-slides. And the odd thing is that pantomime (so-called) is scarcely pantomime at all. Between the two there are abysms of time and circumstance vast as night and deep as Tophet.

Pure pantomime is like poetry in Mr. Arnold's definition, in that it is a criticism of life; it is also like poetry, as outside Mr. Arnold's definition it really is, in that it is an expression of life as well—of life as it ought to be always, and as it sometimes (but too rarely and briefly) is. The scene is the Arcady of faëry; but that is a mere detail. The essential is that here, on the one hand, are Youth and Beauty and Love; and that there, on the other, are Age and Ugliness and Greed, the eternal adversaries. All the rest is a parable of life's progress. There is strife; for existence without battle were a mockery. There is sorrow and trial; for without these pleasure were impossible, and repose no luxury, but an infliction. Of course, too, the more gracious influences have long the worst of things; for Ugliness is desperate and strong, and Age is cunning and relentless, and between them Youth and Beauty are thrust to the wall. But the trial is only for a time. There are Higher Powers—conscious, interested, gifted—to interfere. To these the final victory of Age and Ugliness is a practical immorality too hideous to contemplate; and, at the very nick of time, when the game is up, and the defeat of Beauty and Youth, beloved of the gods, seems inevitable, they step in to the rescue. They may not alter time, nor obliterate what is already written in the roll of Fate; but they can modify circumstance and change the field of action, and they do. A touch of the Good Fairy's wand ("Good Fairy" is an Arcadian translation of "Higher Power"), and Amandus (otherwise Youth) becomes Harlequin, a creature of generous magic, invisible by his mask, irresistible in his bat, gifted with strange and brilliant capacities, a paladin of virtue and right; another, and Amanda (otherwise Beauty) trips forth an Appearance of love and delight, an Aspiration in short petticoats, a visible Ideal—enchanting, elusive, unapproachable save of him she has chosen for her own. As for the Ugly Suitor and the Greedy Sire, they are not transformed, they are only revealed. Their worldly disguise falls from them, and they appear in their quiddity; the one as Clown—bold, impudent, flagrant, a bundle of immoral qualities; the other as Pantaloon—a type of wicked and dishonourable old. And so, under changed conditions, and through fresh woods and pastures new, the old eternal contest is resumed and continued. The victory is Harlequin's, or where would be the moral? But it is only his while he proves himself worthy of his novel attributions. So long as he is himself, he and Columbine are happy as butterflies; they dance, they sport, they embrace, they make light of all the devices of wickedness. When he loses his bat, or puts his mask to improper uses, the Higher Powers grow angry, and he falls into the clutches of his ancient enemies, who fire him from cannons, and bray him in mortars, and do their best to make an end of him. He repents, however, and repenting escapes, and is restored to Columbine. This proves that repentance is a virtue, and youthful heedlessness a not unpardonable sin; also, that Beauty and Youth have only to behave themselves decently to have everything their own way. It must be noted that the moral lesson conveyed in the fate of Pantaloon and Clown is even stronger. These rascals would certainly succeed but for their innate rascality. They are so strong, so daring, so excessively wise, that Harlequin, for all his magic properties, is often at their mercy. There is no doubt that, if they were only not themselves, they might do as they would with him and Columbine too. But their original sinfulness is too much for them. They go out of ambition's way to gratify their evil passions; they cease from working at their main enterprise to pamper and indulge their worst appetites. They cannot look on a string of sausages but they must steal it; on a respectable trader plying his harmless calling without visiting him with burglary; on a minister of law and order without attempting him with greengrocery in the form of missiles and pokers heated terribly red. Theirs is an ideal life; and to many it is most desirable; there are instants in time when it becomes actual and practicable. Then, in a flash, the world we live in changes; the order of things is miraculously reversed; two neophytes, from ordinary mortality, are translated to a state of clownhood; and in an ecstasy of ease and opportunity all manner of excesses are committed and rejoiced in. But let these favoured Ones be warned. "Be virtuous, and you will be happy"; that is the true morality. Harlequin and Columbine are examples; Pantaloon and Clown are warnings. They prosper for a while; but they fail of their great intention, and go miserably to the dogs. Better (in the long run) is an eternity with Columbine than one mad, fleeting instant of triumph, however gaudy and full, with a red-hot-poker or a butter-slide.

Thus much for pure pantomime. In pantomime so-called there is little or nothing of this sweet and generous expression of the essentials of life and conduct. The opening—the drama proper, the preparation for the great allegory of the harlequinade—is but a chaos of legends and interests, a welter of ballets and processions, a wilderness of dances and topical songs and "comic business." The interest of the transformation-scene is centred, not on the four heroes, representatives of eternal principles, but on the trumpery accident of locality to which they have been conveyed.

From the harlequinade the essential idea of flight and pursuit has been completely eliminated; and nothing remains but a pageant of aimless ruffianism, tempered with double and triple hornpipes. Harlequin recks not of the right uses of his bat and his mask; he leaps through clock-faces and letter-boxes not to escape, not to frustrate the knavish tricks of his ancient enemies, but to show his agility; the few traditional gestures which are all that remains to him of the rich inheritance of Fun are entirely insignificant; he can no more mime an idea or an incident than he can dance like Taglioni or pose like Edmund Kean. As fatal is the change which has come upon his partner, the once enchanting Columbine. She is nothing save an accessory; she means no more than that there will be dancing anon. She is no longer Pantaloon's fair daughter, beloved of sweet Youth, desired by unscrupulous Ugliness, favoured of the powers of Good; her magic has departed, and she is only one member of a pas de deux. As for Clown and Pantaloon, their case is merely hopeless. They only represent a tradition of horseplay and dishonesty. They have taken to conversation, and the tin-whistle, and feats of tumbling and legerdemain, and the society of performing dogs. Sounding deeper gulfs of depravity, they have even ventured on a change of costume. Grimaldi's wear is not good enough for them; in strange frenzies of apparel, in debauches of paint, they essay pre-eminence, vilely conspicuous. Once, it is said, a Pantaloon (so called) appeared in the habit of Sir Peter Teazle—or it may have been Julius Cæsar—and three days afterwards broke his neck.

At Her Majesty's this year there has been some attempt at a resuscitation of the old tradition, some endeavour to reconstitute the old order and replace the Christmas entertainment on a basis of pure pantomime. Much remains to be done, of course; but there is evidence of a spirit reconstructive and truly conservative, and for so much, at least, we may be grateful. The particular piece of symbolism selected for illustration is that which deals with the adventures of Red Riding Hood. It is complicated—rather foolishly, we think, and quite needlessly—with the legend of Boy Blue; it is traversed and interrupted by a great number of ballets and processions; it suffers from such a tremendous anomaly as a grotesque hero—a Prince Charming turned antic and given over to laughter. But, after a fashion, it is a return to the ways of truth. Its theme is the conflict between good and evil. The drama, in spite of irrelevance and ornamentation, is fairly coherent, and in intention, if not in tone, is tolerably classic. It sets forth the loves of Red Riding Hood and Prince Pelerin; their mortification at the hands of Kantankoros the Usurper and the wizard Maligno; and their final victory by the aid of Sweetlove, the Good Fairy. In the end, there is a certain confusion of ideals, a certain unwarrantable infringement of the old canons. The transformation is correctly inspired, and brought about secundum artem; but we are under the impression that Boy Blue, who counts for nothing in the story, is made Harlequin to Red Riding Hood's Columbine, while (as it seemed to us) Prince Pelerin and his servant were told off as Clown and Pantaloon, and Boy Blue's own sweetheart, Rosie Posie, who counts for less than Boy Blue himself, was—or we are greatly mistaken—dragged neck and heels into the medley as Harlequina. If this is not the result of some horrible delusion, but is (as we are disposed to believe) a calm statement of cold, hard fact, it is evident that the reform of pantomime is not much more than begun. Pantomime is nothing if not moral, and where is the morality of this? Why a harlequinade at all, unless to continue and conclude the allegory conveyed in the opening? What is a Harlequina? and why, if Harlequina there must be (which we utterly deny), why not a Pantaloonetta also? why not a Clownina and a Columbinetto at once? After such impieties as these, the impiousness of an "American Facial Clown" (with a new make-up, a turn for conversation, and no acquaintance with first principles) is felt to be a matter almost trivial.

There are many pretty effects in Red Riding Hood—that there is no denying. For instance, there is a "Grand Ballet of the Months," which is brightly grouped and dressed, and in which Mlle. Sampietro displays prodigies of agility and skill. Then there is a parody of an operatic finale, which sounds and looks like Meyerbeer gone gorgeously idiotic. Prettiest and most attractive of all, however, are the Kate Greenaway choruses—one of Little Boy Blues, one of tiny Rosie Posies, one of Johnny Stouts. These last, in flat caps with tassels and yellow corduroys buttoned up tight under their armpits, their slates at their backs, a solemn quaintness their peculiar attribute, are simply irresistible. The Boy Blue is Miss Marie Williams; her costume is delightful, and she becomes it admirably. The Red Riding Hood is Miss Victoria Vokes; she acts, works, dances, sings with amazing spirit; her struggle with the Wolf and the Fox (his attendant for the nonce) is a thing to see. Mr. Fred Vokes is, of course, the Prince Pelerin: he is as clever, as nimble, as diverting as ever. His second is Mr. J. T. Powers. This actor, though his style suggests the music-halls a trifle too strongly, is, in his way, a capital pantomimist. He is an agile dancer; his somersaults are singularly quick and neat; the impudence, the cockneyism of his walk, his gestures, his deportment, are perfect. He counts for much in the briskness and brightness of the opening; and in the harlequinade he makes an admirable policeman.

For Her Majesty's, however, Mr. F. W. Green has tried to invent and compose a piece of pure pantomime. For Drury Lane Mr. Blanchard—who could an if he might do better than any—has had to write up to a set of spectacular effects. In Cinderella there is very little pantomime indeed. It includes some good masks and devices; there is a certain attempt at preserving the points of the story; the heroine is played by Miss Kate Vaughan, most graceful of presences, an artist in pantomime and the dance; Mr. Harry Payne is the clown—and Mr. Harry Payne, though he has taken to talking, and has otherwise departed from the traditions illustrated by his glorious family, is still one of the best clowns living; the harlequin, though his practice is unsound in some respects, is a good dancer and a real pantomimist, and has studied his personage in the right school. Having said thus much good of Cinderella, we have said all we may. The rest is gaudiness and mere processions, sans soul, sans sense, sans taste, sans everything. There are quantities of pageants, ballets, and spectacles; there is an abundance of elaborate sets and clever changes; there is as much scene-painter, stage-carpenter, ballet-master, property-man, and manager as possible, and as little dramatist and drama as can well be. We have a crowded hunting-scene which suggests, not Cinderella, but Drury Lane. We have a pageant of nursery heroes and heroines—Gulliver, Orson, Humpty-Dumpty, Miss Muffet, Boy Blue, Goosie Gander, Ali Baba, Aladdin, Prince Azor and the Beauty, Bluebeard, and all the rest of them—which seems inappropriate, and which, for all the lavishness with which it is produced, is certainly tedious and bewildering. We have a transformation scene which ignores the personages of the drama; transforms everything save that which needs transforming, begins with a ballet that is wholly irrelevant, and ends with an apotheosis that is wholly unintelligible. To us, indeed, Red Riding Hood at Her Majesty's is in every way far preferable to Cinderella at Drury Lane. It is, to begin with, something like a pantomime. Then, while it is not nearly so gaudy and sumptuous as its rival, it is far more original in idea and far prettier in effect. Lastly—if we except the dreadful comic song which is introduced by King Kantankoros—it steers clear of the music-halls. It gives us the Vokeses, the admirable buffoonery of Mr. Powers, the doublet and lace of Boy Blue; and then it stops. In Cinderella we have, it is true, the sprightliness of Dot Marie, the capital pantomime of M. Lupino, and the delightful presence and distinction of Miss Vaughan. But over it all is the trail of the Lion Comique; it is traversed by the tedious antics of Messrs. Herbert Campbell and Harry Nicholls. The vulgarity they contrive to import into their performance of the Wicked Sisters would go far to vitiate the best pantomime ever written.

RUSSIAN FINANCE.

THE Russian Government is slow in giving information. It not only denies all freedom to the press, but tries to maintain secrecy respecting all unpleasant social and political events occurring in the Empire, and even as regards the finances, as to which it professes to be in favour of the fullest publicity, its official information is always eleven or twelve months behindhand. A certain delay is inevitable, owing to the immense extent of the Empire, and the want of roads and railways throughout a great part of it. It must obviously take a considerable time to receive and check returns from Transcaucasia, Turkestan, and the banks of the Amoor. Furthermore, the objectionable practice of not closing the Budget at the end of the year causes delay. But when full allowance is made for all this, it is evident that the definitive Budget for 1882 might be in the hands of the public long before December 1883. However, the Controller of the Empire has at length issued his report upon it, and as the ability of Russia to pay its way is a matter of the highest political as well as financial interest, it is desirable carefully to consider this Report. At first sight the results of 1882 are highly satisfactory. There is still a considerable deficit, it is true, but, compared with the years immediately preceding, it is greatly reduced, and therefore suggests satisfactory progress. But a more careful examination leads us to modify the favourable opinion we at first form. The accumulation of deficits year after year since the outbreak of the war against Turkey, and the consequent discredit into which the country fell, induced the Government at the beginning of 1882 to make an earnest effort to reduce expenditure. The heads of the several departments were informed that they must cut down their estimates to the very lowest point; and, as they were thought not to have sufficiently attended to the order, the estimates when sent in were further reduced by the Council of Ministers. The efforts of the Government were not entirely successful, for supplementary estimates afterwards swelled the outlay. But it is fair to remember that in no country in the world where Budgets exist can the administration be carried on without supplementary estimates. If estimates are to be framed before the year begins, they can be worth anything only on condition that those who frame them limit their calculations to what can be foreseen. And as no one can foresee all that may happen during twelve months to come, it is inevitable that there should be supplementary estimates. It would be unfair, then, to object to the Russian Government that its efforts to retrench were futile. The really serious thing is that the supplementary estimates in Russia are usually out of all proportion too large. They have year after year a tendency to increase, suggesting that the desire to make things look pleasant at the beginning of the year leads to an undue cutting down of estimates, and the necessities of the case afterwards swell the supplementary estimates. However, the supplementary estimates in 1882 were kept fairly within bounds. And the efforts of the Government were further aided by the extraordinary cheapness of provisions. Russia is a purely agricultural country, and its prosperity therefore largely depends upon being able to find a good market for its produce abroad. In 1882, however, it could not find a good market. Prices of all kinds were exceptionally low, and therefore the farmers of Russia were unable to sell their crops advantageously. But the Government benefited from this misfortune to some extent, since the maintenance of the army cost less than it otherwise would have done.

The ordinary expenditure amounted to 71,116,000*l.*, estimating the rouble at 2*s.* for convenience sake; and the ordinary revenue amounted to 70,371,000*l.* There was thus a deficit of 745,000*l.*, or, roughly, three-quarters of a million sterling. In addition to the ordinary expenditure, there was an extraordinary expenditure of somewhat over 2½ millions sterling on account of the railways. And there was a promise to pay the Bank 5 millions sterling for the purpose of withdrawing and cancelling an equivalent amount of notes issued in part payment of the costs of the war against Turkey. Of course this latter sum could not be paid. The Controller of the Empire tells us that he was able to fulfil the promise to the Bank. But we know from the Bank Returns that no notes were cancelled in the year in question; and, therefore, we presume that what the Controller means is that he arranged with the Bank that the payment should be postponed. However, too much importance must not be attached to this point. The debt to the Bank was incurred in part defrayal of the costs of the war against Turkey, and wars of the kind are usually paid for in the first instance by loans. All, therefore, that can be said of the failure of the Russian Government to withdraw 5 millions of these notes is that the country has suffered very severely from the war, and its finances have not yet recovered sufficiently to enable it to begin to redeem the debt then incurred. So, again, regarding the extraordinary expenditure on the railways, nothing more can fairly be urged than that the Russian Government is opening up the communications of the Empire too quickly, considering the financial difficulties in which it is involved. If the resources of the Empire are to be developed, it is clear that railways must be constructed. And it is by no means objectionable that the means of constructing them should be borrowed. All that can fairly be urged is that the Government should be prudent in adding to its debt in this way. The real point to be considered by any one who would judge impartially of the financial condition of Russia is the ordinary expenditure. We have seen that great pressure was brought to bear upon the heads of the spending departments to keep down outlay in the year under review, and that the pressure was aided by the extraordinary cheapness of food and forage. But, nevertheless, we find that even in this year so favoured the attempt failed to establish an equilibrium between income and outlay. There was still an actual deficit of three-quarters of a million sterling. Independently of the cheapness of food and forage, the expenditure was kept down partly by postponing work upon the fortresses and upon the artillery, which has had to be resumed in 1883, and partly by reducing the number of men under arms, a mode of retrenchment which the interests of the Empire require should be carried much further. Compared with the previous year, there was a reduction in expenditure of over 5 millions sterling, and of this reduction by far the greater part was under the head of War. If, however, instead of comparing with the year immediately preceding, we go back to 1873, we find an increase in the expenditure of about 16½ millions sterling. Nearly the whole of this increase is in the charge for the debt and in the cost of the army. The charge for the debt in the ten years increased 99½ per cent., or practically doubled; while the ordinary cost of the army increased 16 per cent. In 1882, as we have seen, the cost of the army was greatly reduced; but in 1881 the ordinary cost of the army exceeded its cost in 1873 by as much as 29 per cent. The charge for the debt, as already stated, doubled in ten years. A portion of the new debt was incurred for the construction of railways and for other useful public works which tend to develop the resources of the country, and in the long run will add to its wealth. But the greater portion of the increase was due to the war against Turkey, and to the enormous increase in the army brought about since the rise of Germany to the first place in Europe. Last year the Ministry of the Interior cost only 6½ millions sterling; the Ministry of Public Instruction less than 3 millions sterling; the Ministry of Communications 1¼ million; and the Ministry of Justice not quite a quarter of a million sterling. The four Ministries together, in fact, cost less than 11½ millions sterling out of a total outlay of over 71 millions sterling. It is evident from these figures that, for the sake of maintaining a foreign policy beset with danger to itself, and of extending the limits of the Empire in all directions, the Russian Government is starving the regular Administration, is neglecting the education of the people, and, in short, is disregarding the true interests of its people. The charge of the debt alone exceeded 20 millions sterling in 1882, and the cost of the army and navy was about 23½ millions sterling, making together 43½ millions sterling out of a total outlay of 71 millions sterling, or about 61 per cent. And in these figures we are not including the cost of the Ministry of Finance, nor the extraordinary expenditure upon the army and navy. Neither are we including the cost to the country of the excessive inconvertible paper money. The war alone caused that paper money to be increased 40 millions sterling, and if there is to be a withdrawal of this increase, the debt must be increased at least as much.

The receipts, as already stated, amounted to 70,371,000*l.*, being an increase over the previous year of somewhat over 5 millions sterling. But the Controller of the Empire frankly admits that a large part of this increase is nominal. Owing to an increase in the duties upon spirits, and to an alteration in the mode of collecting those duties, a portion of the drink revenue for 1881 was not collected until 1882, so that the revenue of the latter year has benefited at the expense of the former. Again, the tobacco duty was raised at the beginning of 1883, and in anticipation of this the manufacture of tobacco was greatly increased in 1882, with the result that the latter year benefited at the expense of the year just ended. Thus, we find that 1882 benefited at the expense of the year immediately preceding, and of the year immediately following, and that thus a portion at least of the increased revenue was temporary, and due to artificial causes. Of the total increase, considerably more than one-half is due to the spirit duties. Since the outbreak of the war with Turkey, the spirit duties have been raised fully 40 per cent., and, as a necessary consequence, the yield has considerably increased. But, as was to have been expected, the consumption of spirits has been considerably checked. As drunkenness was formerly too prevalent in Russia, the ultimate consequence of enforced temperance will doubtless be beneficial to the country from every point of view; but the immediate effect threatens to be prejudicial to the exchequer. Hitherto, as used to be said of ourselves, the Russians have drunk themselves out of their difficulties. Compared with 1873, however, 1882 shows a decided falling off in the consumption of spirits. It would seem, therefore, that a further elevation of the duty would diminish the revenue. Yet, as the expenditure continues to increase, more revenue is required. The effect of constant and rapid increase of the Customs' duties in checking consumption is still more marked. 1882, it is true, showed a considerably larger Customs' revenue than 1881; but, on the other hand, it gave a smaller revenue than 1880, although there had been a considerable increase in the duties in the meantime. When it is recollected that a surtax of 10 per cent. was imposed upon all the Customs' duties in 1882, an increase of less than a million over 1881 and of 350,000*l.* over the average of 1880 and 1881 is exceedingly small, and shows that here also the limit of taxation has really been reached. Furthermore, the personal and the land taxes show a falling off. With the single exception of 1880, they yielded less in 1882 than in any of the previous nine years. The peasants are unable to pay the land-tax, as augmenting arrears prove; and they, as well as the working classes, are also falling into arrear on account of the Poll-tax. Indeed, their difficulties compelled the Government last year to grant concessions in regard to both these taxes. Altogether, in spite of the artificial increase in the spirit duties, the tobacco duties, and one or two other items, the evidence afforded by the Report of the Controller of the Empire goes to confirm what we have lately observed, that the limit of taxation in Russia is nearly, if not quite, reached. The most earnest efforts made by the Government fail, even for a single year, to keep the expenditure down to the level of revenue. And as soon as pressure is relaxed, temporary retrenchment is followed by increased outlay, while additions to taxation check consumption, and the most important taxes unaltered give a diminishing yield.

REVIEWS.

MATERIALS FOR THE HISTORY OF THOMAS BECKET.—VOL. VI.*

THIS volume of Materials for the History of Thomas Becket—the sixth volume of the whole collection, the second of the Epistolæ—has no introduction beyond a short note explanatory of the appearance of an index at the end. As there is a third volume of the Epistolæ to come, and yet another of biography, the place chosen for the index is certainly a strange one. But we learn that it is the place assigned to it by the late editor, Canon Robertson, who was attacked by a sudden and fatal illness as the last sheet was passing through the press. What were his reasons for so placing the index can only be conjectured; but it is suggested that, conscious of failing strength, and apprehending that the remainder of the work would be left for others to finish, he desired to mark off, as by a distinct boundary, that part of the work which he had executed with his own hand. Whatever may have been his motive, it was right to respect his arrangement, and to leave his index in the place he chose for it. But we trust that the editors of the volumes now in preparation will not therefore treat this part of the work as entirely distinct. It will be intolerable to have two volumes of the Epistolæ indexed together with four volumes of Lives, while the last volume of Epistolæ has an index to itself, or in common with the last volume of biography. Either there must be a common index to the whole eight volumes, or the three volumes of letters must have an index of their own. Perhaps it would be well to have both; at any rate, the present index is inadequate as a guide through the mazes of the correspondence. Under the names of the writers we ought to have had lists of their Epistolæ, so that one could easily refer to a letter by any given writer, as Herbert of Bosham, or John of Salisbury. Under the head "Herbert of Bosham" we do indeed find a reference to "letters written in the Archbishop's name" in the fifth volume. But there are in the present volume three letters by Herbert in the Archbishop's name, four in the name of other people, and one in his own, to which no reference is given. If we want to pick out his letters, or those of the Archbishop himself, or of John of Salisbury, from among the mass, we have to go through the table of contents, and there we meet constantly with that detestable form "Idem ad eundem," which ought by this time to be abolished. In the case of Ep. ccccviii. this has led to an error, the letter referred to being not from Thomas, the "Idem" in question, but from Pope Alexander. There is also an error in the entry in the index:—"Eudes, Count of Brittany . . . accuses Henry of having seduced his sister." It was the daughter of Eudes—"filiam ejus virginem, quam illi pacis obsidem dederat"—by an (illegitimate) half-sister of Henry's mother. We will add the expression of a hope that the editor of the forthcoming volume will be a little more liberal of help in the way of side-notes, of which, as we have observed in a former article, Canon Robertson was very chary. In making these remarks, we have no wish to depreciate the work of the late editor, to whom all students of twelfth-century history and literature owe a deep debt for his having brought into order the hitherto confused and unintelligibly-arranged mass of letters relative to the great controversy between the King and the Archbishop, and whose death before the completion of his valuable labours all must regret. We only suggest that in a few points of detail his plan might be improved upon.

* Materials for the History of Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury (Canonized by Pope Alexander III., A.D. 1173). Edited by James Craigie Robertson, M.A., Canon of Canterbury. Vol. VI. (Epistles CCXXVII.–DXXX.) Published by the Authority of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, under the Direction of the Master of the Rolls. London: Longmans & Co.; Trübner & Co. Oxford: Parker & Co. Cambridge: Macmillan & Co. Edinburgh: A. & C. Black; Douglas & Foulis. Dublin: Thom & Co. 1882.

The present portion of the correspondence opens about the middle of 1166 with two letters from John of Salisbury, then still in exile on the Continent, to Master Radulf Niger of Poitiers—in plain English, Ralf Black—written shortly after the famous storm of excommunications at Vézelay. It is evident that Radulf had observed that the excommunicates were not generally shunned as they should be—here the immortal quotation from the Jackdaw of Rheims will obtrude itself upon the memory, but we forbear. John of Salisbury takes the matter calmly:—

Quod illi non evitantur quos dominus Cantuariensis denuntiavit excommunicatos, non tam ipsum lædit quam illos qui eis communicant.

In his heart John evidently regretted that the Archbishop had taken such violent action, and he is careful to aver that he had nothing to do with it:—

Ego scio, quod neque in ferenda sententia præsens fui, neque de consilio meo aut de conscientia lata est. Et necdum, Deo teste, quosdam eorum qui notati sunt novi, neque, quod meminerim, vidi.

Then he half promises to use his influence with the Archbishop in favour of one of the excommunicated Royal ministers, Richard of Ilchester, Archdeacon of Poitiers; and in the meanwhile he advises his correspondent upon the delicate question of intercourse with the Archdeacon. The perfect man, he lays down, has no intercourse with the excommunicate, even in verbi commercio, save it be to denounce his fault, much less in mensa, vel in ecclesia et similibus. But even Elisha the prophet did, out of regard for King Jehoshaphat, reveal the word of the Lord to the idolatrous King of Israel. And then there is the case of Naaman in the house of Rimmon, whence it is manifest "quatenus imperfectos urget interdum reverentia publicæ potestatis." From all which the charitable conclusion is deduced that Radulf Niger may hold intercourse with his Archdeacon in the hope of influencing him for good. The same spiritual precedents, with much the same reasoning, reappear in a similar letter of counsel to the celebrated Parisian professor of canon and civil law, Gerard Pucelle, on the subject of his sojourn at Cologne, one of the strongholds of Frederick Barbarossa's Antipope. Here the case of Naaman is cited rather more doubtfully. Even Naaman, it is observed, felt the necessity of obtaining the Prophet's pardon and prayers beforehand—"Si ergo tantum timuit gentilis, ignarus legis, quantum timere debet philosophus Christianus, doctor legis?" Nevertheless John concludes in favour of his friend's conduct, which had been much discussed, "multis accusantibus, excusantibus paucis":—

Meum itaque consilium est et desiderium, ut inter schismaticos et hæreticos fidem prædictis et pacem, ea sapientia et moderatione quæ prosit ecclesiæ, in cujus fortasse utilitate et salute personam vestram Dominus ad hos barbaros destinavit.

But the subsequent history of Gerard Pucelle goes to prove how dangerous it is to bow down in the house of Rimmon. The result of Gerard's taking up his abode in the schismatical city of Cologne was that he accepted a benefice from the schismatics, and had much ado to put himself right again with the Pope, whose absolution he only obtained on condition of pronouncing a formal condemnation of the schism and giving up the benefice. Thomas of Canterbury himself, though he exerted his influence with the Pope in favour of Gerard Pucelle, writes a stern refusal to the Bishop of Worcester, who after the renewed fulmination of excommunications on Palm Sunday and Ascension Day, 1169, had begged permission "excommunicatis communicare." The letter is a fine piece of fiery rhetoric, and would win our admiration were it not for the remembrance of what, to a modern mind, seems the general unreasonableness of Thomas's proceedings.

On the lay side of the dispute, however, unreasonableness came out in cruel and savage action. Sympathy with King Henry is seriously checked when we are reminded, by a letter from the Archbishop to the Pope, how, by an act of despotism worthy of any Oriental prince, the King drove into exile all the kin of Thomas, clerk and layman, women and children, small and great. Many, writes the Archbishop, have died in exile; many still await the mercy of God, in hunger and thirst, in cold and nakedness. In another letter, from a "quidam amicus," we get the well-known picture of Henry in one of his fits of rage—"solito furore successus"—tearing off his garments, pulling the silk coverlet from his bed, and sitting down and gnawing the straw. The writer goes on to describe the curious incident of the King stopping some Templars who were about to salute Richard of Ilchester, "dicens nolle eos excommunicato osculum dare"—a sign that excommunication was not altogether ineffective. It is unpleasant to read in the next letter how a lad who was intercepted with Papal letters had his eyes nearly gouged out to make him confess from whom he received the papers—"in arcto fuisse positum, digitis ad oculos eruendos appositis usque ad effusionem sanguinis, et aqua calida per os injecta, donec confiteretur se litteras a magistro Heriberto [Herbert of Bosham] accepisse." Further on in the same year, 1166, John of Salisbury, commenting on the silence of his correspondents in England, infers that they are so oppressed that they dare no longer even complain; they are in the case of schoolboys, whose masters flog them first into crying and then into silence. It is touching to see that when John of Salisbury cast about for a parallel to the extreme tyranny of King Henry, it was evidently in his own schoolmasters that he found it.

There are many letters of great interest and importance, ranging over the period from John of Oxford's mission at Rome to the excommunication of the Bishop of London and others in 1169. The much-discussed Papal letter authorizing the Archbishop of York to crown King Henry's son will of course attract the reader's attention. It is here assigned to the date of June 17, 1167, a time when the Pope was in the utmost distress from the siege of Rome by the Emperor, and was therefore probably anxious to retain King Henry's friendship at almost any price. In a note the late editor has observed that the doubts suggested by the absence of the letter from the Vatican MS. "seem to be overpowered by the authority of other MSS." At any rate Lingard went too far in his dogmatic assertion, "It is a manifest forgery." How closely interwoven were the fortunes of the King and the Archbishop with those of the Pope and the Emperor has been set forth by Milman in a passage which will readily recur to the mind on glancing over these letters. We find John of Salisbury inquiring of Gerard Pucelle, "an aliquid postea certum acceperitis de expeditione imperatoris, et vestro Coloniensi" (i.e. Reginald, the schismatical Archbishop of Cologne). We read the English Archbishop's rejoicings over the discomfiture, as yet only known by rumour, of the ex-princeps—so he styles Frederick—who in the hour of his triumph at Rome has seen his host smitten down by the pestilence. John of Salisbury utters a prayer that He who has repulsed "the Teutonic tyrant" in confusion from the City—"ab Urbe"—will of His grace lead back the King of the English into the right way. Again and again the writers revert to this destruction of Frederick Barbarossa's army by the Roman pestilence, a destruction which impressed men in those days as the destruction of Napoleon's Grand Army by the Russian winter impressed men within our own century. The fate of "Fredericus ex-Augustus," cast down from his high estate, "miser, sed nulli miserabilis," is held up as a warning to King Henry; the Scriptural parallel of Sennacherib is of course frequently cited; and when in 1169 it is rumoured that "the Teutonic tyrant" has the gout, the image with the clay feet which Nebuchadnezzar saw in his dream at once suggests itself to John of Salisbury's memory. The epithet "ex-Augustus" applied to Frederick occurs not infrequently; but the Antipapa, whom one would expect to find in company with the ex-Augustus, does not, as far as we have seen, appear under that name. "Hæresiarcha Cremensis" is John of Salisbury's description of the Antipope Guy of Crema. It is worth noting that the title Rex Angliæ, which later on was formally adopted by King John, was already in use, though it had not yet driven out the older style of Rex Anglorum. Thomas, who must have been familiar with points of etiquette, seems to use either form indifferently. The term ecclesia Anglicana, which in the next century was to appear in the Great Charter, occurs perpetually, though the ecclesia Anglorum known to Pope Gregory and Bæda is also still to be found. On one point we crave for more light. John of Salisbury, still watching with eager interest the waning fortunes of the schismaticus ex-Augustus, and predicting that all Frederick's "accomplices"—the whole Imperialist or Ghibelin party, in fact—will fall with him, draws an illustration from the rithmachia:—

Nam et in rithmachia ludentium hoc indicat jocus, ubi quoticns auferlur pyramis intercepta, totiens concidunt latera ejus.

Ducange, as the editorial note tells us, has explained that rythmachia means modulorum seu numerorum certamen, and has referred the inquirer to a chapter of John of Salisbury's Polycraticus, "where, however, neither the word, nor any description of the game answering to that in the text, is to be found." Something akin to the building of card-houses would seem to be nearer the mark. We trust that some searcher into antiquity may yet be able to throw light upon the nature of the jocose game of rith- machia, with which—we would fain indulge the fancy—the youthful John of Salisbury may have solaced such moments as he could snatch from the domination of tyrant schoolmasters.

Our last quotation shall be from St. Thomas of Canterbury himself, for the sake of a curious personal allusion which might easily escape the reader if it were not pointed out to him by the editor. King David has uttered a complaint that the drunkards made songs upon him, or, as the Vulgate has it, "in me psallebant qui bibebant vinum." This text Thomas, complaining to Cardinal Otho of his opponents among the bishops, applies to himself, varying it thus—"psallit in nos etiam qui non bibit vinum." At first this seems pointless; but in a note Canon Robertson has suggested the probable allusion. The Archbishop's especial antipathy, Gilbert Foliot, Bishop of London, was a vegetarian and a total abstainer—"vinum vel carnes non gustans," says William Fitzstephen. Hence the sting of "psallit in nos qui non bibit vinum." The modern reader, unless he happens to be familiar with the mediæval tone of thought, will probably be inclined to censure this fashion of dealing with Scripture as flippant and irreverent for an archbishop and an aspirant to saintship and martyrdom, more especially as there are peculiarly solemn associations connected with the Psalm thus, one may almost say, travestied; and yet in this censure he would be unjust. The devout man of mediæval times was, without a thought of irreverence, as free in his handling of Scriptural phrases and his twisting of texts to fit his own circumstances as ever was the Puritan of later days. The apparent irreverence in both cases springs from that thorough belief in the Bible and in themselves combined which characterized alike the mediæval and the Puritan saint.

IT is not enough that a novelist should conceive a powerful situation. Whether he succeeds or not in approaching the perfect type must, in a great measure, depend upon the means by which his characters are developed and the chain of events that lead up to the situation put together. If the means he uses are such as to violate probability, or to make us feel out of sympathy with those of his creations for whom the narration necessarily demands our sympathy and interest, then the story, however good the situation, fails as a whole. This sympathy need not necessarily be a sympathy of approbation; it may be merely a sympathy of comprehension, to borrow De Quincey's distinction. We must be made to understand and feel with a character; for without such comprehension, whether of hero or villain, our interest in the character is forfeited. This seems the fault of John Herring, otherwise a very well-told story. The main situation is excellent, the style is rapid and vigorous throughout, while the reflections and comments are full of shrewdness and humour; but the failure in the development of the story is pronounced, and cannot be completely condoned by any of the other virtues which the book possesses in so high a degree. Our sympathy of comprehension is forfeited in both hero and heroine. Both are made when the strain of the plot is upon them to act in such a way that, put ourselves as we will in their places and characters, we cannot conceive the conduct they variously pursue as possible. But before we attempt to justify such a view of the story, let us express our thanks to the author of John Herring for so pleasant a book. Those who agree with the view stated above, and wish the book better, cannot but at the same time be delighted with the wit of the comments, the reality and charm of the dialogue, and the correctness of the descriptions. No one who takes up John Herring will be likely to lay it aside unread, and even the most inveterate skipper will find in it a spell to chain his wandering eyes.

Let us try to roughly condense the long series of stirring incidents set forth in John Herring. There was an old man named Cobbledick (of whom more hereafter) who lived with his daughter inside a cromlech called the Giant's Table on Dartmoor. The girl slept inside, but the old man retired at night to a cider-cask outside, because his dead wife haunted him if he slept within. The cask was tied to one of the upright stones of the cromlech. On the night which begins the story, the cask was being rocked from side to side so as to woo sleep to the eyes of old Cobbledick. Unfortunately, Miss Cobbledick rocked too hard. The cask broke its moorings and went careering down the slope of Dartmoor, spilling old Cobbledick as it went. Still more unfortunately, it took the course of the coach-road from Okehampton, which crossed the moor near the cromlech, and careering along it met a post-chaise with two horses—"leaping at them like a tiger at the throat of its prey," as our author puts it. The coach is, of course, upset, and of course there is some one killed. Who better than the heroine's father? The daughter is thus left to the protection of the third occupant of the carriage, who is naturally a total stranger—a mere fellow-traveller—who has shared the hire of the carriage in the way people used to do fifty years ago, when the event took place. Here John Herring and heroine Mirelle are thus left on the moor together; but it is a long while yet before they will be able to get into the requisite positions of marriage, murder, and suicide. Mirelle, it may be observed at once, is a girl of nineteen; her father's name was Strange, but she prefers the more euphonious appellation of the Countess Garcia de Cantalejo. This was her mother's name, who had married Mr. Strange, a Brazilian diamond merchant, for his money. Soon after her marriage she had brought her little daughter to Paris to educate her and to escape from Mr. Strange, who had unpardonably insulted his wife's dignity by marrying her. The mother lived in the great world of Paris on Mr. Strange's handsome remittances; the daughter was brought up at the Convent of the Sacré Cœur. She did not see much of her mother, but still enough to imbibe the most exalted notions of her own nobility of birth. The result of the good sisters' teachings and her mother's example was to make her a fervent Roman Catholic, firmly believing that her mother was a saint and her father a heretic and a vulgar monster who had taken advantage of her mother's poverty, but that she, at any rate, inherited nothing in the way of race on her father's side. When Mirelle's mother died, her father resolved to come home and settle in England. He went to Paris, took his daughter out of the convent, and brought her to Falmouth. He was on his way to London when the accident occurred. West Wyke was the only house near the scene of the accident—a tumble-down old manor house belonging to the Battishills, a decayed county family. Here the dead man was carried, and here Mirelle and John Herring took shelter. As Mirelle had taken it into her head that John Herring was a commercial traveller, she considered it necessary to treat him with great rudeness, and to regard his protection of her as almost an insult. John Herring nevertheless persevered in his kindness, which was soon to take a warmer colour, and did everything in his power to help Mirelle. He arranged all her affairs, first rescuing the baggage from the hands of old Cobbledick, who was found prowling among the débris of the post-chaise. Nothing, however, seemed lost. The will was of course in Mr. Strange's desk. It had been made some years before, and constituted a certain Mr. Trampleasure guardian and trustee of Mirelle till she reached the age of twenty-three. When old Squire Battishill and John Herring discovered this they were thunderstruck, for Trampleasure was a rascally attorney of the most approved type of fiction. He had cheated poor Mr. Battishill almost out of his last penny, and, indeed, the whole of Cornwall and Devon rang with his malpractices. It was pretty certain that Mr. Trampleasure would sink all his ward's money in some bubble mining company such as he delighted to finance. Even if John Herring had wanted to burn the will—and we do not feel sure that he did not—he could not have done so, for as it lay on the table in walked Mr. Trampleasure junior and picked it up. There was therefore no help for it, and Mirelle and her six thousand pounds had to be handed over to Mr. Trampleasure. This was not very pleasant for Mirelle with her high-born feelings, for the Trampleasures were hardly a polished family. Mr. Trampleasure senior was noisy, vulgar, and familiar; Mr. Trampleasure junior's talk was of barmaids; Mrs. Trampleasure was fond of playfully addressing her husband as Mr. Tram; while the girl Orange, though handsome and not aggressively ill-bred, was jealous and vindictive. Though John Herring had pressing business at Exeter, he yet waited at West Wyke and kindly took the trouble to convey Mirelle to the Trampleasures at Launceston. For this Mirelle did not thank him, because, as she gracefully expressed it on one occasion, she thought he was a commis voyageur. When he went unthanked away, he put a card into her hand telling her she might always count on his help. She thought he was offering her an advertisement of his business, and received it accordingly. When he had gone Mirelle looked at it, and found he was an officer in a regiment that had served with great distinction at Waterloo. Like Cadsby after he had snubbed the Duke in Mr. Du Maurier's picture, she felt annoyed at this. Mirelle has not been long at Launceston before she begins to fall in love with a certain Captain Trecarrel, who is engaged to marry Miss Orange Trampleasure. This worthy is a blue-eyed captain of militia and a Roman Catholic of old Cornish family, but of very small means. Captain Trecarrel must marry money, and though he sees he has made a conquest of Mirelle, he thinks Miss Orange the safer investment on the whole. John Herring, now over head and ears in love with Mirelle, goes back to West Wyke, and finds that, in helping Mr. Battishill and his daughter Cicely, he will have a fine chance of extending his sphere of usefulness. He resolves to help them; but the task is a difficult one, for Mr. Trampleasure has mortgages on the whole estate, and Mr. Battishill's affairs are in utter confusion. There seems no possibility of saving the estate. It must go, as Trampleasure seems determined to foreclose.

We must now explain the place occupied by the Cobbledicks in the story. Grizzley, the father, and Joyce, the daughter, are represented as complete savages, survivals of neolithic man, who maintain to our day all the manners, habits of thought, and forms of belief which characterized him. The Cobbledicks themselves have a sense of property, and of this they are very proud, as some of their cousins on the moor have not reached this pitch of enlightenment. The author in his preface assures us positively that such people existed in Devonshire till a few years ago. As we are thus denied the opportunity of doubting their existence, we can only humbly remark that they and their manners would look less strange in a novel of Polynesian life. We have, however, no desire to bandy probabilities with the author of John Herring, and at any rate the Cobbledicks are excellent vehicles for a good deal of quiet irony at the expense of the antiquarians. The purpose for which the Cobbledicks are introduced into the story becomes evident when the girl Joyce, who had attached herself to John Herring (for reasons too long to be given here), shows him where to find a certain tin box—part of Mr. Strange's luggage—which old Grizzley had picked up on the night of the accident and buried inside the cromlech. This puts Mr. John Herring into a difficulty, and he resolves to erect a private and secret Court of Chancery within his own breast, and to nominate himself Mirelle's guardian. That his action is not a right one, the author recognizes by making John Herring's miseries turn on this event; but the folly and want of moral sense in what he does cannot be artistically set right thus, because his action is quite unintelligible, and inconsistent with his character. No man of sense and honour, as Herring is represented, could have acted the fool's part he acts. If he acted from passion his course might possibly be understood; but he does not, he deliberates profoundly. It may be asked, what was he to do? Certainly not what he did do. Are there not courts of law; or could he not have lodged the contents of the box in the hands of some third person? But whether a good answer can be at once found or not does not matter; that is the author's business. If he could not find a satisfactory way out of the difficulty, he should not have created the situation in the way he has. Though it is impossible to take much interest in John Herring himself after he has proved of so unreal a nature, the story still continues full of interesting events. These we will leave our readers to find out for themselves.

It is needless to wish John Herring success, for that is secured to any work by the author of Mehalah. Still we do so, and wish further that it may not be long before he gives to the world another West of England Romance.

THE PARISH OF TAXWOOD.*

DR. MACDUFF tells a good story of Dr. Chalmers, "the simplicity of whose character was out of accord with the rush and torrent of his magnificent verbiage." On one occasion the great orator had been invited to address a primitive prayer-meeting in a remote Highland parish. The parochial minister begged as a personal favour that the distinguished visitor would speak down to the intelligence of his flock, and use only the simplest words and sentences. Chalmers good-naturedly assented, and began with this easy and unstudied sentence:—"My friends, I have been specially asked, in addressing you to-night, to avoid the technical nomenclature of scholastic theology." So when in one of the first paragraphs of Dr. Macduff's preface we find him talk of "excogitating the series" of papers, we had terrible forebodings of a Scottish formality of pulpit style, with a Homeric interspersion of such sonorous words as the "Mesopotamia" which charmed a venerable parishioner when listening to a candidate for a cure. We are glad to say that we have been most agreeably disappointed. Dr. Macduff has written a delightful little volume, as true to the life as it is picturesque in its subjects. We fancy that we can recognize something of its scenes and scenery, whether they be actually laid in "the presbytery of Forglen" or no; and we are sure, if we may trust early reminiscences, that the types which he illustrates are singularly faithful. Books of the kind, when they are pleasantly and simply written, have a strange fascination, at all events for Scotchmen. We like to refresh our memories of former days by references to such genuinely Scotch authors as "Christopher North" or the late Dr. Norman McLeod. As devoted to the fatherland as Walter Scott, they loved the humbler classes of their fellow-countrymen, and not a few of their descriptions hold a place in our affections with the interior of the Mucklebackit's cottage in The Antiquary, or with The Cotter's Saturday Night. We shall be inclined to add this unpretentious little volume to the standard authorities on these favourite subjects. In dwelling on the memories of the parish of Taxwood, though it strikes us that the name is not very happily chosen, Dr. Macduff translates us back to an earlier world which is being left behind by modern innovations. It comes to us with a savour of the lavender and strong-smelling herbs which the old women of the parish, in their scarlet cloaks and "mutches"—the mutch, we may say, was an old-fashioned and stiffly-starched cap—used to carry to the kirk by way of anti-soporifics. These ancient matrons, as Dr. Macduff reminds us, used to sit literally at the feet of the minister, and make themselves comfortable on the pulpit steps. He describes the golden age of a fortunate and highly favoured parish, when the railways as yet had hardly broken ground, and where the local and self-concentrated life had still an intense local vitality. The people of Taxwood were fortunate in a "laird" who lived peaceably at home and spent his rental generously among his tenants and neighbours. They were fortunate in a schoolmaster who cherished the lambs of the flock, and who kept them by kindness fairly within bounds when their youthful spirits threatened to become exuberant. They were fortunate in a clergyman who to his spiritual gifts united a considerable share of cultivation with much of the harmless worldly wisdom of the serpent. And they were doubly fortunate in the presence of the minister's sister, who laid everything, from his poultry-yard to his purse, under contribution for her charities, and who went about the homes of the parish like a ministering angel. Unpretending as the pictures may be, to paint those worthy people to the life demands no little shrewdness of observation, considerable power of mental analysis, with a combination of rarer faculties. And in the pictures we have quaint drollery as well as kindly satire; and, while each has some fascination of its own, one at least is wonderfully pathetic.

The minister is, of course, the most prominent figure. As we know nothing of the personal history of Dr. Macduff we cannot say whether there is any self-portraiture in it. If we suspect as much, it is only because we happen to remember that the Doctor has written the romantic Story of a Shell; and Mr. Erskine, of Taxwood, is described as possessing a remarkable collection of shells and sea treasures. Once mounted on that favourite hobby of his he was apt to give it the rein, till, "if it were possible that he could ever be voted a bore, it was when a dull phlegmatic company were gathered round the mahogany cabinet," and when he assumed that his listeners were interested like himself. Be that as it may, the Reverend Mr. Erskine was a type of the cultivated Scotch clergyman of the higher class. He had some small means of his own, so that he could indulge in a well-selected library and his sister's calls on his purse could be answered conveniently and promptly. He had the gift of speaking straight to the hearts of his flock, and he brought discretion as well as earnestness to the round of his parochial visitations. But after all, the best of clergymen, however effectively drawn, must be of a somewhat commonplace character. He can be of no particular age or country. A more original type, because it is more strictly Scottish, is the "minister's man." As Dr. Macduff remarks in some of those formal sentences which, notwithstanding prognostications from the preface, are the exception, and not the rule, "This satellite in Scottish manse life occupies a position altogether unique. He is worth little if he does not bulk as an important personage; his importance expanding in compound ratio with advancing years of service." In the first place, he must be of unimpeachable character. He must be an accomplished gardener and a good practical farmer. He must be a capable groom and coachman. And, above all, he must have a certain readiness of diplomatic tact, since he is constantly in relation with members of the congregation who come in search of the minister when the minister may be otherwise engaged. In these circumstances it is hardly in human nature that the man should not strive to become the master. And nothing is more significant of the moral strength of Mr. Erskine than the fact that Dan MacGlashan came to acknowledge his supremacy, although Dan's self-sufficiency and self-assurance were his besetting sins; and though their relations had necessarily begun in his instructing the minister in farming. There is an excellent sketch of Dan doing the honours of the manse, or at all events of its cartsheds and stables, when a deputation of clergymen from the adjoining parishes came for the annual school-examination. Scarcely less important than the minister's factotum was the schoolmaster. Indeed in Scotland the schoolmaster very frequently is, or at least was, a minister who had missed parochial preferment by some lack of oratorical gifts or readiness. When his humiliation as a "stickit stibbler" had been forgotten—vide for an explanation of the phrase the story of Dominie Sampson in Guy Mannering—he naturally assumed a double portion of self-importance. And, like Mr. McInlay, the teacher of Taxwood, he usually filled a plurality of offices, for which he was pretty sure to be exceptionally well suited, as they conveniently eked out his scanty salary. Thus Mr. McInlay was clerk of the sessions, in which capacity his services were invaluable. But he scarcely figured to so much advantage as precentor or leader of the sacred melodies. He had neither voice nor ear, but, on the other hand, he had chronic attacks of bronchitis. And though the 5*l.* of income attached to the office was of importance to him, and though he was universally beloved and appreciated even by his victims, it became necessary at last to suggest his resignation, when the laird had to charge himself with the delicate duty.

We said that there was a good deal of pathos in the sketches, and nothing is more prettily pathetic than the story of the relations of the laird with the little child of his gardener. That it is one of the actual reminiscences of the author we cannot doubt for a moment. The laird had lost his only son and heir, and, although a couple of daughters were left to console him, yet he had a general craving for affection, and was excessively fond of children. The gardener's little daughter had stolen insensibly into his heart. Neither the old man nor the infant had any consciousness of the social distance between them, and Daisy would slip her tiny hand into his, and become his companion in his strolls among the fruit-trees and flower-beds. The laird loved his dogs, and his dogs loved their master; but they were far more attached to the little girl. It is a delightful touch of natural sentiment, and there is a charming little engraving illustrative of it, in the description of the child's friendship with the most crossgrained member of the kennel. "'Surly' was dull, sulky, vicious, unprepossessing, with clear eyes and hideously underhung," and he even kept his indulgent master at a distance. Like the cynical philosopher whom he resembled in character, Surly lived in a tub, though under compulsion, and nobody dared come within the compass of his chain. But Daisy had cast her innocent spells over him, so that she "was allowed every imaginable liberty, hugging him by the neck, getting inside his huge tub of a domicile (a new, but very faithful, rendering of 'Beauty and the Beast'), the bairn in child-delight bidding the laird defiance from her house of refuge." As the best of us are so often cut off and garnered young, poor Daisy sickens and dies. During her lingering illness the laird is indefatigable in his attentions to his favourite, bringing her flowers and hot-house grapes by way of offerings of sympathy. He has no heart to follow the funeral train further than the gate of the burial-ground; and "not long after a tombstone, with a slab of white marble inserted, was erected over a tiny grave. There was no name given; only—with the touching Bible words beneath—

TO A LOVED, LOVELY, AND LOVING CHILD,

And was unto him as a daughter."

Next to the schoolmaster and the minister's man, nothing is more graphic than the sketches of some of the "Mothers in Israel" of the parish. These at least are photographed from the life, for we are told that the heads illustrating the text are striking resemblances, as we can easily believe. Those old ladies had strong individualities of their own, with a quaint and ingenuous habit of expressing themselves. Anecdotes torn away from their context are seldom telling; and yet we may venture to repeat one or two. One of these old women was speaking to the author of a clergyman who had been famous in her younger days. She was expatiating on the richness of his ministerial gifts, and on the figure he made in memorable appearances when he filled the pulpit of Taxwood. The description, graphic throughout, wound up as follows:—"And he was vicious at a' times, but espaicially at the saiicraments." While another of a softer spirit expressed herself unconsciously almost like Sir Walter Scott, when, after laying poor John Ballantyne in the Greyfriars Churchyard, he said that thenceforth the sunshine could never seem so bright to him as before. "The first time," said Jenny, "that I cam' out o' my cottage-door, I thocht the grass was nae langer green, the sky nae langer blue, and the sun nae langer gowd. I thocht a' about me was the colour o' ashes." And we think we have said enough to send our readers to a book which, while showing unusual powers of observation, is written with equal simplicity and deep earnestness of feeling.

IN THE COMPANY'S SERVICE.*

THE Indian Mutiny has supplied materials for more than one tolerable novel and the mine is not yet exhausted. But it is perhaps a defect in the story now before us that the scene is laid in a Presidency which was never involved in the general conflagration. The Bombay army, with partial exceptions, did not swell the ranks of the insurgents at Delhi or elsewhere; and the treasuries of Deccan collectorates were not looted, nor had the collectors, as Mr. Bright would put it, to flee for their lives. This deprives the author of the opportunity of dealing with rebellion on a wide scale, or of describing, for instance, the heroism and endurance which practically converted frail palisades and a crumbling Residency into a first-class fortress, proof against all assaults. Still there is no absolute lack of striking episodes and hairbreadth escapes; while accuracy of detail about the station, the fort, the cantonment, and the social life of their residents always imparts liveliness to the narrative. The untravelled Englishman is not ensnared, the Anglo-Indian expert is not offended by misleading dates and titles, by mangled names, or by the union of incompatible functions in a caricature of one and the same official. Then it is always gratifying to have a faithful picture of a training institution that has long got beyond the possibility of revolution, improvement, or decay. We do not recollect any story in which the life of a cadet of the East India Company at Addiscombe has been so well told, since the Peregrine Pultuney of the late Sir John Kaye. The career of half a dozen young men at what was once the residence of Lord Liverpool, and then for years became the nursery of captains and politicians, is graphically told. The mixture of school life and military discipline, the competition for the Engineers and the Artillery, in which mathematics and drawing counted for much and the classics for little; where to "get the Engineers" was the grand object of the runners in the race; the irregularities and their penal consequences; the half-yearly examination and parade of acquirement, and the address of the Chairman of the Court of Directors, made half in warning and half in encouragement, could only have been touched on by a man who retained a clear recollection of his early days, and could recall facts without trusting too much on imagination to supply an hiatus. Nor can we doubt that several of the more prominent characters in the tale are sketched from life. The Chairman of the Court, who represented, not the military but the naval element of that body, will easily be recognized. The Lieutenant-Governor of the seminary, the public examiner, the portly sergeant, and Lady Monk, with her brocade and feathers and her pink notes of invitation, are no lay figures. We think the author rather hard on a certain functionary of the India Office, now deceased, who figured on field days, and who is described as a mixture of pomposity and insolence, with the address and manners of a beadle. But the Addiscombe chapter, with its incidental and not incorrect allusions to Haileybury, revives two places which, with all their faults, their "anomalous" and "illogical" and "indefensible" positions, sent forth the soldiers and the civilians who founded and consolidated that Empire of which, by the latest and most enlightened teaching, the average British householder is led to think he ought to be half ashamed.

But the life in cadets' quarters is very soon exchanged for the bungalow and the cantonments of the Western Presidency of India. The principal characters in the story are naturally these same cadets developed into soldiers of the Artillery and the Line. Alan Douglas is one of a large family, who, but for the patronage of a judicious and friendly Director, would have gone into the Church. David Robertson is an eccentric and cynical Scotchman. Denning, though not exactly a Company's hard bargain, is of more humble origin; and we must set down the depreciatory sketch of this personage to the infatuation of the author, who somehow still believes in transmitted worth and the education and feelings of a gentleman born. But the real hero of the story is Norman Farquhar, who takes to a military career as a Brahman to his Sacred Thread, just "misses the Engineers," and—though we are anticipating the end—dies like a soldier in one of the episodes of 1857. To these personages, when they once start on active life in India, must be added Dalmayne the Civil and Superior Judge, by no means a copy of Joe Sedley but a man fully up to his work in ordinary times, and quite equal to the emergency which roused many a one in a black coat to act as if red were its natural colour; Northam, a clear-headed, somewhat sceptical doctor, who does not talk broad Scotch, like the typical surgeon of so many Indian stories; the Rev. Mr. Smythe, a chaplain sleek and comfortable, and an inferior kind of Archdeacon Grantley; Connelly, a sergeant, made thoroughly uncomfortable by being promoted from the ranks to a commission, but, withal, plain-spoken, soldierlike, and honest; and a few other minor characters. The ladies are represented by Mrs. Smythe, the vulgar but good-natured wife of the chaplain; her daughter, neither a professional beauty nor a regular garrison hack; and Margaret Cunynghame, the daughter of the colonel commanding the station, who is a model of grace, dignity, good sense, and filial devotion. The scene is laid mainly at Chotapoor, which, from its fort, cantonment, and other incidents, is certainly not Poona, but might be meant partly for Belgaum or Dharwar. We may observe, without hypercriticism, that the name assigned to this ideal station had better have been compounded of two substantives than of an adjective and a substantive. Rampore, Nagpore, Kishenpore, Doulatpore, Raghunathpore, and many others are examples. Chotapoor, of course, is the little city, but we never heard of that or its opposite Burrapoor in any part of India. The author may plead as a precedent Dustypore, but that is admittedly a hybrid. However, given these personages, then a dinner at the commandant's, a ball at the judge's, a cricket match, and some discussion about prospects and promotion follow as a matter of course. But these rather well-worn topics are diversified by the outbreak of the Mutiny. First we have rumours in the bazaar. The behaviour of the natives seems to have changed. Looks of defiance have succeeded to obsequiousness and respect, and we are reminded that little more than thirty years ago men travelled by palanquin and bullock-cart; that there were no telegraphs, though there was a regular monthly communication between England and India; and that the schottische had only just been introduced by some new arrival let loose from a London drawing-room. So the news of the outbreak at Meerut reaches Chotapoor to find the residents not wholly unprepared. The drivers of the batteries of artillery had shown symptoms of insubordination, and officers came to dine at mess with their swords ready for use. A body of armed malcontents headed by two traitorous Sepoys make for the mess-house, but all insurrection is stopped for the time by the activity of a comparatively unimportant character, who most properly cuts down the leading man on the very steps of the verandah. Still the evil spirit is not utterly quelled. The residents deem it advisable to take to the fort, to repair its breaches, and to look up some old guns more calculated to inspire dread in the defenders than in the assailants. The Sepoy regiment at last openly rebels, and shoots down its commanding officer, who, like many others at that period, forfeits his life from a generous and misplaced confidence in the loyalty of those whom he had looked on as his children. Norman Farquhar narrowly escapes the same fate, having gone out hog-hunting in the morning under the feeling that prompted so many of our countrymen at the same trying epoch. The ordinary station life still went on as usual, until the rattle of musketry, the blazing bungalow, and the roar of gaol-birds let loose, announced to the mass of the community that the English rule had ceased for a time. In the fort many of the better qualities of the residents are brought out, much as they are in the shipwreck in Mr. Tom Taylor's play of The Overland Route. But, failing the occurrence of some great turning-point in the history of the Presidency, the author has to bring matters to a conclusion. And this is accomplished, not in the very happiest manner, by the following device. A certain contingent, we are told, had been sent from head-quarters, not to relieve the station of Chotapoor, but to co-operate with a force somewhere in Central India, and incidentally to keep down a rising apprehended in one of our districts which bordered on the Nizam's country. This battery falls in, by mere chance, with the rebels already disorganized, and pounds them successfully with what is called round shot in one part of the story and blank cartridges in another. The judge, who, the colonel being struck down with paralysis, has assumed the direction of everything and everybody, military and civil, deems it indispensable to depute some active officer to communicate with this wandering battery, bring it to Chotapoor, and make the station safe. Farquhar starts on this errand, after taking leave of Margaret Cunynghame, who is evidently reserved for some one else; and, as he does not return within the period which the doctor—tempora dinumerans—allows him for getting over the distance, the practised reader will at once conclude that, in the words of the said doctor, "something has gone amiss." So Northam and the line adjutant set out on a cold night and with a waning moon, and come on the battery just as it was engaging the rebel host in earnest and breaking it into fragments. But in joining his friend Alan Douglas and the Artillery camp, Farquhar is hit by a stray bullet, and is soon in the hands of the doctor, and is laid on a camp-bed, from which we are certain he never can rise in health. Many authors would have preferred to make the hero die while performing some deed of "derring do," to use a term of romance—cutting down a Mahratta horseman, for instance, or, with two or three others, charging a whole company of rebels flushed with excitement and "loot." But we gather from divers expressions that poor Farquhar is intended for the gallant but unlucky man of his generation, who dies by a stray shot from an unknown hand, and not even at the capture of a "petty fortress." Farquhar is not the only man of that period who did his duty, died in discharge of it, was hardly ever mentioned in any public order or manifesto, or, if he survived, received neither praise nor "riband to stick in his coat." When Farquhar, removed to the Fort in the splendid palanquin belonging to the chaplain and sent on this errand, is duly cared for but dies with a letter from Margaret Cunynghame in his hand, the other characters are soon disposed of. Margaret herself marries Alan Douglas. The chaplain's daughter accepts the cautious and canny David Robertson. Hambling, the line adjutant, having for once in his life displayed some vigour, sinks back into a club lounger, and shows that life is hardly worth living. Dalmayne, the judge, never marries but retires, makes no boast of his own wisdom and ability in the Mutiny, and has two pretty nieces who manage his house. Northam, the sceptical doctor, writes an excellent book on the pathology and treatment of tropical diseases. Connolly, the sergeant, promoted to be a captain, goes back to his home in Somersetshire. And the progress of civilization dwarfs Chotapoor into a mere wayside station, with a clerk and a few porters. This result, we must say, is the very last thing which ought to have happened to a station which had a history, and a fort, and everything handsome about it. A railway would be far more likely, especially on the plateau of the Deccan, to elevate Chotapoor or any other station, into a popular place, the residence of a Commissioner or a resort for invalids from the damp and heat of the Concan. But we attribute this error to a wish on the author's part to avoid identification of either himself, his characters, or his local scenery. He must not fancy himself a novelist with a power of devising varied plots and skilfully analysing characters; but he had a story to tell about a perilous time in India, one of serious errors partially retrieved, of splendid deeds accomplished by diplomacy and by arms, of fearful odds faced and overcome by dauntless equanimity, and of the attitude taken up by those whom he several times terms the rulers or the master people. He has told it, not ineffectively, and as far as we can judge, without partiality, acerbity, or misrepresentation.

SOME little while ago Cardinal Newman, in a correspondence printed in the Times, observed how extremely difficult it was to attach any precise definition to the sense of religion. In truth, definitions are perilous things, however necessary to the comfort and well-being of the logicians. We can all remember how many a weary hour our great teacher of lucidity suffered in earlier and ruder times for his confessed inability to define his favourite phrase, the grand style—a phrase which many of his critics seemed to ascribe to his own invention, and could in no wise understand. That the thing itself could not be defined was allowed; it could only be spiritually discerned. In this particular instance the truth of the confession is clear. But in many other instances a great deal of trouble, at any rate, and often some little confusion, might, we suspect, be saved if those who essay to formulate in words the faith that is in them would rest satisfied with a similar vagueness of outline. It not only makes for the teacher's personal safety, in furnishing so shifting and intangible a mark for the shafts of the unbeliever, but it allows him so much wider a range of illustration. If the nameless compiler of this little book, for example, had not pinned himself down so severely to a literal definition, he would have escaped much mystification and inconsistency, and would have gone very much nearer to realize his aim of presenting in one volume the "perfection of English lyrics." The restrictions of time he has imposed on himself are judicious enough. Living writers he has not touched, nor those who have been too lately taken from us to allow of an unbiassed and impersonal judgment. He begins with Wyatt and ends with Beddoes. His book, therefore, covers a space of three centuries and a half, and may be fairly held to have allowed room for the best lyrics as yet written in the English language. But that those other restrictions within which he has chosen to bind himself have granted this room is more disputable.

Let us see how he reads the canon law of lyric poetry:—

> A lyric is a short poem dealing with one thought, essentially melodious in rhythm and structure, and, if a metaphor may be taken from the sister art, a simple air, without progression, variation, or accompaniment. If we wish to make the essentials of a lyric still clearer to ourselves, we shall find we are compelled to do so by negatives. It must not be in blank, nor in heroic verse; save, indeed, where a refrain, and a subtle repetition of the same word, gives lyrical impression, as in Tennyson's "Tears, idle tears," and some of the songs in the Idylls of the King. It is not so severe in form as the sonnet; the poet's touch is lighter even when his subject is grave; a dirge like "Lycidas" cannot be accounted such, nor a sustained and lofty poem like "I have led her home" in "Maud." Some of our greatest poets have left no true lyrics, or none into which they have put their best work. Pope's only examples are a burlesque, an imitation of Horace, written when he was a mere child, and a paraphrase, also from the Latin [yet, curiously enough, both of these last two examples are given in this volume designed to present "the perfection of English lyrics"!]. Gray affords us none; no adequately characteristic specimen can be culled from Spenser, or more than one or two from Milton, though the former lived so near in time to Shakspeare and Ben Jonson, lyrists if any were, and the latter has been justly termed "inventor of harmonies," so keen was his sense of song.

That the author of "The Bard" and "The Progress of Poetry" affords no example of the lyric is an assertion which can hardly fail to astonish, perhaps to provoke, the simple-minded reader. But the editor has drawn a hard-and-fast line between the ode and the lyric, though he allows that "those who insist on the original meanings of words may perhaps find it difficult to distinguish" between the two. He cites with approval a modern definition of the ode as "any strain of enthusiastic and exalted lyrical verse, directed to a fixed purpose, and dealing progressively with one dignified theme"; and then he goes on to define the lyric in the words already quoted. An ode, therefore, must be lyrical; but a lyric is something very different from an ode; just as every goose is an animal, but every animal is not a goose. The distinction strikes us as a little difficult, and more than a little fanciful, though this may, of course, arise from a want of clearness in our own spiritual discernment rather than from any confusion in our editor's notions of words and things. But his own illustrations of his own definitions only serve to increase our perplexity. While justly condemning Pope's absurd "Ode to St. Cecilia's Day," he still, as we have seen, allows it to be a lyric; yet he will not grant this indulgence to Dryden's "Alexander's Feast," written for the same purpose—so at least we presume, for he does not include it in his selections, and we must not suppose him to rate it as a bad piece of work. Again, he prints Campbell's "Hohenlinden," but discards Drayton's "Agincourt"—one of the finest battle-pieces in our language, and a lyric surely if the other be. All narrative and ballad poems are excluded; "Lycidas" must not be printed because it is a dirge; yet we find Wolfe's "Burial of Sir John Moore," which is narrative and ballad, and something of a dirge to boot. Such very subtle distinctions, which we must honestly confess to be quite beyond our comprehension, will hardly tend to clear away the difficulty which is foreseen as likely to cloud the minds of those who "insist on the original meanings of words."

"Form," he says, "is always as important in the true lyric, it is sometimes more important than the thought, and just because the verse should be so flawless, it now and then happens that a false note struck in such a poem mars the whole, while it would pass unnoticed in a more sustained work." This is true, though we cannot think his illustration of the truth very happy. He declares the lines

> Then the might of England flushed
> To anticipate the scene to be like "a fly in ointment, spoiling the whole of Campbell's 'Battle of the Baltic,' though indeed they are not the only blemishes even in that poem." We should hardly have selected this couplet as the false note in Campbell's poem, though anticipate is no doubt a word in which "all the charm of all the Muses" is not conspicuous. The really false note is struck by that terrible mermaid in the last stanza. But form is vital, indeed, to lyric poetry, almost, one feels inclined to say, its essence.

> Take, oh, take those lips away,
> That so sweetly were forsworn.

How difficult to define the peculiar, the ineffable charm of such verse! yet who can be insensible to it?

> When the lamp is shattered,
> The light in the dust lies dead;
> When the cloud is scattered,
> The rainbow's glory is fled.

And again:—

> O world! O life! O time!
> On whose last steps I climb,
> Trembling at that where I had stood before—
> When will return the glory of your prime?
> No more—oh, never more!

What is it but its form which gives the pre-eminence to the "lovely wail" of Shelley, where the thought is so often dim, visionary, and unsubstantial, so often, when you do grasp it, poor and weak, nay, sometimes even commonplace? And to come lower down in the scale, whence but from their form comes the value of Poe's lovely lines:—

> Lo! in you brilliant window-niche
> How statue-like I see thee stand,
> The agate-lamp within thy hand!
> Ah, Psyche, from the regions which > Are holy land!

And, indeed, of all that exquisite little poem "To Helen"? Even in the pure ballad for how much the form counts! It is impossible to grant a very high rank in poetry to such verse as

> He turned him right and round about
> All on the Irish shore;
> He gave his bridle reins a shake,
> With, Adieu for evermore;
> My dear,
> Adieu for evermore!

or as—

> O long, long may the ladies sit
> With their fans into their hand,
> Or e'er they see Sir Patrick Spence
> Come sailing to the land.

Yet every one must be conscious of its attraction; an attraction, moreover, which will always, in certain minds and certain moods of mind, outweigh verse of really a far higher and more poetical quality. And this being so, and the editor of this volume allowing that it is so, might he not have done better to draw his definition on somewhat broader lines, to have taken the outward and visible sign of form as his first principle, instead of going so laboriously about to formulate some subtle distinction of which he himself may be conscious, but which he seems hardly able to express very clearly in words? The broad classifications of poetry adopted by the Greeks, epic, dramatic, lyric, and so forth, are the best as they are the simplest; however much we may refine on these, we are hardly likely to improve them. Of the contradictions and perplexities this adherence to the old rule would have saved our editor we have given some idea; but of the larger and more abundant field of illustration it would have given him it is hardly possible to convey any adequate idea otherwise than by saying that a four-fifths of his book might have been altered for the better. No line of Gray has he allowed himself; Milton is represented by two short pieces, the song on May Morning and the Lady's Song from Comus; Dryden by but one, and that of all he ever wrote perhaps the one which bears most faintly his image and superscription. Byron and Shelley have not had anything like justice done to them. The former has indeed been allowed his "Oh, snatched away in beauty's bloom," and his "There be none of Beauty's daughters"; but among the half-dozen pieces by which the latter is represented are "The Song to the Men of England" and "The National Anthem," a most inexplicable choice. Wordsworth fares a little better; Scott perhaps worst of all. Shakspeare and the Elizabethans, particularly Herrick, are the most fortunate; but—to keep our gravest indictment to the last—there is not a single word from Burns in the volume, and this in a volume designed to present "the perfection of English lyrics"!

It would be unfair to say that the book does not contain much that is excellent. It is clear that its inadequacy does not arise from the editor's want of reading, nor from his want of appreciating what he reads. Indeed, he has printed many pieces which even earnest and careful lovers of English poetry may very possibly read for the first time, and in this age of little books such a distinction must always count. But it is a distinction that may be pushed too far. Poetry that is really first-rate never grows old, never grows threadbare. On the contrary, the more familiar it is the more deeply do we feel it, the more gladly do we welcome it—

> Ever in its melodious store
> Finding a spell unheard before.

In a work which is designed to prevent the labours of research, to advance the reader by the shortest and easiest road to a knowledge of a special branch of English poetry, it is far more important that the examples should be all of first-rate excellence than that they should be such as are not commonly met with—δὶς ἢ τρὶς τὰ καλά. However, we do not wish to cast another stone at our editor. Within the limits he has allowed himself, let us rather say that he has given many pieces of first-rate excellence, and many that are not commonly met with. But then those limits exist. Cribbed, cabined, and confined within them, no such book, it seems to us, can possibly claim to present "the perfection of English lyrics."

TRANSACTIONS OF THE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.*

THE indefatigable energy and vast linguistic learning of Prince L. L. Bonaparte have lately called forth from the Prime Minister an acknowledgment which is nothing more than his due. That it is an adequate recompense for his work no one could be so foolish as to imagine. The tasks which he has imposed upon himself are precisely those for which there can in strictness of speech be no recompense at all. The Prince addresses himself to an inner and a scanty circle of scholars who have the time and the will to follow him along paths which the majority of philologists are not specially eager to explore; nor is the exact aim of his work always evident at the first glance. Of the vast amount of labour involved in it there is no question; and the present number of the Philological Society's Transactions continues to bear ample evidence of the fact, one-fourth of its whole space being occupied with articles from his pen. A list of initial mutations in living Celtic, Basque, Sardinian, and Italian dialects is followed by another list consisting of words connected with the vine in Latin and the Neo-Latin dialects, and a third which gives the names of European reptiles in the living Neo-Latin languages. The list of vine words is remarkable as showing not only the minuteness of the subdivisions of which technical terminology is capable, but the measure in which the terms of the parent speech have passed away from its younger offshoots. The multiplicity of names employed to denote sheep, deer, or salmon at various stages of their growth seems as nothing in comparison with the number of the kinds and qualities of vines, their produce, the state of the plant, of its fruits, its branches, its suckers, all of which demand a separate sign or label. The vine carried along from tree to tree is in Latin rumpus, tradux, or funetum. These words seem to be altogether lost in the more modern Italian dialects, some of these substituting the more general term arbuscillo, others describing them as ritorta, catena, pendia, or pendana. The Latin rumpotinetum, as denoting a place where vines carried along from tree to tree are planted, has undergone the like fate, and most of the later dialects seem to feel no need of the term.

As with the naming of the vine and its products the stores of alien dialects have been often laid under requisition for a supply of names, so with the reptiles specific names have given way to more general descriptions, and the Italian testudo is denoted by the Galician sapo concho. The names for the slow-worm are of more than usual interest. In several of the Italian dialects it is designated by the words orbala, orbiga, orbetto, orbisolo, orbasola; in others by cecella, cecilia, cischeglia, cerscheglia, all however pointing to the inference of the peasantry that because the animal has very small eyes therefore it is blind. Other names for the same reptile, Prince L. L. Bonaparte adds, "are related to French borgne, 'one-eyed,' as Rouergois buerlhe, Forézien borgnon or bordon; Jurassien borne, bône, and bouanou; Messin bogn. The phrase 'has no eye,' n'a d'iuel is recognized in Cévennois nadiuel, nadiel, and anadiuel, Rouergois nadiuel, non duel; Gascon anilh. . . . Poitevin anguenueil, the first element of which points to anguis, snake."

Another paper on the name Roncesvalles, by the same writer, has a wider interest. The Latin cartularies seem to give roscida vallis as the equivalent or explanation of these names, as though there could be no question of the correctness of their interpretation. But the ancient French Rencesvals, Rencesval, Roncisvals, Renchevax, and many more, together with the modern French Ronceveaux, the Spanish Roncesvalles, as well as the Italian and Portuguese forms, show strong likeness of form, and all convey the idea of a valley of brambles, a meaning in which they agree with the Basque name orreaga applied to the same place. But the meaning thus obtained differs so materially from "roscida vallis" that it becomes "impossible not to consider the latter as a Latin corruption of the old French word," this word denoting simply a valley full of juniper bushes, just as the Basque orreaga is composed of orre, juniper, and aga, a local suffix indicating plenty. The explanation gives a better picture of the spot where Roland and his Paladins are supposed to have fought their last fight and died than is furnished by a name which speaks of it only as one among a thousand dewy valleys.

In a short paper on the etymology of "surround," Mr. Skeat lays on Milton the blame of misunderstanding a word to which he has so attached a false connotation as to make its removal now impossible. He had himself, it seems, been inclined to derive it from the prefix sur and the adjective round; but he necessarily rejected Johnson's derivation of it from the French surronder as an unscrupulous fiction, there being no such French verb. An English sur-round would point to a Latin super-rotundare, and as to such a compound it would be difficult to assign any intelligible meaning, his conclusion is that sur-round, as it stands, is mere nonsense. Having knocked this notion on the head, Mr. Skeat adds that the earliest examples of the word, which does not occur in Shakspeare or in the Bible, are cited in the dictionaries from Milton, who uses the word seven times, thus leaving little doubt of the facts that he is the author who has made the use of the word common, and that, having misunderstood the word himself, he has misled all his followers. Ten years after his death, Coles's Dictionary of 1684 explains surround as "to compass about." Mr. Skeat believes that Coles took this from Milton, the same explanation being found in Phillips, who was Milton's nephew, and probably in all subsequent dictionaries. Before Milton, however, Mr. Skeat finds two remarkable traces of the word:—

> Minsheu, in 1627, notices the word, but does not explain it. He merely says, "Surround, vide to Overflow." Sherwood's Index to Cotgrave gives, "Surround, or overflow, oultre conler." Cotgrave himself gives, "Oultre conler, to surround or overflow." Now this suggests quite a different idea, and throws us back upon the notion of a Low Latin superundare and suround with one r; we are all well accustomed to the syllable ound, from its occurrence in the compound abound. Superundare is merely a Low Latin equivalent of Latin ex-undare, to overflow; so that a new history of the word is thus opened out to us.

Hence, although Johnson's French surronder must be cast aside as a fiction, suronder remains a real French word, in spite of its having disappeared altogether from modern French, Cotgrave giving "suronder, to float upon the waves"—a different meaning, indeed, but one easily evolved out of superundare. Cotgrave's interpretation is, however, neither the oldest nor the most usual. Mr. Skeat cites a notable instance of the word occurring in the Vie de St. Auban, "Fort est a combattre a flot qu'est surpondé," explained by Atkinson as, "It is difficult to fight against a body of water which is risen high in waves," or, as we might say, against a surging wave. If, then, a man standing on a projecting portion of land finds himself cut off by this surging tide or wave, he might speak first of the water as "surunde," and come afterwards to speak of himself as overflowed, thus passing into Milton's sense of simple environment. The spelling of the word from the first with two r's could scarcely fail to encourage the mistake, and Milton made it with a confidence and frequency which make a restoration of the true sense at the present time impossible. The doubling of the r Mr. Skeat regards as simply pseudo-phonetic, since it occurs in Cotgrave and Minsheu, before the word had undergone any change in its meaning, such doubling being very common after a short accented vowel, as in berry, cherry, marrow.

Another short paper by Mr. Platt urges a formidable indictment against the Bosworth-Toller Anglo-Saxon Dictionary, put forth by the Clarendon Press. The list of errors, both of omission and commission, is seriously large, while the whole plan and execution of the work are, in Mr. Platt's eyes, altogether behind the present state of knowledge of the old speech of our forefathers. The modern dress of this ancient speech is presented in not altogether agreeable form by a paper on "Spoken Portuguese," by Mr. Sweet, and in another on Old English verbs in -egan and their subsequent history by Dr. Murray. Both Dr. Murray and Mr. Sweet employ one of the many modes belonging to the phonetic system which is to make all reading and writing plain and easy for everybody; but they seem to be scarcely consistent with each other. They may, however, for all we know, be trying different methods; but we cannot bring ourselves to think that, even if their method be right, their ear has never misled them. We fail to see why "isolated" should be written or rather pronounced "izolated," for we do not remember to have heard the "z" sound ever introduced into the word. Mr. Sweet tells us, indeed, that "Portugueze spelling is somewhat unsetld, the natural difficulty of symbolising a complicated sound-system being aggravated by the retention of etymological spellings." The phonetic system of spelling seems in like manner to be somewhat in a state of flux. Otherwise, how could such forms as "inflection," "inflectional" appear in any phonetically-written paper? To be sure, their retention may be explained on the ground that they are not instances of etymological spelling; but it is not easy to understand why phonetic writers should depart from their system to perpetuate a blunder which must be traced, not to the ear, but to the eye.

Mr. Alexander Ellis's paper on the delimitation of the English and Welsh languages is full of historical interest. The extent and completeness of the English Conquest are subjects on which much work may yet be expended to good purpose; and the conditions determining the borders of the English and Welsh speech are of the first importance in the inquiry. In Shropshire and Western Herefordshire Mr. Ellis traces the mark of a dialect descended mainly from Welsh people on whom English had been forced, although the effect of time has been such as to render these marks not easily discernible by ordinary observers. Written English, and especially the English of orators, ecclesiastical or civil, Mr. Ellis puts aside as having comparatively little to do with the matter. Its conditions are artificial, and they remove it from the number of dialects in which the laws regulating the growth of language have full play. The dialects of England, Mr. Ellis asserts, are practically unwritten at the present day, the attempts at writing a few of them being rather caricatures than representations; and the prevalence of English speech in a particular district is not established until it is shown that the uneducated speak with each other exclusively in English. The application of this test has resulted in the ascertainment of facts which point chiefly to the future extinction of Welsh speech within the limits of Great Britain. This end is, however, far distant still; and in the meanwhile the inquiries for which Mr. Ellis suggests a plan will, if systematically carried out, be amply rewarded.

RACECOURSE AND COVERT SIDE.*

IT might almost be said that the fonder a man is of sport, the more he dreads books on sporting. Nor is this apparent paradox difficult of explanation. Literary men are not, as a rule, the best sportsmen; on the other hand, when the best sportsmen undertake to write books, their literary powers are often so weak that their works are almost unreadable. Then it is a very rare thing for the most experienced sportsmen—men who hunt six days a week, owners or trainers of large studs of racehorses, celebrated jockeys, or wealthy men who have large deer forests, moors, and covers—to write treatises on hunting, racing, or shooting. Even under the most favourable conditions, a book on sports is apt to be unpleasantly egotistical, and, however good it may be, there are so many points on which sportsmen differ that some one or other is certain to say that its author has written "a lot of nonsense." It was therefore with considerable misgivings that we took up Racecourse and Covert Side. Nor did its binding encourage us. On one side is a huntsman, with a powder-horn slung to his waist, in the act of jumping on one of his own hounds; on the other side is a most evil-looking pointer dog, for whose presence we are quite unable to account; and on the back is an elaborate powder-horn suspended from a chain and cord. Usually the cover of a book on sports is the most attractive part of it, so there seemed nothing left to hope for in this instance. But when we opened the book, we found it to be a glorious exception to the general rule. In the first place the type is excellent. Then the illustrations by Mr. John Sturgess are capital. In too many hunting and racing books, the pictures are of one conventional type—the meet, the find, the run, the kill—the start, the race, the finish, and so on; but here we have much originality of subject, and the horses are not represented as doing impossible things, although we must admit that the hunter in the frontispiece is getting an immoderate "crumpler." The attitudes of the horses are very spirited, and the foreshortening is exceedingly good. But we must in fairness say that the illustrations are not better than the letterpress, as is so often the case in sporting works. There are some chapters describing the ordinary course of things in the hunting-field and on the turf which can scarcely entertain people who are familiar with either; but, taken as a whole, this is an unusually happy specimen of a book upon hunting and racing. One virtue of this work is that it is not in the least didactic. Every one who has had any experience of the hunting-field and the racecourse thinks that he can teach more than he can learn on either subject, and those who have had nothing to do with them do not often care to read about them. A book, therefore, that professes to instruct its readers in hunting, riding to hounds, or winning races, is likely to meet with but a cool reception, and Mr. Watson has been careful to avoid this danger.

There are descriptions of many sorts of horses in this volume. In the first chapter we read of a hunter that was advertised for sale as "quiet in the saddle"; for "he was a demon in the stable," and "kicked to pieces any trap that he was harnessed to," so his owner argued that, as every horse must be quiet somewhere, it would be well to give him the benefit of the doubt and describe him as quiet to ride. "But," the speaker adds, "he wasn't." In the same chapter a mount was offered to the author with the assurance that he was "the nicest little horse in the world"; but he turned out upon further inquiry to be "a bit awkward to mount"; "to reach round a bit at you" when you tried to put your foot into the stirrup; to want "holding together"; to have a "wonderfully tender mouth"; and to be awkward when interfered with. Fortunately the writer, by mistake, got on the horse his friend had intended to ride himself, and enjoyed a capital run, while his host got the "crumpler" portrayed in the frontispiece. For the benefit of those who dread such catastrophes, a story is told of a certain Duke of Beaufort who loved hunting but hated jumping. A neighbour of his had exactly the same tastes. The Duke hunted but did not jump, but his neighbour both jumped and hunted. "Jones is an ass," said the Duke. "Look at him now. There he is, and he can't get out. Jones does not like jumping, but he jumps a little, and I see him pounded every day. I never jump at all, and I'm always free to go where I like." How many men might follow the Duke's example with advantage. There is an amusing chapter about another nobleman of a very different stamp, who used to win bets from his friends by what are technically known as "sells"; and, turning from hunting to steeplechasing, we find a story called "Upset," which is admirably told. Another good steeplechasing story is "Rooks and Pigeons," a betting romance, in which the villain is punished and the hero and heroine "marry and live happily for ever afterwards." "The Spotted Horse's Story" is exactly what it professes to be—a good Christmas story. "An Off Chance" is the account of an interesting racing and betting adventure.

There is a capital description of a visit to the famous trainer William Day, the author of a book called The Racehorse in Training, which we reviewed in this journal. The writer states that Mr. William Day told him he believed he could have won the Derby when riding Promised Land if he had followed his own inclination and made proper use of his horse, instead of riding a waiting race at the suggestion of his father. Indeed, he spoke much in favour of making the running, or at least of making the best use of a horse from start to finish, and he strongly condemned the "flashy style of winning by short heads that makes jockeys lose so many races nowadays." He said that, although "the public are caught by this sort of thing," many races are thus thrown away. "If the jockey wins, they talk of his wonderful finish, coming just in the nick of time, and, if he is just beaten, they declare that no one else would have got within a head" of the winner, "while all the time, if he had ridden judiciously, he might have won easily by a length and a half, or maybe much further." In an account of "A Day with Tom Cannon," we are told that that celebrated jockey to a great extent shares the opinion of William Day on this point. "You see," said he, "the whole secret of the matter is this—races are not won entirely on the post. You've got to think of winning all the way from the start." William Day told the following anecdote to the author concerning a St. Leger which will be fresh in the memories of most racing men:—

"There was a case in point two or three years ago at Doncaster. 'You had better have a bit on my horse, I'm going to win to-day,' one of the cleverest of our jockeys said to me. 'Well, the horse hasn't done much yet—has he?' I asked. 'No, he hasn't, for I have never quite had my way about riding him, but to-day I have leave to ride him as I think best, and I am certain we shall beat them all,' the jockey said; and he did. There is no harm in mentioning names—I am speaking of Jim Goater and Rayon d'Or."

Cannon made some very sensible remarks to the author about the evil results of the over-use of the whip, especially with young horses. "That unfortunate whip loses such a lot of races for the boys." "No one knows what a number of two-year-olds are ruined by the whip and spurs." He describes the nervous condition of a two-year-old, who "ran last week and was hided," ran again the day before yesterday and was hided, "and here he is once more, and he knows that he's got to run and be hided again." Is it to be wondered at that he is "too nervous to put out his full powers," or that, when he goes back to his stable he will neither eat nor drink? Cannon remarked further that when he rides two-year-olds that have once had a flogging at the hands of an unmerciful jockey, he can feel their hearts beating and bumping against his legs through the light racing-saddles; and that when careless jockeys ride these poor young things, the chances are that they get a bad start, and then "out comes that Blessed whip, and so they go whipping and bumping all over the course. Spurs, too, hard at it, though they don't often touch the horse where they want to." In noticing the immense sums obtained by jockeys in these days, the author tells us that, "unless popular rumour errs," one jockey put by a fortune of 100,000*l*, "a handsome figure for a young man of some five or six-and-twenty, who began life in a stable-boy's jacket without a sixpence to call his own." Indeed, popular rumour has put the fortune at a much higher figure, and it is time some limit were placed to the ridiculous sums now given to jockeys. The whole chapter on jockeys is interesting. In speaking of Wood's victory in the last Derby on St. Blaise, the author says that his courageous "dash round the rails" enabled him "to get a forward place which he never lost." Tributes of praise are given to Archer, Fordham, Cannon, &c., and all the principal jockeys and their styles of riding are noticed and criticized. Every judge of racing may not quite agree with the author in his opinions about some of the jockeys mentioned; but, upon the whole, his remarks are very fair.

The chapter called "Behind the Scenes at the Circus," although it has little to do with either the racecourse or the covert side, is decidedly amusing. The author pays a private visit to a large circus, and is lionized by the proprietor, who is a gentleman of considerable originality. Victor Emmanuel, whom he described as "the best fellow in the world," had given him a horse, an elephant, a lion, and a gold watch. "I've often," said he, "had the King in the morning when we were practising in the ring, with the whip in his hand—yes, and the princes holding gates for my wife to jump." Once when he was driving near St. Cloud he picked up on the road "a stout, littlish gentleman,' and gave him "a ride" in his American car. This "littlish" man turned out to be Napoleon III., Emperor of the French, from whom he afterwards received several favours. The greatest fault that a rider can give way to, in this circus-owner's opinion, is "slummocking." When his daughter was training a new horse to jump gates in the ring he said, "Hold him well together; don't let him slummock." He likes Englishmen and Americans, but he thinks that "Germans are too slummocky." Most lady riders, he observes, either hold a horse's head too tight or else let "him slummock all over the place." As we have already said, this chapter has no immediate connexion with either racing or hunting; but, if we are not much mistaken, the proprietor of the circus here described has many horses in his stables that have run on the Turf, and the stories of some of them might prove curious specimens of racecourse history. Perhaps Mr. Watson will write them on some future occasion; and in dismissing his present work we will only say that it is bright, lively, and free from humbug, and that we fully expect it to be popular.

THE QUATRAINS OF OMAR KHAYYÁM.*

THE translation of Omar's Quatrains which now appears side by side with the Persian text was first published by Mr. Whinfield in a separate form a twelvemonth or more ago, and therefore is already known among those who perchance first made the Persian poet's acquaintance in the charming English version of the late Mr. Fitzgerald. Orientalists have now to thank Mr. Whinfield for a critical edition of the Persian text, provided with the needful apparatus of notes and variants.

The success of Mr. Fitzgerald as a translator of verse, whether Persian or Greek, was so universally acknowledged that Mr. Whinfield might well fear comparisons, not entirely to his own advantage, in writing a new verse translation in that same quatrain of ten-syllable lines which the genius of his predecessor had raised to the rank of a recognized English metre. But, as Mr. Whinfield remarks, everything indicated this metre as the proper one, since "there ought to be some degree of metrical conformity between the measure of the original and the translation," and, as regards the said metre, "though it does not exactly correspond with the Rubá'i, it very clearly suggests it." Mr. Whinfield further aimed at providing a translation as literal as the structure of the English quatrain would allow. And, therefore, although we are fully alive to the melodious English of the verses which have given to Omar a public more numerous in the West and the Far West than ever was his in the land of Iran, we must bear in mind that Mr. Fitzgerald's is a poetic version rather than a translation, for very often he extracted the pith of a couple of Omar's Quatrains, and then moulded the extract with consummate grace into a single stanza of his own. And this may account for the great differences, both in form and matter, which are to be observed in the subsequent editions of the little book in Roxburghe binding.

Mr. Whinfield's version, if less poetical, is the more exact and scholarly. A prose translation of poetry must needs be unsatisfactory, and especially so of poetry such as Omar's, "where nearly the whole charm consists in the style and the manner, the grace of the expression, and the melody of the versification." And as surely as a warning to others in this respect is the verbose and jejune French prose—useful only as a "crib" to the Persian on the opposite page—which M. Nicolas wrote for his otherwise excellent edition of Omar's works. We are inclined also to agree that, in the choice of a metre, it is as well to eschew the ponderous Alexandrines so extensively used by Herr Bodenstedt and other German translators, though these correspond more nearly with the Persian in the number of the syllables; further, we certainly congratulate our author on keeping throughout to one form of verse, and herein not allowing himself a poetical license which detracts from the value of the German translators' rhythmical verses. In the matter of arrangement, however, Mr. Whinfield would, we think, do well to follow his English and German predecessors rather than keep to the Oriental method of simply stringing the quatrains together, regardless of subject, according to the alphabetical order of the rhyme-letter. Why not have given the quatrains in the order of the classification made in p. xxiii? We should thus find presented in separate sections the "Complaints of Fate," the "Satires," and the "Love-poems," and avoid mingling the "Bucolic" and "Devotional" quatrains with the "Antinomian utterances . . . preaching ad nauseam 'Eat and drink (especially drink), for to-morrow we die.'" Again, we should then be able the more easily to compare by their juxtaposition similar quatrains, and this would further bring out the glaring contrasts which are the characteristic feature of Omar's poetry; proving that then, as now, "Nous ne sommes pas plus différents aux autres qu'à nous-mêmes."

In framing a critical text of any popular Oriental poet (such as is and always has been Omar Khayyám), the editor's chief difficulty will arise from the exceeding variety and the discrepancy of the materials. The MSS. are seldom very old, and, though the date is difficult to determine from the writing alone, as regards Omar's works especially it may generally be stated that "the number of quatrains seems to increase in proportion to the modernness of the MS." Of Omar we have already in our libraries the text as lithographed both at Calcutta and at Lucknow, also M. Nicolas's edition, and the fragment left incomplete by Mr. Blockmann. With these four Mr. Whinfield has collated four excellent MSS., and although this edition does not profess to offer a "textus receptus," he here presents us with five hundred well-selected quatrains, of which the large majority may safely be attributed to Omar, and which taken together provide excellent specimens of each of the various classes of quatrains attributed to the poet:—

> The state of the case is this:—Out of all the quatrains passing under Omar's name, hardly any stand alone. Almost every one belongs to a family, more or less numerous, to the other members of which it bears a strong family likeness. One can say with some confidence that all these replicas, paraphrases, and variations of the same ideas can hardly be the work of one and the same hand; but to distinguish with certainty the handiwork of the master from that of his imitators is a task probably beyond the powers of any foreign critic living eight hundred years after the poems in question were written.

And this, alas! must be admitted as the case in the present state of our Oriental scholarship, and with the paucity of our MSS. The character of the language, by itself, offers but an unstable criterion, since literary Persian is written with the same words and phrases whether the verse be composed in the eleventh or the nineteenth century; and of internal evidence there is little or none, seeing that Omar's poetry runs in the old grooves already well worn by his predecessor Avicenna, and used again by numerous successors, such as Afzul Káshi and his imitators. The notes which Mr. Whinfield has appended to the text are very scholarly, and will prove of great service in the elucidation of the many knotty points that were raised by Mr. Blockmann in his Prosody of the Persians. Our author has also noted the poetical contractions and peculiarities of metre and scansion, besides marking the izáfat wherever that perplexing but important vowel occurs. On this point we specially recommend to Orientalists the remarks on pp. xix, xx, as being extremely apposite, since it is not to be denied that "there is some difference of precept and practice as to the proper way of marking the izáfat after the semi-vowels."

In the space at our disposal it is impossible to enter into any exhaustive analysis of Omar's creed. That he was a man of strong religious emotions a very casual reading of his works will clearly show; that he could be neither an Agnostic nor a Materialist, in the sense in which we moderns use these words, is a fact that bears no discussion with any one who knows aught of the philosophy and the history of Islam. "To him, as to other Muhammadans of his time, to deny the existence of the Deity would seem to be tantamount to denying the existence of the world and of himself"; and we are inclined to agree with Mr. Whinfield, who sees in him analogies with Voltaire rather than with Lucretius, especially in the large charity and the kindliness which so often underlie the irreverence and the cynicism. Quatrain 34 is certainly remarkable for the eleventh century after

* The Quatrains of Omar Khayyám. The Persian Text, with English Verse Translation. By E. H. Whinfield, M.A., &c. London: Trübner & Co. 1883.

Christ, and remembering that it was written by a contemporary of the sons of William the Conqueror:—

> Pagodas, just as Mosques, are homes of prayer;
> 'Tis prayer that Church-bells chime unto the air;
> Yea, Church and Ka'aba, Rosary and Cross,
> Are all but divers tongues of world-wide prayer.

But he was a man essentially of his own century. Omar Khayyám the mathematician, in philosophy and natural science the pupil of such men as Avicenna and Ghazzáli, had still but a poor opinion of either the capacity of the human understanding or the high destiny of man. In the fifth century of the Hejrah, though from the Oxus to the Orontes the Moslem world was ably ruled by the Great Seljuk Sultans, the instability of worldly greatness and of dynasties was a theme that all men comprehended. The irruption of the Turkish tribes had already begun under the Sultans of Ghazni, and before them had not Persia, lorded over successively by Táhiri or Saffari generals, Samani or Buweyhi emirs, governed the Khalifeh himself in Bagdad? The times might be out of joint; worldliness (talab un dunya), and other-worldliness (talab ul ukharat), both equally repugnant to Omar's philosophic soul, ruled the day, then as now; and his studies landed him much at the same point where John van Olden-Barneveld came to rest when the latter took as his motto the sage inscription Nil scire tutissima fides.

In closing our notice of Mr. Whinfield's latest work, it is a pleasure to give praise to the careful manner in which the text is printed; typographical errors are not numerous, but besides those cited in the errata, the following should be noted. In the rhyme-words of Quatrain 78 it would have been more correct, orthographically, to have written hichast in one word, or to have inserted the alif. In Q. 141, l. 4, read dárand for darand; in Q. 275, l. 3, for be-fazmán read be-farmán; and in Q. 277, l. 4, read báng for bábek. Mr. Whinfield's notes, as we have already remarked, are scholarly and lucid, and the analogies he occasionally points out between the text and passages in Job or Ecclesiastes, or in poets ancient and modern, from Horace to Lord Byron, add an additional interest for the English reader. It may, however, be useful to point out regarding the note to Q. 60, that in ummid the m is always doubled in the modern usage; and likewise that at the present day hósh and khúsh (notes to Q. 103 and 112) are both invariably short; lastly, that the Persian for "one" is yek, and not ek, as written in the note to Q. 346. These, however, are all matters of such minor importance that Mr. Whinfield may feel inclined to remind us that a critic in Persian goes by the name of a Nuktah-chín, or a Dot-browser. Before attacking Omar our author made proof of his skill by editing the mystic poem of the "Gulshan-i-Raz," and it is much to be hoped that so competent a scholar may find time now to take up the work left undone through the death of Professor Palmer, and give the world the long-looked-for translation and critical edition of the poems of Háfiz.

CHAP-BOOK CHAPLETS.*

THIS book is unfortunately published without a word of preface, introduction, or explanation of any kind, so that we are left quite in the dark as to the origin of the "suitable sculptures," as to the principle of selection followed in the letterpress, and, for the most part, as to the date, origin, and histories of the ballads chosen for illustration. The volume is got up to imitate a collection of chap-books bound together; the paper and type are meant to suggest the chap-book, but they are of course very much too good; the illustrations are drawn in the style supposed to be dear to our ancestors, with thick outlines and the rudest handling, and are coarsely coloured. There is, however, a dedication of the work to "the great variety of Readers, from the most able to him that can but spell," with an intimation that, although so vast a multitude are invited to read the book, the issue is limited in number. The contents of the volume, so far as letterpress goes, consist of eight ballads—namely, "The Barkeshire Lady's Garland," "The Babes in the Wood," "I know what I know," "Jemmy and Nancy of Yarmouth," "The Taming of a Shrow," "Blew cap for me," "John and Joan," and "George Barnwell." As regards the first, "The Barkeshire Lady's Garland," nothing is said about its history or origin. The tune, to be sure, is given as "The Royal Forester," which is not found under that name in Chappell's Collection, and we are left in complete ignorance of the date of this curious but not very lively composition; nor is it stated where Mr. Crawhall found it. The "Barkeshire Lady" has an estate of 5,000*l.* a year, but is coy and will listen to none of her suitors. Finally, however, she falls in love with a young lawyer, to whom she opens her heart by sending him an anonymous challenge. He keeps the appointment, expecting some adventure, and finds, instead of a jealous rival, a lady in a domino who tells him that she has brought a rapier with her and that he must either fight her or marry her without knowing who she is or seeing her face. This pusillanimous youth, who might without odium have fled from the lady with a rapier, consents to marry her:—

> The sweet pretty Cupids hovered
> Round her eyes—her face was covered > With a mask—he took her thus
> Just for better or for worse.

Pure doggrell of this kind might have been written yesterday. As for the illustrations, one would like to know if there are any at all among them that are old, or whether Mr. Crawhall has drawn and designed them especially for this volume. The portrait of the "Barkeshire Lady" points with its patches to Queen Anne's reign, but in the arrangement of the hair to a much earlier period. The figure of the bridegroom's friend receiving the wedding favour—he is evidently on his very best behaviour and quite the best man—wears a wig of King William's time and a doublet of Charles I. To be sure in a chap-book one does not look for antiquarian correctness of dress, but one naturally turns to the fashions in order to fix a date. Of the next ballad, "The Babes in the Wood," we are told that the oldest edition known as the "Cruel Uncle" was printed in the year 1670. Presumably, but we cannot be sure, without comparison, because we are not told, this is the text given by Mr. Crawhall. The pictures of the Uncle bargaining with the two ruffians, and of the scattering of the leaves by the Robin, are excellent. The songs of "I know what I know," and "Jemmy and Nancy," might very well, like the "Barkeshire Lady," have been written yesterday for a half-penny broadsheet. How Jemmy was sent to sea to get him out of the way of Nancy; how a lady of Barbadoes made love to Jemmy, and what the Barbadian ladies used to be like; how Jemmy was treacherously thrown overboard and drowned, and how his Ghost walked may be seen here much more beautifully told by the pictures than by the text. The drowning of Jemmy, represented by a bare arm just sinking under the water, is very dramatic. We must, however, enter a protest against the practice of writing remarks of more than dubious wit upon the pictures. Thus, under the drawing of the Ghost the editor actually allows himself to write, "The genuine old article, none of yer table-turning and tambourine tricks here"; and in another place, when he draws the portrait of a beautiful lady, all patches and paint, he writes within the frame, "Talk of raptures, flames, and darts." And once he draws for a tail-piece a well with the legend "Au reservoir"!

The ballad called "Blew cap for me," we are informed, is taken from the Roxburghe Collection; but, like "Jemmy and Nancy," might, like the drawings, have been made yesterday. The suitors of every nation who make love to the Scottish lass are admirably drawn, the best perhaps being the Spaniard. This is followed by a very lively ballad called "John and Joan," the story of a couple who were too much alike, and would always do the same thing at the same time:—

> If John his dog had beaten,
> Then Joan would beat her cat.
> If John, in scorn,
> His hand would burn,
> Joan would have burned her hat.
> If John would break a pipkin,
> Then Joan would break a pot.
> Thus he and she > Did both agree
> To waste all they had got.

It is, however, in the "History of George Barnewell" that Mr. Crawhall displays his full strength. Nowhere, surely, has vice been rendered more repulsive or beauty less attractive. From the first moment when the "gallant dainty dame" digs the astonished and terrified prentice in the ribs unto the last, when, with flaming cheek and doubled fist, she drives him from her presence, there can be but one opinion about Sarah—that as regards her personal experience she was as unfortunate as she was in her moral deficiencies. Further, one cannot but think that George, whose eyes appear to have been opened before the hanging, must have derived some consolation in his last moments from thinking that at least he should never set eyes upon his Sarah any more. As for himself, he is faithfully and feelingly drawn; one recognizes the type; he is sheepish and shy; he is imaginative and short-sighted; he is credulous and amorous. Even the unspeakable Sarah appears to him a sweet and lovely damsel. To sum up, the volume is funny, but of such fun one may very easily have too much. We understand from an announcement at the end of the book that many other "olde ffrendes with newe faces" are in preparation; we beg beforehand for some little information about each, and for a few words of explanation from the editor, especially about the rules, or the absence of rule, as regards the spelling and the supposed period of each drawing.

FENCING AND FENCING MASTERS.*

MUCH has been written in sundry languages, especially French, on the art and practice of arms, and a good store of material has been collected in various forms for the history of the subject. But somehow the history itself has never been written. The nearest approach we know to such a history is the critical outline of previous literature which is prefixed to Possellier's treatise on fencing. Dumas, in the amusing preface he contributed to the work of his friend and master Grisier, touched but only touched the matter. Handbooks on armour and weapons, military histories, and to some little extent the books which treat of duelling under various aspects, fix a point here and give a hint there, but that is all. Anecdotic books on duelling are many but, with the exception of such books as Les Drames de l'Epée, they are mostly the work of book-makers of the commonest sort and are even remarkably barren of this kind of information. A fair field was therefore open to M. Emile Mérignac when he undertook to discourse at large of the history of fencing from the earliest times. He bears a name that alone commands attention, for his brother is second to none in the profession of arms in Paris, and is the master of a school where the correctness of classical tradition is happily combined with the freedom and vigour of the moderns. Only the first volume of M. Mérignac's work has yet appeared, and it is concerned only with the ancient world. The publishers were mistaken, in our opinion, in producing it in this manner. For we can hardly doubt that, when he comes to things belonging to modern history or within his own knowledge, M. Mérignac will have something really interesting to tell us; and it is not doing himself justice to send forth in advance a volume which is essentially a compilation, and of which it may even be doubted how far it is relevant to the main theme.

There is no authentic definition of what is included in the term "fencing," or l'escrime, or the equivalent words in other languages. It may be taken to include the use of any hand-weapon whatever, as distinguished from missile weapons, which gives room for any degree of skill. In this sense it is used by M. Mérignac; and, as far as etymology and literary authority go, there is no exception to be taken. But in modern usage the term is practically confined to the skilled use of the sword, and in particular the thrusting sword; it is implied, moreover, that the sword has to do the work of defence as well as of attack. The modern art of fencing dates, beyond question, from the abandonment of shields and defensive armour. Fencing, in our modern sense, did not and could not exist when the combatant put his trust in the sword only for smiting. Now it seems to us that, from the point of view of a modern fencer, the earlier history of the arts of personal attack and defence is important only so far as it leads up to the opening of the modern period. The development of swordsmanship in the three centuries from Sainct-Didier to Cordelois has been far greater than all that was done from the first appearance of an iron sword in Europe to the first systematic treatment of fencing by the Italian masters of the sixteenth century. Whatever is earlier is, as regards the history of fencing, prehistoric. And the only possible "Histoire de l'escrime dans l'antiquité," short of a general history of arms and armour, is an account showing how the exercise of arms in the ancient and mediæval world was not what we understand by fencing, but something extremely different. It is therefore, in our eyes, an offence against proportion to assign an equal share to the so-called fencing of the ancients in an historical exposition. Here, indeed, the moderns do not even get an equal share, for this volume does not come down to the middle ages.

The truth is that M. Mérignac, dealing probably with unfamiliar matter, has failed to deal with it critically. What he has given us is an extremely miscellaneous collection of information and anecdotes, of extremely various value, concerning the use of arms in Asia, Egypt, Greece, and the Roman Empire. No classical scholar will find anything new to him in the two long chapters entitled "L'Escrime chez les Grecs" and "L'Escrime chez les Romains," and many matters of doubtful authenticity are included. The detailed account of the Roman gladiators appears to be faithfully enough worked up from the best French books on Roman society and manners. M. Mérignac might perhaps have made it interesting if he had considered from his own point of view how far the skill of the gladiator, either in aim or in execution, resembled that of a modern swordsman. But he has simply taken the current statements (pieced together as they are from vague and dispersed materials) just as one may find them in any dictionary of antiquities. Accordingly this chapter is tedious, and, for any one who can refer to a dictionary of antiquities, superfluous. And with all this M. Mérignac's information about Roman military weapons is sadly wanting in precision. Either the few pages given to the subject in Lacombe's Les Armes et les Armures, or Lindenschmit's recent monograph, Tracht und Bewaffnung des römischen Heeres während der Kaiserzeit, will be found far more useful by those who want to know definitely what the arms and accoutrements of a Roman legionary were like. In the same way the Greek chapter is stuffed out with confused mythology and much irrelevant matter about the Olympic festival and the like, while the reform in arms and equipments introduced by Iphicrates—one of the few points in the ancient history of the military art on which we have perfectly clear and trustworthy knowledge—is disposed of in a few lines. A rather serious omission is that no notice is taken of the swords found by Dr. Schliemann at Mycenæ. These are of a long and narrow pattern, quite unlike the leaf-shaped sword that is familiar to us in Greek art of the classical period. They are more like the swords represented on Assyrian sculptures than anything else; and their occurrence among prehistoric Greek objects, together with the apparently complete disappearance of the type in historical times, raises various questions which have not yet been answered. Did the Greeks give up long swords for short ones, and if so, why? Was it because they did not know how to handle the longer weapon effectively—a position which might perhaps be supported by some of the archaic gems in Dr. Schliemann's find? Or were these long swords peculiar to some one dynasty or tribe? Can we connect them with the "great Thracian sword" mentioned, seemingly as a notable thing, by Homer (Iliad, xiii. 577)? What, again, was the sword of the Homeric heroes? Are we to suppose it leaf-shaped, or rather of this newly-found Mycenæ type? It would be more profitable to discuss points of this kind than to copy well-worn incidents from the manuals of antiquities, or to take the Cyropædia (as M. Mérignac does in his innocence) for an historical authority on the manners of the ancient Persians. Also certain elaborately ornamented sword or rather dagger blades found at Mycenæ more recently, and described and figured in Greek and German archæological journals, ought to have been noticed in a work pretending to completeness.

The chapter on "L'Escrime chez les Israélites" has the merit of novelty so far as its title goes. We were not aware, before reading M. Mérignac's book, of anything in the Old Testament, beyond the general and manifest fact that the sword was a favourite weapon, to suggest that the Hebrews cultivated anything like fencing. The nearest approach to evidence is the story of the deadly combat between twelve of Abner's men and the like number of Joab's (2 Sam. ii.) "And Abner said to Joab, Let the young men now arise and play before us. And Joab said, Let them arise. Then there arose and went over by number twelve of Benjamin, which pertained to Ish-bosheth the son of Saul, and twelve of the servants of David. And they caught every one his fellow by the head, and thrust his sword in his fellow's side; so they fell down together." This looks as if Saul's and David's men were resolute enough in attack, but paid very little attention to defence. M. Mérignac unaccountably has no mention of this, one of the most striking incidents in a wild and striking history. The omission is hardly compensated by an indifferent illustration—derived, of course, wholly from the artist's fancy—of the victory of Gideon.

A curious inexactness of judgment and want of grasping things at first-hand runs through M. Mérignac's work, even where no particular scholarship or research is needed. After stating that Eastern swords are much curved ("recourbée presque en demi-cercle" is an exaggeration as regards any form in common use), he adds, "Les Orientaux croient que cette forme taille bien mieux et fait une blessure plus dangereuse que si elle était droite." A swordsman writing of his own craft ought not to leave it uncertain whether Asiatics are right or wrong in believing that a curved blade (other things being equal) cuts better than a straight one. The fact has been confirmed, and the reason fully explained, by more than one European writer, and chiefly by M. Mérignac's countryman, Colonel Marey. On the whole, then, we cannot say that M. Emile Mérignac's book is worth much as far as it has gone. We can only hope (though not with assurance) for better things when he comes to the modern history of fencing. Meanwhile, there are some amusing things up and down this volume; for example, a surprising account, taken from M. Jacolliot, of a whole troop of elephants belonging to the late Rajah of Mysore, who had been taught fencing and handled a foil very prettily with their trunks. On one occasion two of them fought a duel with swords. We can believe almost anything of the intelligence of elephants, but one might have some better authority than M. Jacolliot. We should be glad to know if any British Resident at Mysore, or any other native court, has heard of the like.

M. Vigeant has illustrated the history of modern fencing in a different manner. He has produced a biographical sketch of Jean-Louis, a master of the early part of this century who is now in some danger of being forgotten by the younger generation, partly because he wrote nothing, partly because, after making his reputation as a regimental master-at-arms in the campaigns of Napoleon, he settled not at Paris, but at Montpellier. By M. Vigeant, who knew him well, Jean-Louis is placed at the head of the teachers of his time. Amateurs of fencing will find the book amusing, though they may also find some little difficulty, notwithstanding M. Vigeant's assurances (which of course we should trust as to anything really within his own knowledge), in accepting as authentic at all points one or two of the exploits recounted of Jean-Louis in his earlier days. It is credible that a quarrel between a French and an Italian regiment in the army of occupation in Spain should have been settled by a solemn duel between the regimental fencing-masters, and that Jean-Louis, as the chief instructor of the French regiment in question, should have taken a leading part in it with distinction. But it is much to believe that he saved his own side all trouble in the matter by himself killing or disabling thirteen adversaries without once being touched. Apart from such more than Homeric feats, however, there is quite enough to make Jean-Louis an interesting person. Beginning life as an "enfant de troupe" in the armies of the First Republic, a weakly-looking mulatto, without parents or friends, he gradually rose to be not only a perfect master of fence, but a master who commanded the personal respect of his pupils, comrades, and superior officers, and was not unfrequently consulted in affairs of importance touching personal or regimental honour. In his old age he appeased a long-standing feud between the Engineers and the Infantry quartered at Montpellier by the bold and simple device of giving a military assault of arms in his own name, inviting the picked men of both branches of the service to contend, and the rest of the garrison to look on; and at the end making the men a speech, and, with all the authority of his position as "le père de l'escrime," compelling them to abjure their enmity. Moreover, Jean-Louis succeeded in making so good a pupil of his daughter that she completely took the conceit out of a young professional (a stranger to the school of Jean-Louis), who had thought it impossible that a woman could be a serious adversary. The memory of both father and daughter (she married, and died young) is still fresh, M. Vigeant tells us, at Montpellier. He has done well to preserve it in this little record for lovers of the art, though we cannot in conscience wholly acquit him of the besetting fault of French writers of personal memoirs and anecdotes—making a small halfpennyworth of bread carry a great deal of sack. For the benefit of studious fencers, it may be noted that M. Vigeant has by way of appendix published a series of Jean-Louis's lessons. There is nothing in them that will be absolutely new to the pupils of any good master of the present day, but they may be consulted with advantage.

RECENT MUSIC.

DR. VILLIERS STANFORD'S Songs of Old Ireland is a very welcome addition to our collections of national melodies. The fifty Irish songs which make up the volume which Messrs. Boosey & Co. have sent us have been hitherto unknown in England, and all lovers of national music will be grateful to Dr. Stanford for rescuing them from the obscurity in which they have been so long hidden. The words, when not entirely new, as the editor tells us, are founded upon Celtic or Anglo-Irish originals, and are the work of Mr. Alfred Perceval Graves, who has certainly succeeded in preserving their character and simplicity in a remarkable manner. Where all are good it is difficult to point to any particular song as better than the other, but we think "Awake, awake Fianna," "The Return from Fingal," and "The Lament for Owen Roe O'Neill," are amongst the most interesting for their clearly-marked nationality. "The Return from Fingal" is supposed by some to be the march played or sung by the troops of Brian Boroimhe, the Irish Bretwalda, and celebrates the great battle of Clontarf, which was fought between the Irish and the Danes on Good Friday, A.D. 1014, when the King Brian, "who was too aged to fight, was foully murdered whilst at prayer in the Royal tent by a party of retreating Danes." In this collection there appears a charming melody under the name of "Colleen Oge Asthore," to which Mr. Graves says, upon the authority of Dr. Stokes and Malone, "Shakspeare alludes in the play of Henry V., act iv., scene 4, where Pistol, on meeting a French soldier, exclaims, 'Quality! Calen o custure me!'"; and he also suggests that this air was brought over from Ireland by Edmund Spenser. The "Spinning-wheel Song" is a delicious piece of work with a highly characteristic accompaniment, and the two Lullabys are charming in their unaffected simplicity; while "Still Side by Side" will rank amongst the most tenderly pathetic of national ballads. The humorous panegyric on "Father O'Flynn" is capital and well merited by the Reverend Father of whom it is related—

> Once the Bishop looked grave at your jest
> Till this remark set him off with the rest,
> "Is it lave gaiety, all to the laity, > Cannot the Clergy be Irishmen too?"
> Here's a health to you Father O'Flynn,
> Slainté and slainté and slainté agin, &c.

It is hardly necessary to remark that the accompaniments to the songs are all very skilfully arranged, seeing that they are the work of so conscientious and accomplished a musician as Dr. Stanford, who, it may be said, has dedicated the volume to Johannes Brahms.

We have received from Signor Ricordi a pianoforte arrangement of Rossini's opera of Othello, one of the "Cheap Edition of Complete Operas for Pianoforte Solo," which, if it may be taken as a specimen of the whole series, speaks very well for the care with which the series has been edited. A short biography of Rossini precedes the work, and the words of the songs are in many cases given, which is a new feature in pianoforte solo arrangements, and has evident advantages. When we say that the longest operas in the edition—such as, for instance, Semiramide and Les Huguenots—do not cost more than eighteenpence, it will be conceded that they are marvellous specimens of typography and cheapness.

Of sheet music we have from the same publisher two songs by Luigi Caracciolo—"I always Meet You in My Dreams" and "An Old Wreath"—of which the latter is, perhaps, the more musicianly, while the former is more popular in form; but both are effective and above the average standard of drawing-room songs. "One Year Ago To-night" and "Her Portrait," both by Alfred Allen, are sent to us by Messrs. Morley & Co., and fully sustain the opinion which we have already expressed of the composer's power of writing unaffected and genuine melodies, pleasing both to critics and amateurs. A batch of songs, the words of which are written by H. Delavie and published by C. Jefferys, are also before us. Three of them—"A Fleeting Thought," "Tinted October," and "Home Everywhere"—by Michael Watson, are pleasing songs, and well within the singing powers of all amateurs; while "Milley Mahony," by W. C. Levey, will be welcome to those who are fond of the modern Irish ballad. "Come, glorious Morn," a sacred song by Ed. Reyloff, is hardly up to the mark which the composer is capable of; but "The Butterfly," by Berthold Tours, is a sprightly and delicate song, well worth the trouble of learning.

A number of songs from Messrs. Keppel & Co. have also reached us, amongst which three songs by Joseph L. Roeckel are worthy of praise. In "A Song without Words" the composer has very ingeniously introduced the well-known "Lied ohne Worte" (No. 9, Book I.) of Mendelssohn, an experiment not always successful, but which in this instance, owing to the delicate manner in which it is handled, proves very effective. It is as well to state that this song is written for pianoforte and harmonium accompaniment, a fact which is not indicated on the title-page. "Three Magpies," like everything by Joseph L. Roeckel, is a graceful and musical production; while the duet "A Pathway Fair," from the same pen, is one of the most charming of its kind. Amongst the many songs by Ciro Pinsuti which have been sent to us from time to time, "For One Alone" we think will take a high rank as pleasing and effective; while the duet "Meeting" is worthy of the reputation which the composer has attained as a writer of this kind of music. Two songs by A. H. Behrend, called "Not Yet" and "Hope, my Darling," are pretty and effective, and present no difficulties in execution, whilst "Waking and Dreaming" and "The Lovers' Leap," both by Ethel Harraden, are well above the average in merit. Harriet Kendall's "What Might Have Been" is a carefully written song, with a pretty refrain in waltz time, which will doubtless become popular; and A. L. Mora's "Beyond" commends itself as well written and decidedly effective. "Hail and Farewell," by Desmond L. Ryan; "The Sad Little Lass," by Thomas Anderton; and "Ever Since Then," by Hugh Clendon, are all good specimens of drawing-room ballads; and "Loved for Ever," by W. Carter, and the "The Maiden's Nay," by George Fox, may be recommended for their simplicity and pleasing melody. A minuet entitled "Margery," by Thomas Anderton, is an unambitious but uninteresting piece for the pianoforte solo; while the "Cigarette Polka," by J. Menier, is about as original as such music generally is.

Messrs. W. Marshall & Co. are the publishers of three songs by William M. Hutchinson. "Pierrot" is not so good as some of this composer's earlier works; while "Mine Again" and "The Little Mandarin," a humorous song, are both in his now well-known style. All these songs are reproduced as dance music, a fact which we cannot help thinking weighs too much with the composer in their original production.

Messrs. Metzler & Co. have sent us two arrangements for the American organ by Louis Engel, the one an Andante, the slow movement in the C Minor Symphony, by Beethoven, and the other an Andante by Chopin, which are easy of execution and as effective as such adaptations can be; and Book I. of a series of arrangements for the same instrument by Frederick Archer, consisting of excerpts from Corelli, André, Butterfield, and Handel, of which we may say the same thing. From the same publishers we have received an "Intermède-Gavotte," by J. Goudareau, a quaint imitation of Rameau, which we think is more interesting as written for the violin and piano than as a solo for the pianoforte; the song which has been nightly sung at the Lyceum Theatre in Ingomar, "Love and Beauty," and the Parthenia Waltz, both by Andrew Levey, and which are now so well known that it is not necessary to say more about them. The Christmas number of The Musical Bijou, edited by P. Bucalossi, contains, among other pieces of dance music, a new waltz entitled "Micuela," from the popular pen of Emile Waldteufel. Four songs published by Messrs. W. Morley & Co. are worthy of notice—"Sunshine," by Thomas Hutchinson, to words by M. J. Scott, a graceful melody, with a pleasing rhythm; "Gentle Faces" and "Staunch and True," both by Theo. Bonheur, which show that the composer is capable of writing very taking ballad music; and "The Nightless Land," by Ciro Pinsuti, to words by D'Arcy Jaxone, a song which fully sustains its composer's deservedly well-merited reputation. A "national chorus," under the name of "Tel-el-Kebir," by D. Middleton, and published by Messrs. Novello & Co., has also reached us. It will doubtless become popular amongst the many singing classes which exist in England, as will also that remarkable pennyworth of music, vocal and instrumental, named The Musical Budget.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

IT is a pity that the author of Jacques Vingtras should have been selected to write the letterpress for the magnificent volume (1) which M. Charpentier has devoted to the streets of London. M. Jules Vallès's quarrel with humanity in general is sufficiently well known, and nine years' sojourn among us seems to have concentrated the quarrel on his part against English humanity in particular. To examine his statements in detail would be absurd, for they have little more connexion with actual fact than those of the celebrated Frenchman who represented the usual close of an English dinner-party as a "boxe de gentlemen piétinant les dames ivres de gin et de wisky." If we take one sentence of M. Vallès's own—"l'Anglais a la haine instinctive, aveugle de ce qui est français: chaque habitude de Paris le blesse"—and substitute Français for Anglais and Londres for Paris, M. Vallès's own attitude will be sufficiently described. On the other hand, M. Lançon's illustrations are of great merit. M. Lançon, though his work has appeared now and then in the Portfolio and elsewhere, is perhaps less known to Englishmen than some other French etchers. His etching is, however, of the right kind, and this book contains some capital examples of it. There is a certain tendency to gratuitous uglinoss, and some of M. Lançon's types are not English at all, but conspicuously French. Such plates, however, as the large one of "A Servant Girl Cleaning Windows," and as "The Mews at Torrington Square," show equal power in conception and execution, and as much may be said of many others, both in and out of the text.

(1) La rue à Londres. Texte par Jules Vallès. Illustré par A. Lançon. Paris: Charpentier.

Mme. Camille Selden's book on Heine (2) is disappointing. It seems to be in effect nothing but the working up of an old magazine article, with the addition of a few chiefly insignificant letters. Nothing concerning Heine can be absolutely unimportant or uninteresting, and Mme. Camille Selden has certainly contributed a document for the biographer. But it is a document out of which the biographer will not get much, and which is hardly worth the general reader's attention.

Students of French literature know Théophraste Renaudot, if only from the allusions to his Enquiry Office found in Furetière and other miscellaneous writers of the seventeenth century. But he is probably not much known to readers in general. M. Gilles de la Tourette, in a careful and useful though rather heavily-written monograph (3), has collected most of the available information about this really remarkable personage, who, if not the actual inventor, was the introducer in France not only of Enquiry Offices, but of dispensaries, who did a good deal to found the modern newspaper, and who was the author of the actual system of monts de piété.

It is even more necessary for French than for English men of letters to drop now and then into art-criticism, and M. Edmond About (not for the first time, no doubt) has done his Salon (4). M. Jouaust has given it an unusually attractive form, and the author has, as usual, shown in it his undeniable literary power—we fear it must be said also his undeniable bad taste, if not in art, at any rate in other things.

A new edition of M. Joliet's useful Dictionary of Pseudonyms (5) may be recommended to those who read much of French periodical literature.

Few people, it may be hoped, who know French at all do not know what to expect from a dernier de M. Monselet (6); and assuredly in the present case nobody will be disappointed. Whether the subject be naturalists or ministers, minor poets or people who give theatrical representations by professionals in drawing-rooms, M. Monselet always has at command and always uses the true Gallic gaiety which is so much talked of, so little seen, and so scandalously counterfeited and caricatured. A certain paper here entitled "Le Faublas" ought to make M. Armand Silvestre blush, if that be possible; for even he will scarcely set down M. Monselet as a Philistine.

M. François Coppée's recent Odéon tragedy (7) is a more ambitious effort than is usual with him, and no doubt ought not to be spoken of without a certain respect. But we cannot help thinking that the weight of five acts and of cloaks and daggers is too much for M. Coppée. His amiable pathos and limp fluent verse were not meant for these things.

With the close of the year one of the oldest and best reputed of Continental reviews—the Bibliothèque universelle (8)—has nearly reached its ninetieth anniversary. It has also come into the hands of a new London publisher, Mr. Stanford. On the whole, there are probably few periodicals of the kind which can be better recommended to those tolerably numerous English households which feel some interest in what is going on abroad, but have no access to foreign periodicals at large. The original articles in the Bibliothèque are excellent, but its main feature is the large space allowed to chroniques of the different Continental countries.

Three remarkable books of fiction present a welcome change to the reader wearied with infinite second-rate stuff on the Ohnet-Daudet-Delpit models, with which Parisians appear infatuated. Perhaps Mme. Henry Gréville has written better books than L'ingénue (9), but she has never written one more amusing or one more totally free from any possible objection on the score of subject. Her ingénue is a very dubious ingénue, a sort of prosaic Emma Bovary, to whom fortune refuses Emma's woes as well as her vices. But she is drawn with extreme cleverness; and so is everybody around her, especially the formidable Mme. Anglois, whom we venture to think the author's best single creation. The book is one to be recommended without stint or qualification. In L'idéal (10) a writer of perhaps higher strictly literary powers than Mme. Gréville is still found seeking his way and not quite finding it. In his satire of French "high-life" Anglomania, and in his pointing of the old and fatal moral of attempted platonic attachments between man and woman, M. de Glouvet has got hold of good themes which he works out not ill. But his book is still to write. Indeed, good as is L'idéal, it is perhaps scarcely the equal of Le forestier. But it is far above the average. Nats Micoulin (11) and its companion stories show, for the most part, a very praiseworthy effort on M. Zola's part to get out of the gutter in which he has so long wallowed. The worst of it is that gutters are wont to leave traces even on those who have got out of them completely, which M. Zola has not yet done. There may, however, be some excusable joy over a literary sinner who shows even equivocal signs of repentance. It is not probable that M. Zola will ever be a great novelist, but the vigour of his description and his occasional grasp of a situation appear fairly here.

FOR ENGLISH STUDENTS OF THE CIVIL LAW.
The Latest Edition, in One Volume, 8vo. price 18s.
THE INSTITUTES of JUSTINIAN; Latin Text, chiefly that of HUSCHKE, with English Introduction, Translation, Notes, and Summary. By THOMAS COLLETT SANDARS, M.A. Barrister-at-Law, late Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford. The Seventh Edition, revised.
"There are now extant many epitomes and analyses of Roman Law designed to aid students in their preparation for the Inns of Court and other examinations; but we think any one wishing to possess a fair knowledge of the subject would be very unwise to trust to one of these abridgments without studying the Institutes themselves which Mr Sandars has arranged in so admirable a form. Mr. Sandars' book, however, needs no words of praise to recommend it to students of the Roman Civil Law, upon which subject it has long been a recognized standard text-book. It has now reached its sixth edition. This last is not a mere reprint; much of the work has been rewritten, and numerous alterations and improvements have been suggested to the Author by Mr. Poste's edition of Gaius and by another recent work of considerable pains on Roman Law. In this edition, moreover, the text of Huschke (Leipsic, 1868) has, with a few exceptions, been substituted for that of the Kriegels."

THE MILLIONAIRE. (Originally published in "Blackwood's Magazine.") 3 vols. crown 8vo. 25s. 6d.

"'The Millionaire' shows much ability. It is never dull. No just idea of its merits could be given without saying that it is a novel of a high order, and a piece of excellent workmanship."—Athenæum.

"Where the author breaks new ground is in America, with railroad beings of New York and the bobby bits of Washington; the character of Dexter Fife, the millionaire, is wholly fresh and wonderfully interesting. The book throughout is smart and racy."—World.

"A good, well-written, dramatically conceived story. What is more, there is a great deal of admirable dialogue in it."—Scotsman.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY by ANTHONY TROLLOPE. 2 vols. post 8vo. with Portrait, 21s.

"Mr. Trollope never wrote anything more vivid or more graphic than the Autobiography which has just been issued."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"I am closing these two volumes—and no reader, we venture to say, will close them without regret—we are forced to the conclusion that the flood of light poured by them upon the inner life of Anthony Trollope, upon his early trials and subsidings, upon the brave mother from whom he derived so many of his best qualities, and upon the tenderness, creativeness, and courage of their author, will but serve to make his countrymen regard him with increased admiration and respect."—Daily Telegraph.

"Since Mr Trevelyan told the story of his uncle's life, there has been published in England no more genuine or interesting record of a literary career than that unfolded in these volumes."—Saturday Review.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MISS MOLLY."

ALISON. By the Author of "Miss Molly," "Delicia," "Geraldine Hawthorne," &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo. 25s. 6d.

"'Alison' is a very graceful, and though ending happily enough to satisfy the most exacting reader, a very touching story, which will well maintain the reputation of the author of 'Miss Molly.'"—John Bull.

"Those who like a quiet story without sensationalism of any kind, but yet, at the same time, an admirable study of the inner life and its affections, will find undoubted pleasure in this work."—Academy.

"The author's pure mind breathes in every line and every word she writes, and books like hers do much to elevate and enrich the reader's understanding."—Whitehall Review.

"It is a pleasant book, and the dialogue is unusually bright and daintily humorous."—Guardian.

AN EGYPTIAN POLICY AT LAST.

THE tardy and partial resolve of HER MAJESTY'S Government to adopt a definite Egyptian policy is in itself a matter supplying an almost infinite number of points for comment. When there is added to it the comment already made by the various organs of European public opinion, the infinity becomes positive. In no space immediately at the disposal of any publicist would it be possible to deal with even the majority of the more important points thus suddenly presented. The discontent shown almost unanimously by the civilized world at the abandonment of a vast tract of the world's surface to savagery is no light matter even if it be admitted (as by any fair controversialist it must be admitted) that the orbis terrarum here judges in a new sense securus—that probably very few of the objectors would like to have the task, whose refusal they blame when it is the act of England, thrown on their own country. It is significant enough that the chief London newspaper which supports the Government has expressed (in a manner the reverse of respectful to a Ministry which is supposed by its friends to be above all things moral) the conviction that the resumption of the Soudan proffered to Turkey cannot be serious, and that, if it is serious, it is wholly abominable The doings of any Egyptian Ministry may be regarded as very minor matters. But it must again be admitted (though the admission will have to be made by a different class of persons from those who admit the possible hollowness of Continental grumbles) that CHERIF PASHA and his colleagues in striking their flag have at any rate, however contradictory the statement may sound, marched out with flying colours. Their new-found respect for the integrity of the Turkish Empire and the provisions of the Egyptian Constitution may be extremely suspicious in itself. But it is a very awkward protest against the sudden assumption of practically despotic authority by a Power which has hitherto protested and vowed that it feels the utmost delicacy in interfering with constitutional matters in Egypt Lastly, the acceptance of office by NUBAR PASHA undoubtedly places the ablest man who is to be found in what may be loosely called the Egyptian public service at the nominal helm. But hardly any one who knows Egypt at all would select NUBAR, of all Egyptian statesmen or quasi statesmen, as that one who commands most confidence from any party in the country itself. As a delegate of England, no one not an English subject may be preferable, as the choice of Egypt in any sense, he may be regarded as having simply no existence. But the full discussion of all these matters at once could only be unsatisfactory and confusing; and for the present it is better to confine attention to two points, each of which can be handled with some approach to completeness.

In the first place, it is clear that the recent step taken by the English Government is in effect a more decisive and irretraceable step in the direction of assuming complete and final control over Egypt than anything short of the annexation of the country sans phrase could be. This must have been the first thought which struck any reader of the ultimatum; and it is creditable to some of the supporters of the Government that they did not hesitate to recognize it. The "absolute shall" in the relations of one country to another can hardly go further than this peremptory demand that the other country shall abandon a great part of its territory, recognised as belonging to it for a great number of years, and in places still held by its military and civil officials. The responsibility incurred by England would, as a matter of fact, have been less if she had landed twenty thousand Indian troops at Souakim, and had undertaken to reconquer the Soudan, than when, as now, she has forced the unwilling KHEDIVE and his unwilling Ministers to acquiesce in its abandonment. In the one case, England would have been acting at her own risk, and would have been the arbiter of the range and duration of the action. In the other, she has thrown the immediate risk and loss on Egypt, and has by implication undertaken to see Egypt, if the terms are accepted, safe out of it. To a philosopher who had leisure to reflect on the way in which extremes meet, this incurring of a practically unlimited guarantee—for England must now be held liable not merely to defend Egypt up to Wady Halfa, but to satisfy any just demands of Turkey arising from the abandonment of Egypt beyond Wady Halfa—out of, as it would seem, mere unwillingness to give any guarantee at all, might be a very curious study The rashness of cowardice is not a new theme, but fresh illustrations of it must always be interesting Into this, however, it is not necessary to enter. "As we have insisted on Egypt being defended in "English fashion," says the Pall Mall Gazette, a sufficiently unsuspected authority in this case, "the defence of Egypt "passes into our hands." It is the truth, but not the whole truth. For by this action we have incurred to Egypt an indefinite but all the more inevitable liability for any damage which her unwilling acceptance of our advice may inflict on her. By forcing her to make jettison of a part, we have insured the whole cargo at our risk. In some reading of history it is difficult to remember any undertaking so Quixotic with the Quixotism of poltroonery. It is scarcely surprising that some foreign and unfriendly critics should remember that a Quixote poltroon can always get himself out of his difficulties by running away.

There is one other point which can be discussed at present with advantage, though not with complete knowledge. The proposed withdrawal from the Soudan, or retrocession of the Soudan to Turkey, may have three different meanings, and it is yet not clear which of two of those meanings is the meaning of HER MAJESTY'S Government. The simple abandonment of the attempt to reconquer Kordofan and Darfur for the present—even the shortening considerably of the cordon of Egyptian garrisons which lately stretched along the Nile towards the Equator—would hardly have met with disapproval from anybody. If Egypt ever had any business to attempt the holding of all North-Western Central Africa, she certainly is not in a position now to reaffirm her hold on it at her own cost and by her own strength. Nor, with the possibility of serious complications in parts of the world which concern England more directly, would many Englishmen choose the present moment for an African crusade. But the matter becomes very different when the abandonment of all Nubia—a territory which has been Egyptian for generations—and the relinquishment of the Upper Nile to barbarism is proposed Without sharing the one-idea'd fancies of anti-slavery fanatics, it is perfectly possible to see that the Nile, at least up to its junction with the Atbara, and more probably up to the confluence of its two main streams, ought to be held and policed by any civilised or semi-civilized Power which commands its lower course. There is no doubt whatever that, with vigorous action on the part of the English Government when the news of HICKS PASHA'S defeat first arrived, Berber easily, and Khartoum without any great difficulty, could have been made safe against any possible enemy, and that the Soudan east of the river could, with the river's course, have been tranquillized and retained. It is in the refusal to do this that the most certain action and the least disputable as far as certain error of the English Government consists. But has its error gone further still? A Radical journal says that "the abandonment of Souakim is too preposterous to "be discussed"; but the English Note in the official Report speaks of the Eastern Soudan as to be retroceded to Turkey en bloc, and no reservation is made of the Littoral. It is, indeed, difficult to think that even such an apostle of withdrawal as Mr. GLADSTONE, such a willing advocate of it as Sir EVELYN BARING, can seriously have proposed that a stretch of ground inside the Red Sea giving the only direct adit to the Soudan on the east should become No Man's Land, which is what the proposal, in its "preposterous" sense, comes to, and it is perfectly certain that if such a proposal has been entertained that coast will very soon cease to be No Man's Land. For years past the eyes both of France and Italy have been fixed longingly on this coast. Both countries have wasted money and trouble on worthless or nearly worthless posts within and without the Straits, neither of which can be compared for a moment with Souakim, either in political importance or commercial prospects. To Turkey Souakim would be of little value; indeed, the possession of it would almost oblige the Porte to a costly and difficult war. Nor, if it is once abandoned by Egypt under the mandate of Great Britain, can the latter have any ground for objecting to its sale or transfer to another European Power. Few nations are strong enough to play the dog in the manger nowadays; none is strong enough to keep the manger taboo without even taking the precaution, as the dog did, of occupying it. If the Government really thinks of making Egypt evacuate the Red Sea Littoral of Nubia, all that can be said is that the country must act as it acted in the case of the LESSEPS Convention. But if the Government does not, its Note to the Egyptian Government must have been one of the worst-worded or worst-reported State papers that have for many years issued from an English Government office. NUBAR PASHA is said, it is true, to have disclaimed any idea of abandoning Souakim. But this does not explain the difficulty of offering to Turkey the nominal retrocession of a province without the gate of that province, nor does it remove the fact that the English Government has not pronounced on the matter.

THE TRANSVAAL DELEGATES.

IT was not at first certain whether a late article in the Times on the negotiation with the Transvaal delegates accurately represented the decision of the Colonial Office and the Government. It is sometimes convenient, especially when Parliament is not sitting, to publish official information through the newspapers in the recognized form of an ostensibly "communicated" article; but independent journalists cannot be compelled to transmit the inspiration from above through a colourless medium; and Lord DERBY, if he confided his decision to the Times, can scarcely have anticipated the defiant tone which seems inconsistent with a virtual apology for helplessness and failure. It seemed probable that the statement might be substantially correct. Mr. KRUGER and his colleagues had, according to the statement, dictated their own terms, having perhaps gauged Lord DERBY's capacity for yielding by their bold experiment of summarily executing a prisoner for whom the English Government had condescended to intercede. There was no reason to apprehend that any concession made by the Colonial Minister would be disavowed by the Government. If the Times is well-informed, the affairs of the Transvaal were fully discussed at the Cabinet Council, which might have been expected to occupy itself exclusively with more pressing questions of Egyptian policy. On the same authority it was announced that the Bechuana frontier is to be modified by the inclusion within the Transvaal of all territories which may be occupied at the request and with the consent of the respective chiefs. The delegates may perhaps not have thought it necessary to furnish the English Government with evidence which may satisfy possible doubts as to the voluntary nature of the cession.

The reasonable demand of the independence of the trade route from the Cape Colony to the interior was met by a proposed compromise under which the road would be neutralized and be exempted from taxation. It now appears that Lord DERBY has defined a boundary which will leave the whole course of the trade route to the west of the territory conceded to the Transvaal. The arrangement is to secure the independence of MANKOROANE and MONSIOA, but the delegates complain that some of the lands of chiefs friendly to the Boers will also be excluded. The delegates had during the negotiation protested against an alleged interference with their sovereign rights, and suggested that there was more than one route which led to the same regions. The case had not been provided for in the Sand River Convention, for the obvious reason that there was then no trade with the interior, and that the emigrant Boers had not then thought of claiming a right to control the commerce of the English colony. No information has been given as to the pretension to relief from the pecuniary liabilities which were accepted at the time of the Pretoria Convention. It perhaps matters little whether a debt which will not in any case be paid is legally remitted. The equitable and moral claim of the English Government to the expenses which it undertook during the time of the annexation for the benefit of the Transvaal may be confidently affirmed, but it is easy to anticipate the plausible sophisms which might excuse attempts at repudiation. In private transactions of an analogous kind the creditor would be content to prove the acknowledgment of the debt in a document which recorded the terms of a deliberate contract. The same uncertainty affects the claim to nominal as well as real independence, which again involves the contingent right of diplomatic intercourse with foreign Powers. It may be conjectured that, in deference to popular opinion, of which Mr. FORSTER has been the most conspicuous exponent, some verbal security has been given for the protection of the natives within and beyond the limits of the Transvaal. The present arrangement will at least not be followed, like the Pretoria Convention, by disappointment of reasonable expectations. No Bechuana chief will henceforth be sanguine enough to rely on English protection beyond the very limited extent which Lord DERBY has proposed and to which, it is said, the Cape Colony is prepared to give its assent.

The apparently official apologist of the Government was perhaps not well advised in the arguments by which a mortifying surrender was vindicated. In substance it was contended that no concession would be withheld from negotiators who, in default of agreement, would have assumed to themselves the rights and powers which they demanded. During the last Session Lord DERBY reasoned to the same effect in an unseasonably candid speech. It would, as he said, be difficult and costly, though not perhaps impossible, to coerce the Boers; and it was inferred that they might consequently control all future negotiations. Lord DERBY's characteristic dislike of fictions has sometimes led him to indulge in indiscreet candour. It is generally unwise to inform an adverse litigant that, if he persists in his demands, he will inevitably prevail. Mr. FORSTER, in his eloquent speech, boldly accepted the challenge of one of the audience by declaring that, if necessary, he would fight in preference to abandoning the duties which the nation had undertaken. On the other hand, it is true that it would at present be inexpedient to resort to force; but circumstances may change, unforeseen opportunities may occur, and a de jure protectorate over the native races of South Africa may not improbably prove at some future time to be an element of political power. The Convention of Pretoria retains its full legal value, as far as it is not repealed or altered as a result of the present negotiation. The Boers may carry out the threat, which the delegates are said to have uttered, that, if they return to the Transvaal without having effected a settlement, they will act as if their demands had been conceded; but a confessedly lawless usurpation has only a precarious tenure. Notwithstanding their warlike aptitude, the Boers of the Transvaal are few in number; and they may at any time be hard pressed by some native confederacy, or by a ruler of the type of CETEWAYO. Only a few years have passed since the Republic was unable to defend itself, even with the aid of the Swazis, against SECOCOENI, a chief not of the highest rank. In the time of danger the Transvaal might perhaps regret that it had assumed an unfriendly attitude towards the Imperial and Colonial Governments.

If in this, as in all other cases, the future is uncertain, events have supplied a conclusive criticism on the blunders of the past. Those who asserted that the conclusion of peace with the Boers in 1880 was a proof of wisdom and even of courage, have been convicted of inexcusable blindness. That the stronger of the belligerents should sue for peace immediately after suffering a series of petty but discreditable defeats was so far a bold measure that it was audaciously paradoxical and wholly unprecedented. It is well known that the military commanders informed the Government that they were prepared to re-establish their superiority in the field; and there was little doubt that, as soon as the late disasters were retrieved, the hostile force would abstain from further resistance. The moment of victory would have been the occasion for liberal redress of legitimate grievances; and it was understood on all sides that the internal independence of the Transvaal would be recognized without hesitation. In defiance of reason and of authoritative warning, Mr. GLADSTONE took the opportunity to throw his warder down. Although few living men have by weakness, or in the indulgence of passionate prejudice, caused so much slaughter as the unwilling participator in the Crimean war, and the zealous promoter of the Russian invasion of Turkey, Mr. GLADSTONE was undoubtedly sincere in his desire on the morrow of Majuba to avoid blood-guiltiness. Among the consequences of his mistaken policy have been the incessant native feuds on the border of the Transvaal, and one of the latest results is the execution of MAMPOER. The PRIME MINISTER is, of course, also responsible for the anarchy and civil war which have followed in Zululand the restoration of CETEWAYO; but even Mr. GLADSTONE cannot attend to the affairs of all the world, and the results of a sentimental caprice may more justly be attributed to Lord KIMBERLEY.

The apologists of the Government, perhaps unjustly, attributed to Lord DERBY a repetition of the error which was universally reprobated in the case of the Suez Canal. The alleged concession of the demands of the Transvaal delegates is excused on the ground of the strong defensible position which they are supposed to occupy. It is, according to the advocates of unlimited concession, useless to contend with adversaries who have possession on their side, or superior local advantages. In the same spirit Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. CHILDERS, by way of justifying their extravagant offers to M. DE LESSEPS, threw away their case by gratuitously admitting or asserting his claim to a disputed monopoly. It may be that in former times Prime Ministers and Foreign Secretaries were too patriotically one sided; but Lord PALMERSTON, who never affected to be impartial when the interests of his country were concerned, was far more fortunate than his cosmopolitan successors in avoiding dangerous collisions. A statesman is bound to consider the rights and even the interests of other nations; but he mistakes his position when in disputes between his own country and other political communities he affects to be an arbitrator rather than an agent. It may be readily admitted that Lord DERBY is not prone to err on the side of sentimental weakness; but in negotiating with the Transvaal delegates he was dealing with difficulties wholly due to the impulsive precipitancy of Mr. GLADSTONE. It would be too much to hope that the mischievous consequences of a long series of errors have at last been terminated.

HYPOCHONDRIA AS A FINE ART.

MR. FRANCIS GALTON is a most interesting writer and a curious inquirer, but it is difficult to praise his latest invention. He has thrown into British families an apple of discord in the shape of 500*l.* to be given as prizes for "family records." He is unconsciously encouraging the practice as a fine art of morbid "introspection" and of hypochondria, which is already far too fashionable. "The "less you think about yourself and your symptoms the "better" is advice most of us have received, and it is very good advice, too, for the individual. "The more you think "about your symptoms, and your father's symptoms, and "your uncle's liver, and your grandmother's gout, the "better," is practically what Mr. GALTON tells society. This course of reflection may be good for science. The world may wax more and more scientific if we do as Mr. GALTON tells us, but the individual will certainly wither and will indubitably become the curse of his family circle.

Mr. GALTON'S 500*l.* is to be distributed among the British families who furnish him with the best "Family Records" before May 15, 1884. The records are wanted for the study of "Heredity," a topic on which Mr. GALTON has written much that is interesting. If we are careful about "strains" and "sires" in breeding racing-stock, why should we not be anxious in selecting proper sires and dams of the human race? PLATO asked the question some time ago, and the Elders of his Utopia were to arrange marriages on scientific principles. But to do this requires knowledge on the very topics which are now only communicated to the sacred confidence of physicians. Mr. GALTON wants these confidences for purposes of science, and his plan for obtaining them is not new. Two years ago the author of that moral work La Faustin requested his lady readers to send him statistics—the statistics of their emotions. "How "did you feel at your first communion?" and on various other intimate occasions, M. E. DE GONCOURT inquired. He wanted "documents" for naturalistic novels; we do not know whether he obtained them. Mr. GALTON makes things easier by allowing his correspondents to use mottoes and similar devices. He publishes two albums, a "Record "of Family Faculties" and a "Life History Album," with blank tables duly arranged, and these tables are to be filled up by the curious who desire a share of 500*l.* The author of the Albums expects a good deal of assistance from ladies. Details of "teething," anecdotes of infant phenomena, much occupy ladies, and are retained in the memories of grandmothers after they have forgotten almost everything else. "A family inquiry greatly interests them, and they are "zealous correspondents." They are indeed.

Useful as these inquiries may prove to science, we cannot conceal our opinion that they will encourage morbid brooding over matters best left "between the hands and on the "knees of gods." The "Life History Album" is a peculiarly gruesome document. We often hear it said of this or that young lady that "she has a history." The patient would like nothing less than to have that history known. The less we think of our histories the better. A character well known in sporting circles has registered a vow "never "to look back." Looking back is terrible work. The further we look the less we like it. We may happen to have watched the declining years of a father or a mother. Mr. GALTON wishes us to write down all about it. We may know that gout, or madness, or consumption, or any other terrible malady, are "in the family." Is it well to fix the mind on their gradual conquest of our dearest kinsfolk, and to look out for the first appearance of the conqueror on our own little territory? "That way madness lies," or suicide. We are all men condemned, with reprieves of indefinite length. It is not agreeable to parade the skeleton at every feast, to reckon up too curiously the instruments in the enemy's torture chamber; to speculate how the rack feels, and how the pilniwinks. Do not let us fix our minds on a contemplation of our spleens, or devote much serious thought to our lungs and livers. Professional physicians can make these notes on themselves and their patients with scientific calmness. The layman is almost certain to become a professional hypochondriac if he once sets to work to reckon up himself, his chances, and his children's chances in the "Life History Album." In this voyage of life we must be more or less reckless adventurers, if we are to venture at all. Don't let us record every cigarette, or be curious to mark the effect of every hour's work on the heart or the chest. The man who is always weighing himself is lost. He will soon take to weighing his food and measuring himself out allowances of milk-and-water.

Mr. GALTON, who is doubtless quite incapable of being "alarmed about himself," puts a very terrifying instrument into the hands of a nervous public when he offers them the Album. "It is to be a record of your Biological experience." "Thank you," we may reply; "but we prefer the faculty, "which THEMISTOCLES envied, of forgetting, especially of "forgetting our Biological experience." From the first pill of buoyant and trustful childhood onward, his biological experience is a thing a man likes to "let slide." This may be unscientific, it may be imprudent, but it is very human. A few facts are deeply impressed, of course—such facts as the imprudence of eating much ice-pudding, or partaking impartially of all the wines at a public dinner. So far, every man of thirty is qualified to be his own doctor. Of course he does not always take his own advice, just as "the wolf "can't keep himself from his own door." Still, most of us know what is right; and we don't want any more biological experience than that unavoidable modicum. Mr. GALTON, however, will find some people only too happy to rummage in their memories, people ready to constitute themselves "Ministers of the Interior," not of themselves alone, but of their relations. Mr. GALTON furnishes them, in the Album, with the necessary "portfolio." First the Minister will draw up a "carefully-prepared family medical history." He will "draw" his grandmother or his old nurse on the subject of croup. He will listen with positive eagerness to his hypochondriac uncle's revelations about his liver—confidences which hitherto have not possessed much interest. He will remember as well as he can all about his own and his brother's experiences of chicken-pox. "Minute inquiries should be made of all surviving relatives," says Mr. GALTON. Sometimes these very minute inquiries will not be received in a kindly or scientific spirit. One can imagine questions which would get the questioner kicked out of the house. Let the young be especially careful. One uncle may make you his heir because you besiege him with queries about his digestion; while another, if you try the same tack with him, will never speak to you again. We can easily fancy a rattling Palais Royal farce founded on the indiscreet use of the "Life History Album." The complications which may ensue are incalculable and comic. But the topic could only be properly and scientifically treated in French and at the Palais Royal. We therefore reluctantly suppress the outline of a farce that thrusts itself unbidden on the constructive fancy.

When you have "drawn" (perhaps in both slang senses of the word) your surviving relatives, you are to correct their replies by the statements of their doctors. Just fancy the golden time of famous physicians occupied by inquirers who want a share of the loot. Why the prize would not pay the preliminary expenses, even if the doctors condescended to give an answer at all, which probably they would decline to do.

Dangerous as it is to practise on our uncles and aunts, it is still more perilous, as we have tried to show, to practise on ourselves. We shall soon convince ourselves that we have every disease that ever carried off any of our ancestors, and every other disease that ingenious fancy can suggest. The poor little children, too, finding all this pother made about them, will grow up professional hypochondriacs. They will always be anxiously trying how much they can pull, how far they can see, how much they weigh, how wide they are round the chest, how little food will support life, or (in a perverse and daring spirit) how much they can eat without suffering unpleasant consequences. The game may be played safely with children up to the age of two, but after that we think it is unsafe. Possibly, but not probably, the infant will acquire a scientific calmness. More likely it will become a nervous, introspective, little wretch, always feeling its own pulse, and "taking a pull" at nothing more convivial than the strength-registering machine. These are gloomy but sincere forebodings. We are afraid that Mr. GALTON, in the sacred cause of science, may be founding the practice of hypochondria as a fine art.

THE ROYAL ARTILLERY.

THE chronic disease of the British army is perpetually showing itself in fresh symptoms, or rather by the same symptom under slightly varied forms. The malady of that much-tinkered force is, and long has been, want of men. Only a few weeks ago recruits could not be got for any part of it in sufficient numbers, and the War Office was reduced to the most comic expedients. The postmistress and the rural policeman were to be called in to help the recruiting-sergeant. Now, however, we are asked to believe that their services were not so very necessary after all. Mr. CHILDERS is able to assert that thirty thousand men have presented themselves for enlistment, and the Standard is in a position to assert with more confidence than lucidity that "the Infantry is being recruited at a rate "which at present more than meets an exceptional drain for two "years caused by a concurrence of peculiar circumstances." If all be good that is upcome, there does not seem to be much ground for the late terrors of the War Office. But except members of Parliament who will grasp at anything as an excuse for not increasing the Budget, and that part of the press which is committed to the support of short service and to the theories of our "only General," nobody is so credulous as not to discount the figures of Mr. CHILDERS. Thirty thousand men is rather less than will be needed to keep the army at its proper strength according to Lord CARDWELL'S scheme, but as that number has come forward already, it may be taken for granted that we shall have as many men as we need before the administrative year is over. All that is wanted to make Mr. CHILDERS'S figures perfectly satisfactory is that the thirty thousand should be such men as can be turned into effective soldiers. That, however, is a point on which Mr. CHILDERS observed a judicious silence. He said nothing at all as to what percentage of the men who present themselves are passed by the doctors. They will reject as few as they can, no doubt, but they must refuse some. By dint, however, of winking very hard, and accepting boys of some five feet high and thirty inches of chest measurement, it is probably just possible to keep the infantry up to its proper strength after a fashion, and another difficulty may be tided over for a few months by another makeshift, according to the statesmanlike practice of English army administration.

There is one very easy way of finding out how far the War Office is having recourse to the old trick of making quantity do duty for quality. The ranks of the Infantry may be filled by a very inferior stamp of recruits at a pinch, and they may serve their turn, but the Artillery must have men of some physical strength, and cannot be put off with weedy boys who cannot be employed to move heavy weights. Now it so happens that, just as we are being overrun with recruits according to the frank official statements of Mr. CHILDERS, the Artillery is so short of men that there is absolutely some talk of reducing the number of batteries maintained on the peace establishment. Innumerable letters have been written to account for this melancholy state of things. One wiseacre accounts for it on the ground that the recruiting-sergeant does not take trouble enough to get men, which is probably the most absurd explanation which has ever yet been given of any phenomenon. The men of the working classes are ignorant of many things; but they do know exactly how to get into the army, and what to expect when they have done so. The hard work is supposed by others to account for the unwillingness of men to enter the Artillery. There are very few men in the world who work hard if they can help it; nevertheless volunteers can be found for the hardest tasks on certain conditions. There are men who are at work by three o'clock in the morning in warehouses or market-places, and who do a day's work afterwards elsewhere. A walk through the Docks will show anybody that London contains tens of thousands of powerful men who are ready to undertake almost any amount of toil—on the condition that they are properly paid. It is quite unnecessary to waste ingenuity in finding explanations of what is almost self-evident. The British army in general is short of men, and has to put up with many deficiencies in those it does get, because it is not worth the while of a strong workman to enter the ranks while he can earn far more elsewhere. Of course the Artillery, which needs a particularly good stamp of recruit, suffers more than the Infantry, which need not be so exacting.

Whenever the difficulty of finding recruits for the army is honestly dealt with, it is infallibly found that the inquirer ends by deciding that it is all a question of pay. Sooner or later the same conviction will be forced on everybody. Indeed, we doubt whether, out of Parliament, one man would be found out of a hundred to deny it. However that may be, it is certain that actual and possible Secretaries of State for War and First Lords of the Treasury will recognize the fact as late as possible. They will try everything else before an increase of the Budget. That large section of the press which is bound to find the present system a good one (for had it not praised it all along? and is not short service and the rest of it good in the eyes of Lord WOLSELEY?) will continue to render what help it can by shirking facts and suggesting expedients. A correspondent of the Standard has adopted a notable scheme for getting the Artillery into a proper condition. He has observed that young men of the middle class are hard to start in life; and, combining this with his information about the Artillery, has arrived at the conclusion that the one difficulty may be utilized to correct the other. Only let the Government reserve certain batteries to be manned exclusively by gentlemen, and "our boys" will be ready to serve, whereby their parents will be relieved and the State well served. The advocates of the scheme all overlook one fact which we should have thought was patent enough to everybody—namely, that young men of the middle class show a marked preference for professions in which a decent salary can be obtained at once, and which offer them at least some chance of ultimately attaining to positions of dignity and emolument. Will the Artillery do that? Probably not to a sufficient extent. In fact this suggestion is by no means so new as the Standard's correspondent imagines. It was made a long while ago by some wiseacre on a Com-

Among possible candidates for the office of Prime Minister is Señor Canaomo, who is considered the ablest Spanish financier of the present day; but the selection of Ministers will depend on circumstances and qualifications which have little relation to commercial policy.

UTOPIA IN PICCADILLY.

THE great Mr. George is back among us, and it is interesting to learn, as Mr. Carlyle once remarked about somebody else, that he is "in moderately good spirits." He has had a reception on his arrival in Euston Square to which it is to be feared that the fierce democracy of his own country would apply the derogatory term bogus. For it seems that Mr. George did not then arrive in London, but had merely gone down the line somewhere, to the advantage doubtless of the funds of the North-Western Railway Company, and come back again to be received. He has been interviewed, and has expressed his opinion that Mr. Chamberlain is a man who will stick at nothing. The American and English languages apparently differing in the signification to be attached to this phrase, it is perhaps right to explain that Mr. George seems to have regarded it as a compliment. He did not very clearly explain to the interviewer how he is going to get on with his friends of the Democratic Federation, whose chief, Mr. Hyndman, has recently pronounced him to be fundamentally unsound, and he still less explained what to most people is the great puzzle of his position. The landowners whom he is going to expropriate without compensation are not very likely to help him — that is clear. The land-occupiers, who will simply have to pay their rent to a tax-gatherer instead of an agent, can have no interest in political economy as it may be in Georgium Sidus. Of the rest of the nation, who are to have their taxes paid for them at the expense of landlords and farmers, at least a considerable number, little as they like tax-paying, have no desire to throw their obligations on anybody else, and a very shrewd notion that Mr. George's gift would turn out one very dubiously beneficial. A few crack-brained theorists, and a rather larger number of greedy Have-nots, make up the constituency to which Mr. George can directly appeal, and this is a constituency which is rather "thin." His Irish friends are wiser, and offer the landlord's land directly to the landlord's tenant. Mr. George does not. More than one visitor to St. James's Hall on Wednesday night must have been curious to see if Mr. George would show any consciousness of these obvious things.

If any such visitor was so curious, and if any such curiosity was felt by any reader of Mr. George's speech next morning, the only result can have been disappointment. Mr. George's cheap insolence to the Queen of England, though it would have been satisfactory to see it properly resented, is a matter which does not require much comment. If Mr. George fancies that a bishop "gets money for which "he does not work," that only shows that Mr. George is an even more ignorant person than he might have been supposed to be. But what may be called the ornaments of his speech—the usual commonplaces of Republican and Democratic eloquence—though less familiar, are not much more noteworthy on the platform of St. James's Hall than in the columns of the New York "Daily Sewer" or the Philadelphia "Earwig." All that is taken for granted; and Mr. George is only worth listening to or commenting on when he is mounted on his own particular hobby. It is in reference to land nationalization itself that the curiosity above referred to could be felt, and in reference to land nationalization only. The proposal could be justified, if it could be justified at all, in two ways—by such an historical argument as was attempted by the defenders of the Irish Land Act, or by a high priori demonstration of abstract right to land. It is true that, if either or both these defences were successful, the objection would remain that all experience of business, all reading of history, and all study of human nature, show that the land nationalization scheme, if put in force, could never continue to work. To mention only one of a hundred arguments, no agricultural population could afford to pay an unvarying rent independent of the seasons, and no State could afford to depend on a varying rent dependent on those seasons. But this is beside the question. Granting it to be impossible for Mr. George to prove his plan expedient, he might be expected to show that it had what is by some people considered separable from and preferable to expediency—justice. And, as a matter of fact, Mr. George did valiantly try both the historical and the intuitive methods. Of his excursion into the former, it is sufficient to say that he declared that "the ancestors of the "present landlords obtained their lands by throwing the "taxes on the people," and "that," in "the ancient times all "the national expenses were paid out of the rent of the "land." Mr. George, like many of his countrymen, is very likely a person of indifferent education, and he may be unaware that both these statements are utterly false. Where he got them from it is difficult to say. But perhaps a famous epigram may here apply with a slight alteration. Though Mr. Hyndman does not think Mr. George an economist, it is possible that Mr. George goes to Mr. Hyndman for history. But to argue with a man who persists in assuming notoriously false premisses becomes impossible. It is necessary, therefore, to give Mr. George up on the historical side and come to the philosophical. "The land of England by virtue of the grant of the living "God belongs to the whole people of England." We are not so fond of bandying certain names as Mr. George and philosophers of his kidney appear to be. But it may be delicately hinted to Mr. George that there are a good many grants of the same kind alleged to be in existence, and that all of them have the drawback of being verifiable with very great difficulty. If somebody were to inform Mr. George that he had a divine commission to hang him, Mr. George, up to the next lamp-post, Mr. George would probably entertain grave doubts of the validity of the instrument, and would not be satisfied with the Commissioner's assurance. In the same way the landlords, with a great many people who are not landlords, and have no chance of ever being landlords, will feel disposed to apply a quo warranto to this large charter which Mr. George has discovered. But, in truth, to argue with Mr. George on this score is nearly as absurd as to argue with him on the other. When a man gets to the point of declaring private property in land to be "blasphemously wicked" there is nothing more to be said. We have got into the region of propositions of the "abracadabra is a second intention" order, and no one who has not graduated in the University of Bedlam can hope to conduct the disputation with propriety.

In himself Mr. Henry George is a very unimportant person. If, as has been said, though it is very doubtful, he has "become a power in England," it is merely because some other persons who loudly profess their disapproval of his doctrines are dishonest enough to welcome him as an instrument in furthering their political views. He may be useful, it seems to be thought, in the coming crusade against the English landlords, and it is well not to discourage friends. It is interesting to contemplate this spectacle of alliance between a moral party and an agitator, whom not the least advanced organ of that party describes as holding doctrines which add the morally wrong to the economically untenable. But it is quite possible that after due meditation on Mr. George's history and Mr. George's acquaintance with the Baga de secretis of the Divine Record Office, the Radical party will come to see that Mr. George's ethics are not so very wrong after all, and his economics not so fundamentally unsound. The true safeguard against the monstrous and pernicious folly which he preaches has been indicated above. Its tendency is directly to injure a vast number of persons, and only indirectly to benefit others. For Mr. George is quite consistent. His doctrine applies not merely to large estates, but to small; not merely to agricultural land, but to towns. Not merely, therefore, the Duke of Westminster and the Duke of Sutherland, but every town dweller who wholly or partially owns his house, every man of the middle class who has bought a country box or a model farm, every working-man who belongs to a Building Society, will be deprived at a stroke, without compensation, of whatever invested or inherited interest, in fee simple or temporary, he has in land, whether ploughed or built over, whether mined or pastured. To all these persons of every degree add the vast array of occupiers who must exchange their landlords without apparent benefit to themselves, except the happy sense that their skill and labour are paying taxes for others, and it will be seen that, in the simple motive-spring of self-interest, enough power can be found to resist Mr. George's theories, even if they are backed by a few crazy enthusiasts, by a good many dishonest politicians, and by a certain following of the riff-raff of the towns. If they were capable of being argued or of bearing argument, it is not to this consideration that it would be best to look. But, as they are beneath the serious attention of the thinker, they are best treated from the point of view of the practical politician.

THE REVIVAL OF NIHILISM.

IT was so long since we had heard of the Nihilists that the news of their last feat came with a certain shock. The murder of Colonel SUDEIKIN was indeed well calculated to strike the imagination of the world. He was a chief of the police, the head of what is still practically the Third Section; he had long been a bitter enemy of the Nihilists and their most successful persecutor; only a few weeks ago it looked as if he had been victorious in the struggle, and yet he has been suddenly struck down. The fact that he was murdered by one of his own most trusted subordinates has added to the horrors of his murder. It looks as if no Russian Minister would ever again be able to trust his officials. No man could possibly have given better security for his fidelity than DEGAYEFF. He had been a Nihilist, and had betrayed his fellow-conspirators to save himself from the gallows or Siberia. For years he had served the police apparently with the greatest zeal. He is generally credited with having caused the capture of several of the Nihilist leaders who have fallen into the hands of the police during the past months. Such a traitor would appear to have no choice but to be true to his chief. He could apparently have no hope of safety in the world except in the protection of Colonel SUDEIKIN, and yet it is by this very man that the Chief of the Police has been murdered. Indeed, nobody else could well have found an opportunity. If he had not thought himself safe in the house of a man who had given so many pledges for his loyalty, the Colonel would scarcely have been found unarmed, as he seems to have been, or have allowed others of his agents to get out of earshot. DEGAYEFF'S feat, too, will still further convince the world that Nihilist enthusiasm has the virtue of devotion in a wonderful degree. With the help of a little romancing, it will be easy to maintain that he has never ceased to be a Nihilist agent at all, that he has only been pretending to serve the police, and has really been waiting for his opportunity. The Nihilist exiles and their friends have naturally cited all this as a proof that the enthusiasm and fidelity of their party are invincible.

It is perfectly natural that a murder of this kind should produce a profound impression. The killing of a high official in the discharge of his duty is always a defeat for the Government which he serves, but it is well not to exaggerate the probable consequences. As yet the Nihilists have utterly failed in attaining their avowed object. They profess to desire a reform in the Government of their country, and to be fighting for it with violence, since they cannot gain it by persuasion. It is now years since they began their course of terrorism. In its course many much more considerable people than Colonel SUDEIKIN, nay, the very head of the Russian Empire himself, have lost their lives. The whole country has been kept in a continued state of fear and insecurity between the crimes of the revolutionists and the repressive measures of the police. At the end of it all the wished-for and much-needed reforms seem further off than ever. Even in the matter of loss of life, the balance seems to be on the whole in favour of the Government. The victims who have fallen in its service have been more conspicuous, but those on the other side have been by far the more numerous. For every high official whom the Nihilists have killed, scores, and even hundreds, of themselves and their sympathizers have been sent to death or to those prolonged sufferings in prison or in Siberia which, from the reports of competent witnesses, would appear to be worse than death. The enthusiasm of the revolutionary party has apparently aroused an equally fierce feeling among the supporters of authority. There are men in Russia who believe in the autocratic government of the CZAR as a sacred principle quite as ardently as the revolutionary party do in their cause. Allowing that the latter are inspired wholly by feelings of a respectable kind, and do, however mistakenly, believe that they are working for the ultimate good of Russia, there is abundant evidence that they are being opposed from exactly similar motives. As one official falls another is found to take his place. In a struggle of this kind the party which wields the whole machinery of the State must necessarily have a great advantage. It has resources which its opponents must necessarily be without, and, moreover, it has the incalculable advantage of being able to represent its adversaries as the enemies of all order and civilization. In such a struggle the administration can always be sure of a great deal of quiet sympathy and support even from men who think there is much in it which needs reform. The conversation of the Standard's Correspondent, reported in yesterday's paper, with a Russian statesman, was no doubt intended to show the world that the murder of SUDEIKIN has not terrified his superiors, but may be believed to contain a large element of truth. If much of the enthusiasm and courage of the Russian people was not enlisted on the side of the CZAR, his Government would long ago have fallen. As it is, the fight is between two equally resolute enemies, supposing the Nihilists to be all they profess to be, and of the two it is the better armed who will probably win.

But it is by no means to be taken for granted that the Nihilists are acting wholly on the lofty motives with which they are credited. The Russian is capable of very savage forms of enthusiasm. Some of the men, and a larger proportion of the women, who take part in these crimes, doubtless devote themselves to what they believe to be a holy work. Without such tools, not even the basest campaign against law and order can be long carried on. Whether, however, the directors in the fight are equally disinterested is another question. It is significant that terrorism was not adopted as a method of party warfare till the acquittal of VERA SASSULITCH by a jury in St. Petersburg had encouraged her friends with hopes of immunity, and shown them that they might count on a good deal of popular sympathy. It was natural that the extreme badness of the Russian administration should be considered as some excuse for such a method, but at the point things have got to any further sympathy with the Nihilists is utterly out of place. The murderers of the CZAR may have been honest, though misguided, enthusiasts; but the movement has now obviously fallen into the hands of a stamp of men with whom we are sufficiently familiar. It is directed by exiles of the Irish-American stamp, who are in perfect safety themselves, and in the receipt of subscriptions—for which they must, as a mere matter of business, do something from time to time. What they must do to keep up their traditions is murder. When the enthusiasts are spent, hired ruffians will be used. It might then be contended that the trap laid for Colonel SUDEIKIN was no other than a repetition of the assassination of Mr. BURKE and Lord F. CAVENDISH, and that his murderers were scoundrels of the stamp of BRADY or KELLY. DEGAYEFF, according to such an assumption, would be a worse CAREY—a double and triple traitor. We may assert that the superiority of the English to the Russian Government is self-evident; but it is certain that war is being carried on against both by apparently similar methods. Assassination societies which are criminal in Dublin are no more respectable in St. Petersburg. It was not by murder that the emancipation of the serfs was brought about. The Russian administration stands in great need of reform, but it must be amended by people who have shown a respect for law and order, and have therefore given guarantees for their honesty, not by desperadoes who, under the cloak of a more or less genuine enthusiasm, employ the methods of vulgar cutthroats. Bad as the Russian Government is, it is now fighting in the interest of society. Its enemies are not reformers but anarchists. We may believe that it would do better to rely more openly on the sympathies of the orderly part of the Russian people; but it must be remembered that anything in the nature of a reform would now be looked upon as a concession to violence. It is not the least of the crimes of the Nihilists that they have in all probability made despotic government a necessity in Russia for another fifty years.

THE CORPORATION WATER BILL.

PARLIAMENT has certainly no reason to take pride in its private Bill legislation. Whenever complaints are made of the price or the quality of the water supplied to London, it turns out that the defences behind which the Companies entrench themselves have been created for them by statute. Thames water is compared with that in use in other great towns, and found to contain matter which the consumer would willingly have let die. But the difficulty of bringing water from some less discredited source is immensely increased by the terms of the concessions originally made to the Companies, who regard the Thames as their own preserve; and these concessions were the work of Parliament. Londoners object to being charged, not for the water they really use, but for what it is assumed they must use, paying the rent they do; but the adoption of rating instead of consumption as the basis of charge is an achievement of legislative wisdom. When a householder has had a difference with his Water Company, and been made on one ground or another to pay more than he thinks he owes, he naturally scans with some discontent the price of the Company's shares and the handsome dividends by which that price is kept up. Ten per cent., he is told, is all that a Water Company ought to pay to its shareholders, and a public Act was passed nearly forty years ago to ensure that they should never exceed this rate. But in one way or another it is exceeded; and when the reason is inquired into, it is found in the provisions of some private Act. All these obstacles to the provision of a water supply which shall be at once pure, abundant, and cheap—and in the case of an article of such universal necessity these are not unreasonable requirements—have been placed in the way by Parliament. Those who try to remove them have to contend, not merely against the natural difficulties which belong to all costly undertakings, but against special difficulties created by our representatives and protectors. This fact is not to be regretted only on the ground that it makes the overcoming of these difficulties a matter of much time and cost. There is another inconvenience arising from it which, under present circumstances, is still more serious. The nature of the Water Companies' Acts disposes every one to pick holes in them; and when, as usually happens, no weak point can be discovered in the legislative armour by which the Companies are protected, we are apt to listen too favourably to the doctrine that the authority which has made can unmake, and that, if the Water Companies were called into being by the breath of Parliament, they need only continue in being while Parliament thinks fit to keep them alive. At the time when Sir RICHARD CROSS's abortive Bill was under discussion a great deal of unconscious Socialism was talked by people who ordinarily are firm believers in the sacredness of property; and much of what is said every day against the Water Companies might with very little change receive a much wider application. Title by Act of Parliament is spoken of as though it conferred only the slightest and most ephemeral claim to continued possession, instead of being the most precise and deliberate expression of the authority on which all property ultimately rests. This is, perhaps, the most serious consequence of our Private Bill system. The Acts which are the result of it are open to so many exceptions in point of wisdom and justice that those who suffer from them are tempted to catch at any theory which promises to show us how they may be overridden.

It is well to say this by way of caution when the Corporation of London are about to introduce a Bill to "regulate the supply of water to the metropolis, and all the "places outside the metropolis within the limits of supply "of the eight London Water Companies." The chief objects of this Bill will be to give consumers the option of being supplied with water by meter, and so of paying on what they actually use; to make the decision in DOBBS's case apply to all houses, and not merely to houses of which the owner or long leaseholder is also the occupier, to limit dividends to 10 per cent., and to forbid the payment of back dividends. All four of these objects are in themselves excellent. To pay for an article, the consumption of which is almost as various as it is universal, by a standard with which consumption has nothing to do is an extraordinarily clumsy proceeding. To have one rule by which to charge houses for which rent is paid, and another by which to charge those for which rent is not paid, is to introduce a needless inequality into a transaction which already is quite unequal enough. To pay back dividends out of the surplus remaining over and above the dividends of the current year is to make the prospect of any reduction in the price of water altogether illusory. But, when all this has been admitted, the fact remains that the possessions with which the Bill proposes to deal are just as much property as anything else that can be named, and that, however injudicious it may have been in the first instance to create such rights, large sums of money have been invested in these undertakings on the faith that, once created, these rights were wholly indefeasible. We are not arguing against the propriety of subjecting the Water Companies' claims to the test of a rigid scrutiny. By all means let them be pared down to the very smallest amount that Parliament can be shown to have given them. But a scrutiny which goes beyond this point, and seeks to take away what Parliament has given, without paying compensation to those from whom it is taken, would be as much to be deprecated as any other kind of attack upon property. If a right conferred by Act of Parliament is not one which its holder may confidently maintain against all comers, it is hard to say where such confidence can be looked for.

We give this caution because in the Bill about to be introduced the Corporation do not propose to avail themselves of the weapon which above all others would bring the Companies to terms. Nothing is said in it of a rival supply from another source. It aims solely at the regulation of the existing Water Companies and of the water they sell. It contains nothing, therefore, that can justly alarm the Companies unless they have been exceeding their powers or have reason to fear that they may be deprived of what is rightly theirs. It may prove of course that they have been exceeding their powers, and in that case the Bill will be of great use. It will be surprising, however, if the legal acumen which the Companies have always been able to command has not enabled them to keep clear of this particular blunder.

DR. LASKER.

THOUGH the death of Dr. LASKER is not likely to have any immediate influence on German politics, it is an event that deserves something more than a passing mention. He had won the respect of every party in the Empire by his legal attainments, his clear and sharp insight, his perfect disinterestedness, and the efforts he constantly made to judge every question that arose on its own merits, and so he will be mourned by many who did not share his opinions, and who deeply regretted the course which he thought it right to adopt during the last few years. That he did not break through old ties without deep pain we may be sure, and also that he did so only from the purest motives. He was desirous neither of social nor of political distinction; the former was distasteful to him, and he never sought the latter. He was ambitious, but it was only to see his country provided with what he considered the constitution and the laws best adapted to it; and in order to attain this end he was ready to be the servant of all.

If we except Prince BISMARCK, there is only one living German politician who has deserved so well of his country as the man who has just fallen asleep on foreign soil. Though but recently elected to Parliament, he had already distinguished himself as a Liberal orator, and gained a wide influence in the Prussian Chamber by his talent for business when the war with Austria broke out. The whole country was then so infuriated against the Government that in provincial towns the news that barricades had been built in Berlin was expected from day to day. All Germany seemed for the moment to be united against Herr VON BISMARCK and his Royal Master, who had no one to depend upon except the official class and the squires of Prussia. Not only were all the Liberal groups, from the most moderate to the Radicals and the Socialists, prepared for extreme measures, but they were supported by the Catholics, and the reactionary politicians who looked upon Austria as their natural friend and protector, and by the Particularists of every shade, from the simple peasants who objected to every change to that small but highly cultured class who perceived that the mental progress of Germany had been in a great extent due to its political disunion, and who preferred an intellectual leadership to a political supremacy in Europe. Englishmen are too apt to forget how great a personal stake Prince BISMARCK had in the success of his policy in 1866. If the Prussian armies had been defeated, if they had even suffered a serious check, a revolution would have broken out, and he might have been brought to the block. He won; but Germany was still uncertain. The Austrian party was crushed, the Particularists were scattered, but the Liberals were still strong. Would they accept the new state of things, or would they continue their opposition? It was a question on which much depended, and on which very few had made up their minds. Berlin, for example, welcomed the victors at Königgrätz with enthusiasm, and almost immediately proceeded to elect deputies who were pledged to undo all that they had done. It was Dr. LASKER'S great merit that in this doubtful time he had the moral courage to confess he had been mistaken, and to join Herr von BENNIGSEN in forming the National Liberal party. His action determined that of many who were faltering between a desire for the unification of their country and a hatred of the Minister who had rendered it possible.

In the debates on the Constitution of the North German Confederation Dr. LASKER had many opportunities of displaying his legal knowledge and acumen. Though by character and conviction an idealist, his mind was rather practical and critical than imaginative and creative, and these were perhaps the qualities which were most requisite in those who had frankly accepted the new order of things without abandoning their former Liberal opinions. The whole Constitution was a compromise, and that it took its present form and has hitherto worked so smoothly is, in a large extent, due to the changes in the Governmental proposals suggested by Dr. LASKER. His name will always be connected with these; but perhaps the influence he exercised over his political friends, of which the world has hitherto heard very little, was even more important. There was nothing half-hearted about him: he loyally entered into the new alliance, and when he saw that the Ministry was determined to carry a point, he induced his friends to yield it with a good grace.

That, after many years of sincere co-operation with the statesman who has done more than any other for Germany, he should have taken a place among the leaders of the Secessionists, and begun a violent opposition to him, may be a matter for regret, it can hardly be a cause of surprise. Dr. LASKER had made a study of political economy, and he was convinced that the financial policy of the Government was a mistake, and that State Socialism was a dream at least as dangerous as attractive. The breach was therefore necessary; but it was embittered by the memory of many shipwrecked hopes. There was a time when both Prince BISMARCK and Dr. LASKER in all probability imagined that they stood nearer to each other than they ever really did. It was generally believed among the National Liberals that the CHANCELLOR shared most of their opinions, that he was prevented by external influences from carrying them out more fully, and that a little occasional pressure was by no means disagreeable to him; while he, on his side, was generously eager to build golden bridges for his former opponents, and to make concessions upon every point that did not seem to him to be of vital importance. Neither politician would have been human if the discovery of the error in which they had both indulged had not left a sting; but even in the midst of the bitterest party conflicts Dr. LASKER spoke in private of Prince BISMARCK with personal respect, and of his policy with sincere though by no means unmixed admiration.

Into the details of Dr. LASKER'S public life it is both impossible and needless to enter. By his death Germany has lost a man of unusual powers, wide culture, deep learning, unquestioned integrity, and rare unselfishness, and a politician whose name will always be honourably remembered in connexion with the great crisis of her history.

THE CORPS FUCHS.

DURING the spring and autumn vacations a German university town is almost deserted by the students who have gone home to economize, or somewhere else to amuse themselves. Quiet citizens then congregate in the beer-rooms from which they are banished at other seasons, and discuss the prosaic details of their business, where nothing less heroic than a duel could be mentioned a few weeks before; their sons pay assiduous and no longer unacceptable court to the servant girls who are out at dusk, and even venture to fill the night with their most sweet but rather unsteady voices, in a way that would bring summary vengeance upon them at any other time, while the watchman goes his rounds without any dread of a thrashing or hope of an invitation to a late supper. He walks boldly over the open places, blows his horn freely, and almost forgets the dark and cosy corners in which he has so often sought security. He is a town official, and has no right whatever over the students, except the somewhat illusory one of being permitted to ask to inspect their papers—a request which they are sure to refuse, and he is wise enough rarely to make; and so, if a party of the wilder Burschen happen to meet him on their way home from a drinking bout, they consider it almost a point of honour either to break his horn over his back or to make him drunk and incapable. Which course they adopt depends very much on the humour of the moment and conduct of the prisoner, and the man who can most successfully avoid the one process and simulate the other is the model watchman. Now and then, when the young men have been having an unusually good time, and the inns are closed, one of them will propose to hunt Dogberry. Then the whole town is drawn, and as the official dare not leave the streets, he is pretty certain to be caught, when strange things happen. The representative of public order may be found bound securely to a convenient tree, with the signboard of a neighbouring inn, representing an ox, a bear, or a monkey, suspended above his head, while his horn is heard shrieking wildly and incoherently in secluded places during the rest of the night, or he himself may be seen tootooing fiercely, but at the same time as noiselessly as possible, through the streets whose quiet he is employed to guard, at the head of a band of students, who are "rousing the night owl in a catch that would draw three souls out of one weaver." In any case, however, he is pretty certain to have assured his tormentors that he is quite unacquainted with their names or addresses before they bid him good-bye, and it will be unlucky for him if his memory happens to be quicker on the morrow. At least, such things were in days that have not long gone by; but since 1870 great changes have been wrought for the better in the manners of students as well as in more important matters in Germany. Still, even of old, the watchman was secure during the long vacations. He then not only enjoyed the whole dignity of his office unmolested, but he knew at least two places where he could always be sure of a supper and as much beer as he cared to drink before his duties began. Was liebt sich, neckt sich, says the German proverb. The student and the watchman loved each other, though the teasing was rough and mostly on one side, and even in the vacations two sets of students were kept at their post by a strict sense of duty, though not by any love of their studies. They were the representatives of the Corps and the Burschenschaften.

It would be interesting to trace the history of these student societies back to the period of the Thirty Years' War, or even the Middle Ages, but our space would not admit of this, and, for practical purposes, it is sufficient to remember that the Corps devote their undivided energies to fencing and beer-drinking, while the Burschenschaften vary these more serious studies by a good deal of political discussion. They both sprang from the old Landsmannschaften, but the establishment of the Burschenschaft in 1815 was an endeavour to reform these, while the Corps have retained as much as possible of their old character, and consequently the enmity between the members of the two bodies is great.

In almost every university there are several Corps, whose members are always ready to fight each other, not only on the slightest provocation, but for the mere fun of the thing; that is, in term-time; as soon as the vacation commences, all enmity is laid aside. Each of the separate bodies selects some of its members whose duty it is to remain in town, and these at once fraternize. If you ask them why they stay in so dull a place, they will tell you they are there to catch foxes.

The German schoolboy is subjected to a number of restraints which an English youth of his age would consider intolerable; as soon as he enters the university he is permitted a license such as no one else enjoys. In all minor matters he is subject to academical and not to public law, and however strict the letter of the code may seem, the spirit in which it is expounded is one of perfect lenity. A breach of the peace which would bring fine or imprisonment upon others is in his case often punished only by a gentle rebuke in choice Latin, which is apt to become humorous if there be anything in the offence to justify a smile. And public opinion is as merciful as the law. Almost any excess is thought natural, and any wild freak pardonable in a student. Unless he be guilty of meanness, or some act of extreme brutality, he may be sure that his comrades will support him, and that the outside world will not judge him harshly. He is not even expected to pay his debts, at least for the present, and what does he care for the future? It is not, therefore, strange that, as soon as his last examinations are passed, the schoolboy should be eager to enter his new paradise, and should hurry to the university at the most unexpected times.

He is the fox for whom the representatives of the Corps are lying in wait, and as soon as he appears on their hunting ground, they are sure to be informed of it by some faithful scout. The devices they employ to entrap their prey are many and ingenious, but they resemble too closely the wiles of our old friend the recruiting sergeant to be worth narrating. The youth finds the veterans, whose prowess is attested by many a half-healed scar, the best of company. They show him the drinking-horns that are used at their banquets, and allow him to have a peep at their duelling swords every now and then. They are tolerant of his tipsy rudeness and his morning peevishness, and delight his leisure with wild tales of riot, for much of the spirit of Falstaff and his followers still survives in the German Corps.

It might be thought that the representatives of the different societies would be inclined to dispute as to the possession of the prize they have taken so much trouble to win; but this is rarely the case. No student is allowed to enter any of the Corps who cannot show that he is in possession of what, for the University in which he is entered, is a liberal allowance; and the money qualification differs in the different bodies. In some it is very high; and, as many of these also exclude all but nobles, the society that is to be found in them is select, and much that is both true and characteristic of other Corps does not apply to them. Guided, therefore, partly by the length of his purse, and partly by other considerations, the delegates have but little difficulty in assigning their willing captive to the body for which he is best suited, and persuading him that he made the choice himself. They are all rewarded by a consciousness of their own virtue. They feel that a good deed has been done and a soul saved from the Burschenschaft. The term begins with a Commers, in which all the Corps take part. A table is prepared for each in a brilliantly lighted and decorated room, and ample quantities of drink are provided. When the Fox takes his place, in his cap of green and gold, or whatever other brilliant hues are the chosen colours of the society he is about to enter, his heart swells within him; but his enthusiasm rises to almost a devotional point when the band strikes up the "Landesvater," when his new cap, after having been spitted on a sword, is replaced on his head, the weapon laid upon it, and the great drinking-horn given into his hands. The way in which this and several other student songs are sung is often really impressive, and to the novice the ceremony seems full of significance. He is really making his vows to be true to the brotherhood. But from that night a change comes over the spirit of his dream. The seniors who were lately so affable become supercilious and order him about instead of consulting his wishes. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, indeed, the position of a Fox was most miserable. The older members of the Landsmannschaften had absolute power over him, and he might think himself fortunate if they were content with merely treating him as a menial without having recourse to cruel indignities or even torture. These excesses are said to have been introduced into university life by the wandering scholars, and edict after edict was in vain promulgated against them. Now, of course, the memory of such things is only preserved in single phrases and ceremonies which have become purely formal and are dying out. The authority of the seniors is generally exercised only in a jocose way, but in spite of this it is real enough. If a novice is noisy or troublesome of an evening when the Corps have met to drink quietly together, especially when guests are present, one of the Burschen will simply say, "Fox, spin two, four, or six," as the case may be. The youth must provide himself with the given number of glasses of beer within the space of five minutes, his taskmaster inspects them to see that they are properly filled, and the spinner has then to drink them out one after another, each at a single draught, which generally quiets him at least for the time. If an astonished Englishman who is enjoying the hospitality of the Corps inquires as to the purpose of so strange a custom, he will be told that it is necessary to preserve order. And there is some truth in this. It is a standing rule among German students that a toast demands a reply; that is that, if anybody drinks a half or a whole glass to your health, you are bound to consume at least an equal quantity of liquor in compliment to him before a given time has passed. This would render it possible for the novices to turn every social meeting into a drunken orgie, if no restraint were placed upon them. They have only to unite to "explode" the president and one or two of the more serious members to attain their end. An explosion is managed thus. By pre-arrangement a number of persons each drink a glass to a single person at almost the same time, and he is then compelled to empty, it may be, ten or twelve glasses in the course of fifteen minutes. This is one of the devices of which the Foxes are particularly fond, each succeeding generation of them discovers it anew, and spinning is considered the only remedy. If the inquisitive foreigner asks whether it would not be better to modify the rule than to resort to so drastic a means of blunting its edge, some Bursch will in all probability reply with the greatest seriousness that everybody is sometimes brought into a situation where it is natural or even necessary as a matter of politeness for him to become intoxicated, and that it is therefore well to teach the young to carry their liquor soberly, an art that can only be acquired by practice. The older German students, however, are as a rule far less intemperate than is generally supposed, except when they drink out of bravado, as in a Commers which unites all the Corps. Then the hard drinkers challenge each other, and incredible quantities of beer vanish. The whole assembly is interested in the struggle, and bets are made on the event. Every voice is hushed when from one table come the words, "Mr. So-and-so, I drink my twenty-third glass to you in advance," or from the other, "Mr. So-and-so, I drink my twenty-first glass in reply." To such heights as these, of course, no Fox can hope to attain; but he, too, fights out his little beer tournaments, in which speed and quantity are the two elements chiefly considered. Might not the commentators of Rabelais learn something from the life of the German Corps?

We have said that it is fading away. Much that we have dwelt upon may perhaps already have become obsolete. It was by no means a noble, a refined, or a proper, but it was a jovial, way of passing the time. Some of its excesses are explained, and in part excused, by the strictness of school life in Germany. The young colts had so long been imprisoned in narrow stables that they were inclined to kick up their heels when the door was thrown open. And the young man who joined a Corps did gain some advantages, though they were hardly adequate to the time and money they cost. If there was anything in him, he learned to be faithful to his friends, to face his enemies boldly, to behave decently to his equals, to be fair and open, and to respect his honour more than any earthly good. Watchman hunting and duelling may seem rather a roundabout path to such an end; but it is something if it be attained at all.

LORD HARTINGTON.

IF some one of the "Raphaels in shoals" whom no doubt we have about us does not remove the reproach of shortcomings in the grand style from English art by a cartoon of "Michael and Satan contending for the body of Lord Hartington," it is his own fault. A more curious incident than the duel on the subject between the chief evening and the chief morning organ of Radicalism in London at the beginning of the week has not recently taken place, though we have no intention of distributing the archangelic and diabolic parts between the two. The Daily News opened the ball by entreating Lord Hartington to say a word, "only a few words," to relieve his agonized friends from the idea that he is not sound in the Radical faith. This appeal, which was really of a touching character, had the undoubted drawback that it seemed to confess that the friends were agonized; that their confidence in Lord Hartington's orthodoxy, despite the pretty severe trials to which that orthodoxy has been exposed for the last four years, has never been quite firm, and is now seriously shaken. This was the point of view which presented itself to the Pall Mall Gazette, and it proceeded to rate its respected contemporary, not merely for "presumption," but for letting unsavoury cats out of inconvenient bags. This eccentric but not uninstructive family squabble has naturally caused some amusement in the camp opposite to that of the Daily News and the Pall Mall Gazette. It has been pointed out with perfect truth that if Lord Hartington responded to the invitation, if he came forward and with his hand on his heart made profession of Chamberlainism, whole Chamberlainism, and nothing but Chamberlainism, the Radical party would, on the whole, lose quite as much as it would gain. It would be the stronger by Lord Hartington, but the weaker by all the semi-independent allies whom Lord Hartington now leads. The Moderate Liberal, who grieves over the absence of Mr. Goschen, trembles at the resignation of the Duke of Argyll, and shakes his head over the retirement of Mr. Forster, has at present Lord Hartington to comfort himself with. If Lord Hartington should become only a Mr. Chamberlain with a difference, what could the Moderate Liberal do? He may stand being permeated while he is able to persuade himself that he is permeating likewise; but with a root-and-branch Cabinet he might become restive to the operation.

We shall not pause to inquire whether this view of Lord Hartington's position (in which nobody who has impartially studied the events of the last few years will refuse to allow much truth) is altogether flattering to him. It assigns to him rather the status of that waistcoat, recorded somewhere in fiction, which was a waistcoat of such an eminently respectable and responsible appearance that nobody could suspect its wearer of imprudent or immoral acts. But there is no doubt that Lord Hartington has in some sort laid himself open to such imputations. He is himself a politician of a kind which for our part we should be very sorry to see extinct or infrequent in England. Whether he deserves the glowing eulogies which, in the Daily News article referred to, accompanied the little request for his name on the back of the Radical bill, we do not think it necessary to pronounce, nor, on the other hand, do we feel inclined to investigate the truth of a reported remark of a person of quality some time ago—"Lord Hartington is an excellent fellow, but he is like all racing men, he'll do anything to win." Non nostrum tantas; not to mention that the second and unfavourable view might be construed into a libel on the turf. But the valuable qualities of Lord Hartington as a statesman are easily appreciable. If he is a thorough partisan, he is a partisan of the old kind, that fought fairly with gloves or fists, and had not the slightest personal enmity to the other side. No less by temperament than by education and tradition the furious personal spite of the parvenu is a thing to which he is an utter stranger. To some men the University at which they have not been educated, or which has rejected them, the Club which will not admit them, the order to which they have looked up with a mixture of humiliation and envy, the Church which has looked down on their sect with the calm superiority of disdain, are objects of a concentrated malignity from which circumstances no less than character have made Lord Hartington safe. In the same way he has every reason for taking politics quietly, which is another expression for taking politics wisely. In more fortunate circumstances Lord Hartington might have been a real master of that great art of letting things alone in which is the root of much political wisdom. If his intellectual abilities are not extraordinary his practical sense is not small; and the ignorance and indolence which was probably more to blame than anything else for his conduct on the Afghan, and, until recently, the Irish questions, are closely connected with the good points of his character. In a general way more harm is done by political busybodies than by political sluggards; and to be content not to know is itself a rather admirable thing. Only, of course, it may be carried too far, as Lord Hartington undoubtedly did carry it in the Candahar case, in the matter of the Land Act, and in the initials of the Ilbert Bill. With a sounder chief and less mischievous colleagues, however, these excessive demands would not have been on his faculties of performing work and acquiring information. It is tolerably certain that Lord Hartington would never have been the first to propose the retirement from Afghanistan, or the Land Act, or the Europeans-in-India-Disability Bill. So also the undoubted fact that it has taken him four years to see what the debate on the Army Discipline Bill might have told him before the four years began, and that his assumption of his true position is even now tentative and uncertain, are again connected with his merits. He backs his side as a man should do, and he doubtless considers that the other men on the side are as honest as himself—which is amiable of him. But, though it cannot be denied that a very great crisis in his career is approaching, it can hardly be said that he has yet carried his policy of insouciance beyond the limits which a party politician may conceivably allow himself. Christianity, after all, must approve, if it could hardly have commanded, his reconciliation with Mr. Chamberlain after Mr. Chamberlain had renounced and defied him. An ardent admiration of the House of Commons is the watchword of Lord Hartington's party, and he may have persuaded himself that it was right, against his own judgment, to expose the British army to loathsome disablement for duty because some crazy fanatics snatched a majority in that House. Every allowance that the game admits must be made for a man who is playing a game.

But the question of the moment is whether Lord Hartington can go on playing the same game much longer. What ought to be his conduct in the forthcoming Session in reference to the Irish policy of the Government from the standpoint of rational politics and national interests is of course quite clear; but we have endeavoured here to take a strictly practical view, and to indulge in no heroics. The question is, then, what course of political conduct is best suited for Lord Hartington's own interest as a player of the political game, and here, though it is no business of ours to advise him, the remarkable freedom with which advice has already been offered makes an additional suggestion or two by way of comment not wholly impertinent. We should say that if any one wishes to see Lord Hartington efface himself they should urge him, and, if possible, induce him, to say the few words for which the Daily News is so anxious. To put the matter with the greatest possible sharpness, though of course also with the somewhat exaggerated emphasis which extreme sharpness requires, it may be said that if Lord Hartington were to retire from Mr. Gladstone's Government on the question of throwing the reins on the neck of Ireland, his succession at no distant period to the Premiership would be made, accidents excepted, certain; that if he once more drifts to the Radical side that succession will be very seriously endangered. For as a purely Radical competitor for the office he is at very great disadvantages. No doubt many Radicals still love a lord, but their number is not on the increase. The Radicals themselves have at least two candidates who are cleverer than Lord Hartington, more popular than Lord Hartington can ever be with their own side, far more skilled in the arts by which Radical leaders must more and more stand or fall in the future, and able to adopt the crotchets of the hour in a fashion impossible to the heir of the dukedom of Devonshire. As a Moderate Liberal Lord Hartington's peculiar circumstances give him points against all his possible competitors. As a Radical they give all his competitors points against him. When he hears the voice of the Radical charmer he should remember D'Artagnan's reply to the Cardinal's invitation, "Monseigneur, je serais mal venu ici et mal regardé là-bas," a remark in which the Gascon really showed himself to be that "puits de sagesse" which his friend declared him. The Moderate Liberal is no doubt a strangely forgiving animal, but after a sufficient course of desertion at every point by Lord Hartington, capped by a definite profession of apostacy in "a few words," even he must turn. The Radical has his own leaders, whom he trusts to lead him against dukes; and a duke for a leader would in a few years, if not now, simply embarrass him. On all grounds, therefore, it would be in the highest degree unwise for Lord Hartington to ally himself openly and avowedly with the party of destruction; and it is an arguable point whether his continuance in his present position (whether he is or is not conscious that he is used as a decoy duck) is compatible with the retention of solid popularity with any party. Lord Hartington is not at all likely to have missed the probability that, something besides defect of eyesight may have contributed to Mr. Goschen's refusal to be put forward as Speaker. He cannot fail to have noted that since Mr. Forster's retirement Mr. Forster has distinctly risen in the opinion of the country at large. His shrewd if not over-subtle faculty of political judgment is likely to make him doubt the permanence, at least as an authority on one side only, of the Caucus-rule by which at present he and his motley colleagues keep their majority in Parliament. Any competent student of politics, speaking from no party point of view, but with absolutely judicial fairness, would tell Lord Hartington that his game, when once the disturbing element of Mr. Gladstone's personality, and the silly worship which that personality excites, is out of the way, is no more to join hands with Mr. Chamberlain against Lord Salisbury than it is to join with Lord Salisbury against Mr. Chamberlain. A writer in the St. James's Gazette has justly pointed out that his value to the Radical party is gone when he ceases to be, or at least to be thought, a Left Centre leader. But there is more than this; for with the loss of the fact or reputation of Left Centre leadership he loses all reason for political existence.

KESHUB CHUNDER SEN.

THE death announced in a Calcutta telegram last Tuesday of Keshub Chunder Sen—the leader, though not the founder, of the Brahmo Somaj Church—removes a prominent figure from the religious world of the East. For the sect to which he was converted in 1860, and of which he has been since then the guiding genius and virtual Pope, avowedly aspires to become the National Church of India, though as yet its members are numbered by thousands only—in 1870, when he visited England, there were only about 6,000 of them—as against the 150 million adherents of Brahminism from whom they have separated. The question of their future has indeed an interest not only religious but political as regards the condition of India, which is at present passing through a kind of religious transition, the ultimate result of which it is not easy to forecast. In the words of a circular issued ten years ago by the Bishops of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay, and referred to by Mr. Grant Duff as a document of the highest interest and authority, "India in the present century is passing through a state of disintegration and its habits and forms of life are subjected to influences which are affecting it seriously and fundamentally. Forces Christian in their origin, though only partially religious, and predominantly of a civilizing and intellectual kind, are everywhere in active operation; and the people of India are being carried, almost without a will, and as if by a tide of circumstances, from a past, to which their hearts cling with regret, to a future which is still unknown and undiscernible." While the British Government has not only all along abstained with an almost pedantic scrupulosity from anything like proselytism, so much so as to incur the charge of even discouraging conversions to Christianity, but directly subsidizes the national worship, it has yet been constrained in the cause of civilization to do much which inevitably, however unintentionally on the part of those concerned, serves to undermine all genuine faith in Brahminism. Even in matters having so little religious significance as vaccination, land-surveying, and works of irrigation, a veiled conspiracy has been detected against the national cult. But to name one point only, the spread of education among the natives, though purely secular, is a process fatal to the Hindu orthodoxy of the rising generation. And thus it naturally occurs not only to the religionist but the statesman to inquire whether Brahminism will be superseded by atheism or by some, and if so by what, new form of religious belief. Whatever hopes may be entertained of the conversion of India to the Gospel, there is at present no visible prospect of such a consummation, as is frankly admitted in the episcopal circular already quoted. The Jesuits have been the most successful missionaries in India, but the sum total of converts all told, and of all denominations, is but an infinitesimal fraction as compared to the huge and rapidly increasing Hindu population. There is one cult however which, though in a decided minority, is far stronger than the Christian in India, and is thought by many to have the promise of the future. The Mogul Emperors during the two centuries of their Indian rule did not by any means act on the religious or non-religious policy of their British successors. They did not indeed exactly employ the good old Moslem method of "the Koran or the sword"—the time for that was past—but they did, without adopting such extreme measures, bring the whole weight of Governmental influence to bear in favour of their own creed, and the consequence is that about a sixth of the population of India, comprising some 50 millions, is now Mahometan. No Sovereign, not excepting the Sultan, rules over half so many Mahometan subjects as the Queen of England. That in itself might not perhaps go for much. But it must be remembered on the one hand that Mahometanism does not present to the native intellect of India any of those difficulties which render the first smattering of physical science incompatible with their ancestral "creed," while it offers a simple and intelligible form of theistic belief with an ethical code making no very severe demands on the weakness of human nature; and on the other hand that Islam has displayed of late years a capacity unprecedented in its former history for proselytism without the aid of the sword—a fact noted by Dr. Döllinger in a remarkable lecture on British India delivered four years ago as "an historical enigma." It has made enormous strides in Western Africa, and that too at the expense of Christianity; it has won over the greater part of Borneo and Sumatra and the whole of Java; and has effected a lodgment in China, where whole villages and towns and districts of Moslems may be found in the midst of the Buddhist and Confucian inhabitants of the country, while no other foreign religion has taken foot there, and it already boasts some 20,000,000 adherents among the subjects of the Celestial Empire. And hence it has been suggested that Mahometanism will be the future religion of China, and a similar anticipation as to the future of India, where it is already much stronger than in China, would be at least equally plausible. Considering the fierce and aggressive character of Islam, and its essential intolerance of subjection to rulers of an alien, and especially of the Christian, faith, such a prospect is not a pleasant one from any point of view. As a writer in the Edinburgh Review remarked not long ago, "four hundred million Mahometans, added to the already large census of Islam, would materially alter the conditions of the European powers, and a Chinese"—or, we may add, still worse an Indian—"'holy war' would be a veritable Damocles's sword suspended over the civilized world." Some years ago an assembly of Moslem doctors from Delhi and Lucknow ruled that India is not "Dar ul Islam," but "Dar ul Harb," and ought therefore to be conquered for Islam. Such possibilities, at all events, if they be nothing more, give an additional interest to whatever may help to throw light on the religious future of India.

We have said already that Keshub Chunder Sen—or Mr. Sen, as he was sometimes styled—was not, as many of his English admirers may have been led to imagine, the founder of declined in value, we may feel sure that this exhibition will not raise them again. One Poole or even two might be useful in a gallery, partly for their own sake, but chiefly as a foil to other pictures; a room full of them is too much.

THE PIPER OF HAMELIN.

THE remarkable enterprise of Mr. Carl Rosa has not only greatly incited the revival of English opera, but has also produced competition—a natural result where opera receives no State support, and where free-trade is almost a national creed. Mr. Rosa's energy and zeal are so well appreciated, however, that he need never anticipate the old Virgilian situation and the bitterness of sic vos non vobis. It does not appear that the hearty faith in native genius generally expressed during Mr. Rosa's last season has much depth or constancy. Mr. T. H. Friend, at least, begins his first London season with a foreign production. It is true that English opera is not to be entirely displaced in Mr. Friend's programme by opera in English, and we must be grateful for the promise of Mr. Julian Edwards's Victorian, one more work that may feed the new enthusiasm for English dramatic music.

The Piper of Hamelin, given on Monday at Covent Garden for the first time in London, is a version by Mr. Henry Hersée of Herr Nessler's Der Rattenfänger von Hamelin, produced with marked success at Leipzig in 1879. It was first performed in English last winter at Manchester, where also it was well received. This success is from the nature of the music inevitable. It is easy to speak of it as a reaction from Wagner's overpowering predominance. Apart from this mighty influence—less general even in Germany than is sometimes imagined—it is certain that most people with "music in their souls" love occasionally to unbend; they cannot sympathize with that inflexible dogmatism which recognizes one interpretation of music, and one only; they cannot for ever exist in the cult of what Berlioz called la musique sans mélodie, nor be perpetually in the ecstacy of an O altitudo. Herr Nessler's music is not always strikingly original, nor is it frequently very dramatic, but it abounds in taking arias and good concerted pieces; it is attractive, melodious, and natural, and "being natural, naturally pleases."

The libretto by Friedrich Hofmann is founded on the familiar legend so admirably treated by Mr. Browning. It is obvious that much must be added to material so slight in order to obtain dramatic vitality and value. The result is scarcely satisfactory; the construction is loose, several scenes being mere padding; the situations are often feeble, and the interest ill sustained. The action so closely follows the legend that it is unnecessary to describe it at length. The Piper's fascination has, however, a more extended range, and involves the love of women, the jealousy of men, as well as the destruction of children and rats. Having ensnared Gertrude and separated her from her faithful swain, Wulff, the Piper proceeds to charm the heart of Regina, the Mayor's daughter, on the eve of her wedding, and obtains a kiss as a reward for his sweet singing. For this crime he is sentenced to death as a sorcerer, but Gertrude is enabled to save him, under a convenient statute, and then drowns herself. To avenge her death and his own ill-treatment, the Piper then lures the children into the fatal hill. This last scene is picturesquely treated and finely imagined. In the first act the most notable numbers are a quaint ballad, "When I was young," a beautiful song, "Oh, strange and sweet," with a bewitching accompaniment, admirably sung by Miss Helen Armstrong, and a sestet in canon, written with much science, and full of distinction and grace. Throughout the opera the Piper introduces his songs with an engaging frankness; he is a lyrical person with a bird-like soul, and cares nothing for dramatic obligations. His songs have not a little sameness, but they are always tuneful and pleasing; the best are, "Of her, my darling," and the Knapsack Song, the latter very piquant with its forlorn choral refrain. In the third act a capital song, "Open, cloister portals," in the style of the popular Studentenlieder, was given with great unction by Messrs. Charles Lyall and E. Muller. The quality of the music decidedly deteriorates in the fourth act, though it includes the culminating scene of the kiss. In the last act a short march, of no particular merit, heralds the approach of Regina and the bridegroom, who enter the church followed by the Piper, who soon afterwards reappears with the children at his heels. Gathering them about him, he sings the song of enticement, which is characterized by a weird indescribable charm, and while the devotional music blends with his melody, he proceeds over the bridge. The congregation issue from the church only to see their children disappear in the hill, and the fall of the bridge into the river.

Allowing for the unavoidable drawbacks of a first night, the representation was fairly good. An excellent orchestra, under the conduct of Mr. G. H. Betjemann, left little to be desired save in the accompaniments, which were occasionally (as in the sestet) a little heavy. The arduous part of the Piper was capably filled by Mr. James Sauvage, who possesses a good style and a voice of excellent quality. Mme. Rose Hersée (Gertrude) made the most of her part, with her usual clever apprehension, displaying both spirit and intelligence; in the important scena of the last act she was heard to great advantage. Miss Catherine Devrient (Regina) so obviously suffered from nervousness that it would be unjust to chronicle our opinion of her début. Miss Helen Armstrong (Dorothea) displayed the phrasing and accurate intonation of an accomplished singer. Mr. Albert M'Guckin, as the Mayor, made a favourable impression, while Mr. Charles Lyall played the Town Clerk with immense humour and much effective comic business, conceived always in the true spirit of an artist, spontaneous and easy. Without being in any sense a great work The Piper of Hamelin is likely to hold its own in popular esteem, even in competition with operas of far-loftier pretensions; and though its music is not remarkable for individuality, Herr Nessler is still a young man, and only at the outset of his career.

NEW ZEALAND BORROWING.

THE colony of New Zealand has a magnificent future, if its Government does not too heavily encumber its resources in the hurry to develop them. The appearances are that it is borrowing too rapidly. The colony is somewhat larger than Victoria; but, compared with the other Australian colonies, it is quite small. And it is to be recollected that it has not the rich gold-mines of Victoria. Besides, it has a considerable native population, which has given trouble in the past, and possibly may do so again, and which at any rate still occupies nearly a quarter of the lands of the colony; while Victoria has no native population worth speaking of. Lastly, its white population does not greatly exceed half that of Victoria. At the end of 1882 the total white population of New Zealand but slightly exceeded half a million. That is to say, it was about equal to the population of one of our great provincial towns. And this population at that time had a debt of about 30½ millions sterling. Victoria, whose population exceeded 900,000, had a debt at the time not greatly exceeding 22 millions; while New South Wales, whose population was 817,000, had a debt of barely 18¾ millions. Compared with the remaining Australian colonies, the debt was enormous. Without, then, taking account of the old countries of Europe, we see that the liabilities of New Zealand are out of proportion great, even when compared with those of the most prosperous and most go-ahead of its sister colonies, with populations nearly twice as large as its own. Per head of the population, the debt of New Zealand at the end of 1882 amounted to the enormous sum of 58*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.*, while that of Victoria was only 24*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.*, and that of New South Wales only 22*l.* 18*s.* Again, the debt of New Zealand was equal to 7¾ years' revenue of the colony; while that of Victoria was equal to somewhat less than four years, and that of New South Wales but little more than two and a half years. And what is not the least disquieting circumstance in the whole matter is that the debt has mainly grown up within the last ten years. At the end of 1873 it did not quite reach 11 millions; at the end of 1882, as already stated, it was nearly 30½ millions. In nine years, therefore, it had nearly trebled. It will cause no surprise then, that such repeated appeals to the London money market as is here implied caused some disquietude, and that at last pressure was brought to bear upon the Government of New Zealand, and a promise was extracted from it that for three years it would not again raise a loan in London. The promise expired twelve months ago, and immediately a fresh loan was brought out. Now again the Government of New Zealand is asking for another loan of a million. It is once more, that is, resuming the course which caused disquietude four or five years ago, and is adding every year seriously to its debt. Nor is it only the colony itself that is thus piling encumbrance upon encumbrance. The London Stock Exchange official list quotes no fewer than eighteen different loans of New Zealand municipalities, the present amount of which is not less than 2,315,000*l.* And one of these municipalities is at the present time applying for a fresh loan of 100,000*l.* Thus the colony and its component parts are accumulating a mass of debt which, it is to be feared, will cause serious inconvenience, unless a wiser and more prudent course is adopted.

It is to be borne in mind, of course, that the colony of New Zealand had serious native difficulties, and that in its wars with the natives it was obliged to borrow money. In this way liabilities were forced upon it from which the purely Australian colonies were happily free. It is, furthermore, to be admitted that its later debts are incurred for useful public works. At the end of 1882 it had 1,465 miles of railway actually open, and over 4,000 miles of telegraph lines likewise open. And the municipalities to which we have referred have also borrowed for the construction of useful public works. It is not to be questioned that these railways, telegraphs, harbours, and other works greatly benefit the colony. They enable immigrants to push forward, and extend the area under cultivation; they open up to the settlers new markets; they enable them to send their produce quickly down to the sea-coast, and thence to Europe; and, in short, they greatly develop the resources of the country. Without such public works population could not grow very rapidly, and wealth could not be accumulated. But just as a private owner may embarrass himself by too great haste in improving his property, so may a new community like New Zealand. As we have just been admitting, the value of a railway is not to be measured by the revenue it returns; but, on the other hand, a new and small community cannot safely disregard the earning capacity of its lines when it builds on a large scale. If a colony builds a large mileage hastily, it runs the risk of having to pay interest on large sums sunk in works which may be very useful, and in the long run may even be very profitable, but which for the time are a dead charge. The interest, therefore, will have to be found by the taxpayer, and it may so increase his burdens as to check the growth of the colony and drive away settlers. It may, moreover, trench upon the earnings of the working classes, diminish employment, and so increase pauperism. In short, it may be laying the seeds of serious difficulties of various kinds in the future. That the condition of the colony is not thought favourable by emigrants from Europe seems clear. For in the year 1882 the excess of immigrants into the colony over emigrants from it was only 3,489; while the excess in the case of Victoria was 10,880; in that of New South Wales, 19,317; and in that of Queensland, 17,043. Again, the imports and exports together in the case of New Zealand amounted to only 29*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* per head of the population; while in the case of Victoria they amounted to 39*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.*, and in that of New South Wales to 47*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.* Of course many causes affect imports and exports besides the rate of taxation, and many causes, too, tend to direct the stream of emigration one way or another. We do not, therefore, wish to attach overmuch importance to these latter figures. Nevertheless, the fact is significant that the effective immigration into New Zealand is so small; for the climate of New Zealand is certainly more favourable to Europeans than that of any part of Australia, and the soil is extremely fertile. Other things being equal, one would expect a much greater immigration into New Zealand than into any part of Australia. Still, we do not intend to say that the finances are as yet embarrassed. We are quite satisfied that the colony has a magnificent future before it if not prematurely compromised. Nor have we any wish to deny that its resources are great, that the public works being carried on are developing those resources, and that the progress of the colony, all things considered, has been fairly satisfactory. What we urge is that the debt has grown too rapidly in the past, and is growing much too rapidly at the present time; that it is growing, not only in the case of the colony itself, but in the case also of the local authorities; and that it threatens to become so heavy as seriously to embarrass the population. Another point not to be lost sight of is that, with a population but slightly exceeding half a million, the revenue of New Zealand in 1882 was nearly four millions sterling, being at the rate of 7*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.* per head of the population. The rate in Victoria was only 6*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.* But in New South Wales it was as much as 9*l.* 5*s.* 5*d.* It is true that only 51 per cent. of the total revenue was raised by taxation, so that the actual taxation amounted to no more than 3*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* per head of the population. That, however, is much too heavy. It greatly exceeds the rate of taxation here at home, and it can be justified by nothing in the circumstances of the colony. The remaining revenue proceeds partly from the railways and other services, and partly from the sale of public land. The total area of the colony somewhat exceeds 66½ million acres. Of this area about 16 million acres, or nearly one-fourth, are still occupied by Maoris; and somewhat under 17¼ million acres have been sold; leaving about 33¼ million acres still to be disposed of. In other words, about one-third of the area in the possession of the colony has already been alienated, leaving only two-thirds open for settlers; assuming that the lands still held by the Maoris are not to be touched. The area of New Zealand somewhat exceeds that of England, Scotland, and Wales, and with one-third already alienated, the population but slightly exceeds half a million. Evidently if the Government goes on selling its lands at this rate, it will have parted with the whole long before the population has reached a respectable figure. Then it will find itself in very serious difficulties. The amount realized up to the present by the sale of lands somewhat exceeds 12 millions sterling, so that the average price obtained is only 14*s.* 1*d.* per acre.

The advocates of the policy pursued by the colony reply to such criticisms as we are now urging that the Government, as rapidly as it sells land, is building railways; that, therefore, it is merely changing the form of investment, the capital previously represented by land being henceforward represented by railways. But the answer is by no means sufficient. When the land is all bought by private owners there will be no inducement for emigrants from Europe to go to New Zealand; unless, indeed, there is such a development of manufactures as there is no reason to anticipate. European emigrants will therefore turn away from New Zealand to the colonies of Australia, where land will still continue abundant. Moreover, it is to be borne in mind that with the growth of wealth and population the value of land will rise, and that, instead of 14*s.* 1*d.* per acre, as the Government has obtained up to the present, the price of an acre of land will be represented by pounds. It would be a much wiser course, then, to be chary of the sale of land. Nor is it to be forgotten that, when the land is all sold, the difficulty which is becoming greater and greater every day in the Old World will have to be faced by the New Zealand Government. The land will be monopolized, as the opponents of landlordism term it, and a struggle will begin between the landless and the landowners. Even in the United States, where the extent of country still unsettled is so vast, it is easy to see already the germs of difficulties of this kind. How much greater will they be in an island about the size of Great Britain, which has already sold a third of the land it owns, while its population is not greater than that of many a provincial English town? That some kind of a homestead law may be necessary is probable enough; but that the Government is too lavish in its sales of land is quite evident. It could in all likelihood attract as many immigrants as it now has attracted by the sale of a third, or perhaps even a fourth, of the land it has alienated. But the real error of its policy is that it has sold the land for the purpose of maintaining an expenditure and carrying out a policy that in themselves are open to grave objection. If the debt goes on growing as it has grown during the past ten years, by the time that the whole of the land is alienated the charge of the debt will be a very heavy item even for a country with such resources as New Zealand. And in addition there will be all the ordinary expenses of administration. The Government then will have to depend entirely upon taxation and upon the revenue of the railways, the telegraphs, the post-office, and such other services as it renders to the people. There will inevitably be a cry if these revenues remain large for reductions in the interests of the people at large, and this can be conceded only by adding to the burdens of the taxpayers. The unwise policy which the colony is pursuing is thus leading it into grave economic mistakes of various kinds. It is piling up a debt which is mortgaging the future of the country. And at the same time it is parting with that form of property which beyond all question must increase in value every year that passes, and for which the demand will become more and more intense as the population grows. Not only is it doing this, but at the same time it is preparing for itself social and political difficulties of the first order. For every reason, then, it is extremely desirable that the New Zealand Government should be much more moderate in its applications to the London loan market. And the great London capitalists, who four years ago exacted from it a promise to refrain for three years to come, would perform a service to the colony if they would again compel it to hold its hand for a still longer period.

REVIEWS.

THE BOOK-LOVER'S ENCHIRIDION.*

MR. IRELAND has collected a number of passages bearing more or less, sometimes rather less than more, on books and the love of books. These he has printed in a handy tiny volume, and again in a separate edition on large paper, with two or three illustrations. In this edition the type and paper are excellent, but the volume is a little bulky, needlessly bulky. Mr. Ireland has conscientiously reprinted far too much matter of no great merit by modern authors, and has thus made a book too fat for a modest Enchiridion. It is fair to say, however, that the common copies of the Enchiridion are much more handy than the large-paper edition, and both contain many passages about bibliophilism which will be new even to omnivorous readers.

Mr. Ireland is apparently a lover of literature rather than, in the strict sense, a bibliophile. We imagine that he has little of the collector's passion, which was neatly illustrated not long ago. The newspapers have been reporting that Marie Colombier's disgraceful Sarah Barnum is out of print and costs fifty francs. A Sarah Barnum thus became a desirable book, and the collector went forth to hunt for it. "Have you Sarah Barnum?" he asked the bookseller. "Yes, sir." "How much?" "Three shillings." "Oh, then I'll take something else," replied the disappointed collector; "I thought it cost fifty francs." Mr. Ireland, as we guess, is not of this insane temper; no one who has read so many modern divines is likely to be thus fanatical. Again, we infer from his volume that he has none of the bibliophile's love of correctness and accuracy. No one can read Mr. Austin Dobson's notes on Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield, and their minutely conscientious references, without saying, "That man is a bibliophile." And no bibliophile can look at Mr. Ireland's rather happy-go-lucky quotations and mistake him for a person with the bibliographical instinct. For example, in his very first page Mr. Ireland quotes Socrates's advice, "Employ your time in improving yourself by other men's writings," and so forth, without a hint as to where the text is to be found. Is it in Xenophon, or Plato, or where? Mr. Ireland says that he has "in the case of almost every author gone to the original sources for his matter, selecting direct from the works of the writers quoted, so that the correctness of the text may be relied on.

Unluckily Mr. Ireland has not made this his invariable rule. He quotes Plato only once, and again gives no vestige of a hint as to the provenance of the passage, "Books are the immortal sons deifying their authors." We confess that we do not remember where Plato says this; and what every student will wish to do is to examine the context. No reference, except to the Curiosities of Literature, is given for the inscription on the Alexandrian Library. St. Matthew is represented by "A good man, out of the good treasure," and by "By thy words thou shalt be justified"—passages which have no peculiar application to books and the love of books. Ménagiana is quoted by volume merely, without indication of date, of edition, or page. No bibliophile quotes thus laxly, especially when he is writing a book about books. Quoting from a recent bibliographical work, Mr. Ireland prints (p. 450), "They" (bookhunters) "and their simple pleasures are the paths of a cheap and shrewish set of critics," and so on. Will Mr. Ireland think us cheap and shrewish critics for pointing out that this is nonsense? For "paths" "butts" occurs in the original. Again, who that undertakes to print a scholarly work on large paper but places accents on his Greek? Mr. Ireland neglects even this simple obvious duty, and (p. 7) prints dδivaros—abavarus. Once more, when Mr. Ireland quotes anecdotes of Petrarch, he does not go to the original, but to "the Introduction to Allibone's Critical Dictionary of English Literature" (p. 11).

All this may seem very peddling, pettifogging criticism. But part of the duty of bookmen is to set an example of accuracy and thoroughness to a hasty and casual world. This is part of the difference between literature and journalism. We actually hear people defending slovenly and ignorant mistranslations of the classical languages on the score that the mistakes are on trivial matters, and that it is "pedantic" to be correct. But why should people undertake to instruct the world at all if they cannot be accurate; and, if they are inaccurate in small things which we do understand, how can we trust them in larger matters beyond our province? Mr. Ireland's little laxities can do no one any harm; but he would have conferred a much greater benefit on bookish men if he had displayed more of the correctness which is the very first quality of the scholar. On this point he himself quotes Scaliger, giving, as usual, the reference to Scaligerana without a hint of the edition or page. "I wish," says Scaliger, as quoted by Mr. Ireland, "I wish I were a skilful grammarian. No one can understand any author without a thorough knowledge of grammar. Those who pretend to undervalue learned grammarians are arrant blockheads without any exception." What Scaliger says here about accuracy in grammar is equally true about minute carefulness in all matters concerning books. Mr. Ireland's Enchiridion has already shown that it possesses popular qualities. It is now in its third edition; in many ways it deserves to see many more editions. Will Mr. Ireland not make his next issue a work more than doubly valuable by invariably printing full and useful references, with date, place, and page, such references as are loved by men who love books? In yet another way he might improve his Enchiridion. He might omit many of his very minor and very modern prophets of bibliophilism. He might get rid of A. Bronson Alcott, and James Crossley, and Dr. Arnott, and Fanny Fern, and Hain Friswell, and the Rev. R. H. Baynes, and William Freeland, and Edwin Whipple. These and not a few other authorities he might excise, and quote instead some of the famous modern French book-lovers—men like Nodier, and Sainte-Beuve, and Jules Janin, who are preferable even to Frances Ridley Havergal. Very few French bibliophiles are quoted by Mr. Ireland, though he gives us Montaigne's delightful description of his library, and a truly appropriate passage from M. Victor Hugo. Now that a few men of books are demanding a "general overturn" of society, and are demanding it in the interests of art, it is well to remember that the Commune burned, among other things of greater value, all Motteley's uncut Elzevirs. M. Hugo, therefore, addresses one of the People who has distinguished himself by setting fire to the library. We do not think that the People has any particular hostility to books. But some of the wealthier classes like books just as some of them like hunting. Mr. Davitt, therefore, denounces hunting, and, for equally good reasons, the Commune burned books. M. Hugo exclaims, "Mais c'est un crime inouï!" and he goes on to preach at immense length about the crime, though the proletary has probably sneaked away to the nearest wine-shop. The poet points out that books are "hostile to masters," which is an inference of his own—an inference which the representative of the People might have refuted had he studied books in place of burning them. What in the world does the People care for the great names the poet quotes—for Job and Molière, Homer and Kant, or for Becaria rhyming so neatly to paria? So the bard hurries on, till the incendiary, who has come back from the wine-shop, closes his rotund mouth with "Je ne sais pas lire." Thus the proletary has an excuse not possessed by Messrs. Hyndman and Morris and the owners of the advertising van which announces the New Revolution at the price of sixpence monthly.

Among the best things in Mr. Ireland's collection is Goethe's discourse on French fiction. Much of it might have been written with equal truth to-day, though the authors on whom Goethe commented have long been outdone in their own department:—

> In the whirlpool of the literature of the day, I have been dragged into the bottomless abyss of horrors of the recent French romance-literature. I will say in one word—it is a literature of despair. In order to produce a momentary effect, the very contrary of all that should be held up to man for his safety or his comfort is brought before the reader, who at last knows not whether to fly or how to save himself. To push the hideous, the revolting, the cruel, the base, in short the whole brood of the vile and abandoned, to impossibility, is their Satanic task. One may, and must, say task; for there is at the bottom a profound study of old times, by-gone events and circumstances, remarkable and intricate plots, and incredible facts; so that it is impossible to call such a work either empty or bad. And this task even men of remarkable talents have undertaken; clever, eminent men, men of middle age, who feel themselves damned henceforward to occupy themselves with these abominations. . . . Everything true—everything æsthetical is gradually and necessarily excluded from this literature.—Goethe's Correspondence with Zelter.

Now we have no longer the redeeming "study of old times, by-gone events and circumstances." The nearest and nastiest slum, the freshest and foulest police report, furnish matter for the romance, not of despair, but of naturalism.

Mr. Ireland's old English writers are among the very best, most sensible, and least read of his authorities. If he had done nothing more than collect their remarks, his book would have possessed (as it does possess, despite its defects and superfluities) much interest and value. Here, for example, is good advice from Joseph Hall to the literary man and the bookworm:—

> Thus could I all day (as ringers use) make myself music with changes and complain sooner of the day for shortness, than of the business for toil; were it not that this faint monitor interrupts me still in the midst of my busy pleasures, and enforces me both to respite and repast; I must yield to both; while my body and mind are joined together in unequal couples, the better must follow the weaker. Before my meals, therefore, and after, I let myself loose from all thoughts; and now, would forget that I ever studied; a full mind takes away the body's appetite no less than a full body makes a dull and unwieldy mind; company, discourse, recreations, are now seasonable and welcome: these prepare me for a diet, not gluttonous, but medicinal.

Wisely, too, does Joseph Hall urge the disadvantages of late study, or rather of study pursued up to the moment of retiring to rest. "That student shall live miserably which like a camel lies down under his burden." Here, again, from Fletcher's play The Elder Brother, is a fine description of your bookworm:—

> If all thy pipes of wine were fill'd with books,
> Made of the barks of trees, or mysteries writ
> In old moth-eaten vellum, he would sip thy cellar
> Quite dry, and still be thirsty. Then, for's diet,
> He eats and digests more volumes at a meal,
> Than there would be larks (though the sky should fall)
> Devour'd in a month in Paris.
> The Elder Brother, Act i. Scene 2.

Finally, from Chevræana (quoted, alas! as vaguely as ever) comes this humorous account of hard-reading and hard-smoking Boxhorne:—

> A gentleman told me, who had studied under Boxhorne, at Leyden (successor to Heinsius, as professor of politics and history in 1653), that this learned professor was equally indefatigable in reading and smoking. To render these two favourite amusements compatible with each other, he pierced a hole through the broad brim of his hat, through which his pipe was conveyed, when he had lighted it. In this manner he read and smoked at the same time. When the bowl of the pipe was empty, he filled it, and repassed it through the same hole; and so kept both his hands at leisure for other employments. At other times he was never without a pipe in his mouth.—Chevræana.

Mr. Ireland's Enchiridion is already a pleasant treasury of book-lore, yet not without moths and rust. Let him expel his moths, especially the American varieties; let him rub away the dust of indolent and inexact reference, and the Enchiridion will deserve even more popularity than it has already obtained.

THAT one of Mr. Trollope's posthumous novels which bears the title of The Land Leaguers would evidently, if he had been able to finish it, have done no discredit to him among the productions of his third stage in novel-writing. His early Irish novels, while they showed the intimate familiarity which he had long ago gained with Irish life, showed also a decided state of novitiate in novel craft. In the time of his complete accomplishment as a master of that craft (which may be said to coincide with the Barsetshire series of tales), he meddled with Irish matters but little, though his references to them in Phineas Finn and other books showed the old mastery of the subject. An amateur of the useless "might have been" would be excusable if he speculated on what a novel with the subject of the Land League, but written in the days of Barchester Towers or The Last Chronicle, would have been like. It would have been something more than a remarkable book from the literary point of view; it would have been a not inconsiderable social and political force on the right side of the question. That unchanging problem has now got into the hands of a new generation, who, like all new generations, fancy that they are much wiser than their fathers. That Mr. Trollope, a Liberal of the Liberals, declares himself in this book dead against the Government policy up to the time of the Crimes Act, is not likely to have much effect on it. Nor in any case, perhaps, could a novelist hope to do much more than put one side of the case in a sufficiently striking light. This Mr. Trollope, if not with the success of his best days, at any rate with great force and with complete knowledge, has done here. The story is not finished, and it is, as was usual with its author, complicated with a certain amount of underplot, and with love matters which have little to do with the main issue. But the principal social aspects of the present Irish question are put here in attractive novel-form, and with the accuracy which nothing but a direct acquaintance with the facts of Irish life, or else a long and patient study of the literature of the subject, can possibly give. There are long digressions, one in particular with regard to the boycotting of the hunt in a western Irish county, which Mr. Trollope's love of the particular amusement has made him draw out at a length altogether disproportionate. An excursus on the Land Act itself, though as true as Gospel truth, is perhaps a little out of place. The Irish-American O'Mahony's experience in Parliament, and the Irish-American's daughter's experience on the stage, are hardly joined on to the main current of the story with that adroitness which Mr. Trollope would have shown if he had been quite himself. A very severe critic might object that the position of Mr. Jones of Morony Castle, new-comer in Ireland, and until recent days welcomed as a new-comer, with money in his pocket, owner of an improved and improving estate, in which he has invested not only much of his own money but considerable sums lent to him by his relations, is perhaps a little too strainedly typical. But, in the working out of the misfortunes of the hapless Jones, both truth and art are distinctly perceptible. The new American teaching and the new style of doctrine adopted by the younger and baser sort of the Roman Catholic clergy affect Mr. Jones's tenants by degrees, and his personal retainers and hangers-on by degrees, only more slowly. Worst of all, his younger son, a weak boy, is enticed to join the Roman communion, to which his father offers no very great objection, and, by insensible and gradual means, is brought to think that he must somehow wink at the misdeeds of his new co-religionists. At last a direct blow is struck at Mr. Jones by the flooding of certain carefully-drained fields and the ruin of their valuable crops. All the neighbourhood knows who has done it, and of course no one will tell. But it is strongly suspected that Florian Jones himself has some indirect knowledge of his father's enemies. On these facts the main story turns. The most interesting figure in it is an English magistrate of the type of Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Captain Clayton by name—whom the agitators fear only less than they hate him. The incidents of the story are, of course, exciting; they could hardly, considering the subject, be otherwise. The insistance of his sisters at last brings Florian to something like natural and generous feeling, and another witness is also procured. This witness is murdered in open court—an unnecessary advance on fact and probability considering the undoubted circumstances at the novelist's disposal—and Florian soon afterwards shares the same fate. It is given to the reader to understand that condign punishment, had the story been concluded, awaited the scoundrel who planned or executed these crimes, and that the various lovers were to have been made happy. But Mr. Trollope had no time to work this out. The truncum corpus of the book is, despite this drawback, far from unpleasant to read as a novel; while it is memorable as the protest—almost a death-bed protest—of an expert in the matter and a steadfast party politician against the mistaken and ruinous course which in his judgment his party were at the time, and, with insignificant and temporary modifications are still, pursuing in reference to this secular problem of Irish violence, Irish unreason, and Irish treachery.

The merits of Mr. Wemyss Reid's novel, which are very considerable, consist less in a striking novelty of incident or character than in the good writing and even execution of the work. The story opens in Belgravia in the height of the London season, and, an ill-tempered reader who neglects the precept against rash judgment may possibly be tempted to think, in the height of absurdity. For it certainly is not common for a gentleman—the Earl of Lostwithiel is represented as a gentleman in both senses—to afficher his attachment to a lady by kissing his hand to her from the balcony of his house before the public; and it is less common for a person who indulges in such unconventional proceedings to be so careless or clumsy as to mistake the maid for the mistress. But Mr. Wemyss Reid knows what he is about; and this rather startling overture conducts the reader into the plot of a very sufficiently interesting opera. Gladys Fane, the supposed object of Lord Lostwithiel's rather calf-like attentions and the cause of his discomfiture (for she has commissioned her maid to array herself in borrowed garments), is the beautiful, high-spirited, and slightly hoydenish daughter of Mr. Fane, of Fanesford, a squire with a very long pedigree and a rent-roll not much shorter. The overture is preliminary merely; and Lord Lostwithiel, though he continues to hold the position of Gladys Fane's hopeless admirer, plays but a subordinate part in the story. The first act, as it may be called, deals with election matters. Reginald Mansfield, an advanced but chivalrous Radical, has taken up the adventure of boarding Toryism, as represented by Mr. Fane, in its den—that is to say, the family borough of Fanesford. Mansfield is defeated, chiefly owing to his own excessive chivalry—and if Mr. Wemyss Reid can find some means of diffusing this quality more widely among the Radical party, England will be grateful to him. Then he disappears for the moment, and Gladys comes to the front. Her father, an estimable but weak old person, falls into the toils of a prim and plotting spinster of rank and marries her, to the horror of his daughters. One, the younger, submits, though not too gracefully. Gladys, the elder, declares war to the knife, and is beaten. Circumstances, which it is undesirable to detail, inasmuch as they form an important turning-point in the story, make Gladys a kind of exile on the Continent. Here she meets Mansfield once more, and the plot proper is properly engaged. The only thing that can be said against Mr. Wemyss Reid in this part of his story, as in some others, is that his machinery is a little conventional. An unlucky and discreditable marriage in early life is no doubt a not wholly uncommon thing. But it rarely makes so much misery in real life as in novels, because honest men at least seldom attempt to keep it concealed, while dishonest ones know that for flirting purposes the atmosphere of romance and misfortune which it throws around them is rather advantageous than otherwise. In some other respects Mr. Wemyss Reid is also too conventional. The ideal newspaper correspondent—a person remarkably different from the real—appears in his turn, also the ideal country gentleman, also the ideal old cat of aristocratic lineage, also some other rather musty types. His satire runs into the hackneyed, and is sometimes directed against private, or semi-private, societies, where good taste would prescribe abstention. From the frequency with which certain of these societies have appeared of late in novels and newspapers, some ill-natured people might assume that a good deal of blackballing must have been going on in them. Mr. Wemyss Reid, however, is a very mild offender in this respect. He has, moreover, the sufficient defence of having written a really interesting novel with plenty of incident, with good dialogue, and with attractive, if not very original, character-drawing. Monte Carlo has figured a good deal lately in fiction, but it is scarcely a worn-out topic, and Mr. Wemyss Reid uses it with ingenuity and describes it with vigour. Very cosmopolitan people will not be pleased with his sketch of the Prince Bessarion, a Continental gentleman of agreeable manners, who turns out to be a ferocious and unprincipled ruffian. Tender-hearted people will be angry with him for winding up not only without wedding bells, but with very distinct funeral ones. But, after all, it is not absolutely sufficient for a man not to be an Englishman to make him an angel, and there are, on the whole, more funerals than weddings in this world. To speak less discursively, Gladys Fane is a good and clever book, which few readers who begin it are likely to put down unfinished, and which shows considerable powers of telling a story. These powers could not have been anticipated from the author's previous literary work, which has been entirely of another kind, but that previous literary work may no doubt be credited with the fact that Gladys Fane is much better written than the run of novels, and that it is almost entirely free from the blunders as to things in general which the ordinary novel-writer strews about his pages in thoughtless or thoughtful profusion. Like most writers who have wide knowledge and interests, Mr. Wemyss Reid occasionally drops or hints opinions with which all his readers cannot be expected to agree; but he is not excessive in this, and even if he had done it to a somewhat greater extent, his story has quite enough "go" in it, his characters sufficient vitality and attraction to carry off the superfluity. The blemishes which have been noted above are but trifling, and though it cannot be said that there is any remarkable distinction about it of the kind which can be taken as announcing a new novelist of the highest class, Mr. Wemyss Reid has certainly by this book gained a place well to the front among the novelists of the class now living and writing amongst us. What we should like to see in his next book is some attempt at more definite and deeply marked character—at the drawing of an individual, and not merely of good specimens of certain conventional classes. In the other elements of novel-writing Mr. Wemyss Reid has, comparatively, less to learn.

Miss Kenyon's book shows signs of considerable immaturity in novel-writing and of no very extensive knowledge of the world. But there are also apparent in it two faculties which do not very commonly appear in the novels of beginners nowadays—the faculty of imagining character and the faculty of telling a story. The author has, however, not made the most of either. Her opening situation—that in which a handsome orphan girl accepts a situation as lady help, and, attracting the attention of a rich uncle, has adoption into the family proposed almost at once by her mistress, who has begun by being insolently rude to her—is one of those situations which might occur in real life (where nothing is improbable), but which has not the probability necessary for art. Again, Miss Kenyon has committed an error which is almost always fatal by introducing the element of religious discussion and sentiment largely into her book. Still, the book certainly gives the reader the impression—not easy to analyse or account for exactly, but sufficiently definite—that the author may do very much better. Besides the great advantages above referred to—advantages which are not seriously impaired by a certain inability to arrange dialogue—the local colour is fairly managed and not used too lavishly. But there is one curious thing here. Miss Kenyon represents one of her characters as admiring Mendelssohn and the poetry of Mr. Lewis Morris of Penbryn. Now that is a very odd conjunction of tastes.

There is nothing to which we have a more deeply-rooted objection than we have to the saying of anything that can by any possibility be unpleasant to anybody. But we are really unable to see that the volumes of translation from the Swedish or from novels of Swedish novelists, which close our list, have much justification for their existence. Mme. Emilie Carlen is, of course, one of the principal novelists of her country, but we did not know that she wrote in French, and if she did, we cannot see why French forms of proper names, French-English idioms, and such extraordinary rags of what may be supposed to have been once French itself, as "je me fearis hacher," should make their appearance in an English version of her work. That with all these drawbacks the story is still not unreadable shows that Mme. Carlen knows how to write stories, but not, we fear, that "F. E. D." knows how to translate them. Mr. Albert Alberg, in selecting certain short stories from a writer who deals much (as he confesses) in idiom and dialect, has attacked a still harder task and with even less success. There may be, for instance, some recondite joke in making an old woman say "they prefer to relegate their noses with snuff, and only laugh at my Jardin de Plants" [sic], but we confess to an entire absence of comprehension of it. We do not know what a "strandway" is, though the context would seem to show that it is Swedish-English for the American "sidewalk." "Besides, no one could expect they would keep away from the Midsummer festival only to feed an old crone who was good for nothing, that it seemed as if Death himself refused to take her," is a sentence the syntax of which (and the connexion of the last clause with the earlier) a jury of prize pupil-teachers, with permission to decide by a majority, could hardly expound satisfactorily. In short, if "Lea" writes difficult Swedish—which is a point on which we do not here pronounce—Mr. Albert Alberg writes infinitely more difficult English. Any happy person whom "the story" alone concerns, and whose appreciation of unfamiliar manners and customs may happen to be made more intense by English which is still more unfamiliar, may be recommended to the book; but no others. It would seem, if there is not an easier explanation of the matter, that some translators think the method of the plasterer's wife in Bleak House as effectual with Englishmen as with foreigners. Only make the English bad enough, and it will somehow represent Swedish, French, German, or anything else required. Now we have plenty of home-grown novels written in bad English, and on this point the strictest freetrader may be a protectionist.

RECENT MATHEMATICAL PUBLICATIONS.*

TO pure mathematics, as the one science of absolute demonstration, belongs the note of unswerving, unchallenged, continuous progress—vestigia nulla retrorsum. Before it the voice of controversy is hushed, and adversaria find no place. In the mixed sciences, where truth is won by experiment and observation, there must needs be ebb and flow. Error has to be eliminated, approximations have to be made more exact, guesswork has to be verified; whereas, in the abstract science of number and figure there is no admission of error, no balance of less or more in the measure of truth. All that is tentative and empirical may come and go, but analytical proof runs on for ever. Of the solidity and permanence of mathematical work as giving to what is concrete or material in nature the abstract form or soul, we can hardly have a more emphatic illustration than is afforded by the republication of a series of papers by Professor Stokes, written for the most part upwards of thirty years ago, in which the highest methods of analysis are applied to problems then as now the most intricate and of the most absorbing interest in the field of physical research. What more immediately strikes us on taking up these scattered and miscellaneous fragments of bygone travail is their undiminished freshness after a whole generation of life and work. Doubtless the physical sciences have advanced in the interim by leaps and bounds; but the power and beauty of the demonstrations introduced, the clearness and certainty of the mathematical processes applied to the solution of physical problems, are seen to be fully abreast of any advance that has been made in the several departments of science specially brought under treatment. In every one of these lucid and closely reasoned articles we have a permanent gain to knowledge, a veritable κτῆμα εἰς ἀεί. We see in them the work of an intellect of the first order, under the highest power that the scientific culture of the day can supply. It is well nigh startling to see laid down in them the lines of development which subsequent research and thought were destined to follow. Without the faintest suggestion of mala fides, we can hardly fail to remark how much of what passes for independent and original work, both at home and abroad, is to be recognized in essays buried for years in the pages of The Cambridge Philosophical Transactions, The Mathematical Journal, or other serials of select but limited circulation. In the latest development of many a theorem, or the most advanced stage of many a complex physical problem, we may discern the germ in hints thrown out by the then youthful Cambridge mathematician. Reluctant as the author in his modesty has shown himself to recall from oblivion these records of bygone labour, the advice of friends, backed by the judicious liberality of the University Press, has happily secured that boon for the public. The second of the two volumes, making up the series, has lately come to hand, the preceding one having seen the light three years ago.

As some test not only of the prophetic insight we have spoken of, but of the power of suggestiveness, for which credit has never been given in the right quarter, we would refer our readers to the able summary of the progress in hydrodynamics during the intermediate period presented by Mr. W. W. Hicks to the same scientific body at their meeting in 1881. The main stages in advance are marked by the publication of Helmholtz's paper on Vortex Motion in 1856, and by that of Thomson and Tait's Natural Philosophy, which introduced a new general method into the treatment of hydrodynamical problems by the application of the Lagrangian equations of motion, a further notable advance being made in the new and greatly expanded edition of the same important work issued in 1879. Of many subordinate contributions to the general theory of fluid motion spread over the intervening year, a prominent place has been occupied by a paper put forth by Clebsch in 1856 on the motion of an ellipsoid in fluid, considering separately pure translation and rotation, and noticing that the fluid moves in stream-lines (in Fäden), with the result of an apparent increase of mass, differing in different directions, as well as a diminution of gravity, from whence the writer deduces the law that the form of the curves in which the particles of the fluid appear to move relatively to the centre of gravity of the body depends only upon the form of the body and the curve in which its centre of gravity moves. Now it is curious to see how much of these results is to be found by anticipation in a paper reprinted in the first of the volumes before us, written in 1843, "On some Cases of Fluid Motion"; in which paper there is also given by Professor Stokes the first conception of what is known as the method of images, a most effective mode of attacking particular problems in fluid motion, to which the author returns in a subsequent note, suggested by Sir W. Thomson's discovery of the electrical image of a point of electricity in presence of a conducting sphere, previous to which Stokes's theory had attracted no attention. Another masterly paper of the same early period, which revolutionized what was known of the subject, was that on Internal Friction of Solids in Motion, and on the Equilibrium and Motion of Elastic Solids. To this is due, perhaps, the most important of all later additions to the theory of motion in fluids, involving the whole problem of vortex motion, or that in which the velocities cannot be expressed in terms of a potential. The vocabulary of science has been enlarged in the interval; a nominally new branch having been opened up in the study of kinematics, so named by Ampère, such terms as kinetic energy or vector potential being looked for in vain in writings of that early date. Still, for the kinematical properties of the motion, or that relating to the rotation of minute molecular particles, the fundamental ideas are to be sought in Stokes's article. The discussion has since been carried on in Helmholtz's admirable paper in Crelle's Journal (1861) on the laws of vortex motion, in which he finds solutions for the four differential equations for the velocities when the rotations at every point of the fluid are known, adding thereto examples of the motion of the fluid due to infinite straight vortices and to circular vortex filaments.

Nor had the properties of discontinuous motion or jets, hardly noticed by mathematicians until pointed out by Helmholtz in 1868, been overlooked by Stokes when writing upon the Critical Values of the Sums of Periodic Series (1847), his suggestions being taken up as the foundation of the later treatment of the subject by Kirchkoff, Riemann, Maxwell, and Lord Rayleigh. The equations, which had hitherto been confined to perfect fluids, were further extended to include the conditions of viscosity, the form to which he reduced the differential equations being that now generally adopted. On Oscillatory Waves (1847) we have a brilliant application of analysis to the observations of Mr. Scott Russell and Professor Airy, the discussion passing into the theory of sound, being followed up by a later paper on certain Difficulties attaching to it, started by Professor Challis (vol. ii. pp. 82-89), since treated by Earnshaw, Riemann, and Rankine. Not less valuable or suggestive are his numerous papers upon the theory of light. Besides being distinguished in these special departments as an experimentalist, no less than as a mathematician, he is ready with many a practical suggestion to the mechanician and the engineer, discussing a differential equation relating to the breaking of railway bridges, and noting the omission by Mr. Cox of the vis viva arising from the horizontal motion of the train or other body in motion. Another point in which he is found anticipating what probably passes with most people for a modern application of science is the following up the suggestion of Airy in the description of a lens to correct the astigmatism of a defective eye.

From transcendental operations in the upper regions of analysis to the elements of linear geometry will be thought perhaps as abrupt a drop as may well be. Having, however, a batch of educational works inviting notice, we would fain append a few words in recommendation of a little treatise on Conic Sections by Mr. H. G. Willis. So much preference being naturally given to the analytical method as an instrument for unfolding mathematical truth, there is all the more need for exercising the learner in that geometrical training which is the truest discipline of the mind. Since the great days of the Principia no one, alas! has been found to bend the bow of Ulysses. In this useful manual the conic is first discussed in general; (a) with reference to focus and directrix; (b) as the projection of a circle or a section of a cone; (c) as the reciprocal of a circle; every common or closely analogous property of the three conics is next proved by a single proposition; the relation between the conics, their similarities and dissimilarities, being brought prominently forward. At the end of each chapter numerous examples, carefully graduated, are appended.

With all his defects of matter and style, Euclid still holds rule in our schools after more than two thousand years. Much as we may desiderate a text-book of elementary geometry simpler in arrangement, more precise in definition, plainer in wording, and otherwise more fitted to the intelligence of beginners, such a model work has yet to be written. The most satisfactory attempts in that direction seem to lie in the direction of giving greater closeness to the text, whilst adhering to the plan of the great elementator, semi-mythical as he is in his historic[illegible] of surroundings. A praiseworthy effort of this sort, ingenious and [illegible]ecording to Mr. [illegible] April 27th. Shot

Mr. Howard by the discovery that his son, having been supposed to have learnt the first two books at one of our great public schools, did not really understand the first proposition. His secret lies, besides consummate clearness of statement, in discarding the use of letters, and building up each theorem or problem by the adoption of the recently suggested use of lines of different colours, addressing the mind through the eye with great directness, and affording a novel sense of pleasure to what has generally been found the driest of studies. We are not surprised to be told that his son not only easily mastered the propositions thus put before him, but had little subsequent difficulty with his Euclid.

In The Elements of Plane Geometry, prepared by the Committee for the Improvement of Geometrical Teaching, we have a sequel, compiled as a more complete series of proofs, to the propositions put forth as a Syllabus of Plane Geometry some eight years ago. Notwithstanding the sale of an edition of three thousand copies, and the increasing demand for the work by teachers and students, reported by the compilers, we doubt whether it is destined widely to supersede the time-honoured manual. Whether the opening definition that "a point has position but it has no magnitude" is an improvement upon Simson's long-used expansion of the pithy original of the old master, σημεῖόν ἐστιν οὗ μέρος οὐθέν, may be questioned; nor is a straight line likely to be made clearer to the boyish understanding as being "such that any part will, however placed, lie wholly on any other part if its extremities are made to fall on that other part." The second book, on the equality of areas, with exercises attached, seems to us the best drawn up and fullest of suggestions for the teacher.

IN a previous notice (Saturday Review, November 24th, 1883) of the last volume of the Transactions of the Institution of Naval Architects we referred to some papers of great merit which want of space prevented us from then considering. We propose now to speak of two of these, which, albeit some time has passed since they were read at the Institution, are very well worth attention, as they deal with subjects of great importance, not much elucidated since they were written, and are practically as new and as pertinent as if they had been published yesterday. The first of these, to which very appropriately the place of honour in the volume is given, is by Captain G. H. Noel, R.N., and treats of "Certain Points of Importance in the Construction of Ships of War." Sailors, when they do take up the pen, often write extremely well. Trained from their youth to practical work, they take a thoroughly practical view of any subject that presents itself to them, and are not the least given to verbiage, to elaborate but unsupported hypotheses, or to hazy mathematical speculations leading to no definite result. It is not, then, surprising to find that Captain Noel's suggestions are very valuable ones, that they are briefly and clearly stated, and that his terse and lucid remarks present a pleasant contrast to the misty talk to be found in other parts of the Transactions. The subjects he deals with are:—The strength and height of the bow necessary for ramming; watertight compartments; armoured conning towers; and torpedo defence. With respect to the first of these he says much that is of weight. What a great naval engagement would be like in our time is a matter of conjecture and doubt to those who have followed most closely the developments of modern artillery and naval architecture and have thought most carefully on naval warfare, and nothing approaching certainty can be attained; but undoubtedly not a few of those who are competent to consider the question are inclined to think that a great sea-fight might be principally decided by ramming. The success of Admiral Tegethoff at Lissa, the sinking of the Vanguard, and the manner in which the Kaiser Wilhelm sent her consort to the bottom, tend to support this view; and, as a successful thrust does not merely cripple the adversary, but absolutely destroys him, ramming is very likely to be attempted by bold men; but then if it is more overwhelming than the other kinds of attack, it is also more dangerous. After one vessel has sunk another, it may be found that she is herself in no very enviable position, and the question which suggests itself is—What chance is there of the vessel which succeeds in ramming receiving vital injuries, or sinking with her victim? The not inconsiderable risks which the winning ship runs are briefly summed up by Captain Noel, who says that when design and construction have been imperfect there is danger of the ram-bow being forced in, of the bow being twisted or broken, or of the vessel capsizing owing either to want of height in her bow and freeboard causing her to lurch and capsize or sink head first, or to the breaking away of the bow upper works, the consequent interlocking of the vessels, and the sinking of both. These are very real dangers, and against the two first of them great precautions are already taken. The ram-bow is supported by breasthooks, by armoured decks, and by other means. Nevertheless, some may doubt with Captain Noel whether in large ships of the central citadel type sufficient strength is given, as the bow is not supported by side armour. This weakness also tends, with vessels of the build named, to increase the second danger mentioned, that from oblique or twisting strains, which are certainly not unlikely to occur in ramming. It must be remembered that, though superior skill may enable a captain to give a blow instead of receiving one, it can hardly be expected that any man will be so preternaturally skilful as always to strike at right angles. If the blow is oblique, there may be, before the successful ship can be got clear of the other, a tremendous strain put on the bow. Is this sufficiently guarded against? Captain Noel thinks not; and recommends that a more secure root for the ram be constructed by "building its point on to a cigar-end-shaped structure, worked smoothly into the bow, and giving the sharpness requisite for the speed of the ship by its horizontal as well as its vertical entrance"; and no doubt this would considerably increase strength. With regard to height of bow Captain Noel says that, although some of the coast-service ironclads have fairly high bows, "no vessel of this type can give her captain the confidence he would possess were he commanding a ship with a high, well-constructed bow, which would ensure the enemy he had rammed being thrown off clear," and remove all risk of entanglement or of a heavy lurch; and he also considers that, with vessels constructed of very light steel, the danger may imperceptibly creep in of making the upper works too light, and that such weakness may, in case of ramming, lead to disaster.

That there is much truth in what he says about the necessity for huge strength in the bow can hardly be denied, and from the tone of the discussion which followed the reading of his paper it is clear that his hearers were much impressed by his remarks. His arguments, however, seem at first to be met by the reply which is so often given to those who ask for more strength in some part of a ship, or for heavier guns. A naval architect has but a limited amount of buoyancy at his disposal, and if he increases strength and weight in one part, he must necessarily in some other part lessen weight and lessen strength. If the bow is to be made stronger there must be less armour, or thinner armour, or lighter guns. This, of course, is as certain as that two and two make four—if, indeed, the higher mathematicians will allow that to be a certainty—but, indubitable as the fact is, Captain Noel's contention is not really disposed of by it. A ram may turn out to be the most important part, or, to speak more accurately, the most important weapon of a ship, more important even than her guns, and in that case everything must be sacrificed to it; armour must be diminished and guns made fewer and lighter, in order that the ram-bow may be perfect. If, however, it is not thought worth while to sacrifice much in order to make the thrusting weapon perfect, it may be questioned whether it would not be better to abandon it altogether. A ram which is not thoroughly efficient may be worse than useless. If a gun were invented which would possibly destroy an adversary, but would also very possibly annihilate the vessel on board which it was fired, it would probably not be fired on board a ship. If ramming is to result in the loss of the victorious vessel, it may be thought that rams should be dispensed with and the speed of ships increased.

Of the other questions considered by Captain Noel, that which he treats best is the one relating to constructing conning towers, as his remarks about watertight compartments and torpedoes, though very sensible, have no special novelty. With regard to conning towers, he contends that they should be of enormous strength and should have wings—i.e. thick walls of iron—projecting from each of the corners of the tower, which will afford partial protection to the captain when he desires to take a freer and wider survey than can be obtained from the inside of his fastness. Here, again, the old difficulty about weight comes in, and with conning towers there is the further difficulty that to increase their weight is to increase weight very high up. Still Captain Noel appears to be in the main right. He called the captain in his paper, the head, and, in the discussion which followed, the brains, of the ship; but the latter simile is not perfect, as no ship can get on without a commanding officer, whereas a great many people seem to get on perfectly well without brains. Setting aside figures of speech, it may be said that, with ironclads at all events, there may be for the time paralysis of the vessel if the captain is killed or disabled; and though of course he can be replaced, a brief interval of paralysis may be fatal. Every means should, therefore, be taken to obtain proper protection for captains in armoured ships. On his main points, then, Captain Noel undoubtedly makes a good case. What he says about compartments and torpedoes does not, as just indicated, call for any special comment; but we cannot conclude this notice of his valuable paper without referring to a remarkable incident in the discussion which followed it. Mr. J. D'A. Samuda stated that Admiral Tegethoff once described to him the ramming of the Ità d'Italia, and said, "If I were to live a thousand years, I would never ram another ship, the impression produced upon me was so awful." The Admiral went on to say that his orders to his captains were to turn their ships and ram at a certain signal, but that his was the only vessel that did it. From this Mr. Samuda drew the inference that the ram was not likely to be much used in naval warfare; but this view does not appear to have been at all accepted by the naval officers in the room.

The other paper to which we referred at the beginning of this article is by Mr. James Dunn, and relates to watertight compartments in merchant ships. On this subject Mr. Dunn is peculiarly well qualified to speak. Some time ago, when the question of arming merchant vessels was under consideration, he was, we believe, deputed by the Admiralty to examine the steamers offered as potential men of war, and to decide, or at all events to give reasons for deciding, whether they should be placed on the Admiralty list. To be admitted into the list it was and is of course absolutely necessary that a vessel should be really divided into watertight compartments, as without them a single shot may sink her. Most melancholy were the results when, in 1875, inquiry was made. The Admiralty laid down the rule that "No ship should be considered suitable for the purposes of the State without her bulkheads being so arranged that, if any one of her compartments were laid open to the sea in smooth water, the loss of buoyancy thereby occasioned should not endanger the safety of the ship"; and, marvellous as it may seem, it was found that there were not, in the whole mercantile marine, thirty ocean-going ships fit for admission under this very moderate condition. So much for the talk which had been for years before 1875 of the safety gained by watertight compartments. Since then, however, there has been a great improvement, and, at the time when Mr. Dunn's paper was written, there were 300 ships complying with the requirement, and some were being built which could dispense with buoyancy in any two compartments and still retain floating power. This is gratifying, but a painful fact has to be mentioned as well. There are, or were, "more than 4,000 ships of 100 tons and upwards which would sink if any compartment between the collision and stuffing-box bulkheads were laid open to the sea in smooth water," owing, not to the possible giving way of the bulkheads, but to the fact that they are so constructed that if water gets into one compartment it must of necessity flow gradually into the others. As was explained long ago in the columns of this journal, bulkheads are, generally speaking, only taken up to a little above the water-line. If a compartment fills the vessel of course sinks somewhat, and the tops of the bulkheads become lower than the level of the outside water, and the consequence of course is that, if one compartment is pierced, all the others fill by degrees. Bulkheads of this kind are not only useless, but, as Mr. Dunn points out, absolutely dangerous, as by keeping the water for a time in the fore part of the ship they may cause her bows to be carried under, whereas, if water flows along the whole length of the vessel, her trim will at all events be preserved. The only proper way of constructing bulkheads is to carry them to the upper deck; and when this is done, and when there is a divisional bulkhead in the fore and after hold, two compartments may fill without the vessel sinking. To prove this in the most practical way, the Admiralty has had models constructed and placed in a tank, and diagrams of these in various conditions are appended to Mr. Dunn's paper. In thus showing what can be achieved without any great expenditure, the Admiralty have certainly done most excellent work; they have also done excellent work in ascertaining what steamers are rightly constructed. It is to be hoped that the result of their labours will be made known widely, as every possible means ought to be employed to inform the public which of the great passenger steamers are really safe. At present this scarcely seems to be done, and we trust that Mr. Dunn's excellent paper may be read outside professional circles, as it may stimulate a demand for information which ought to be given as freely as may be possible.

HANDBOOK FOR THE PANJAB.*

THE late Mr. Eastwick was more distinguished in literature than in politics. As M.P. for Falmouth he was certainly listened to by the House on Indian subjects, and he never became one of those bores whose persistence raises a feeling of amazement at the reputation which they certainly gained in India and as certainly forfeited in England. But Mr. Eastwick did not acquire the character of an Indian authority, and he was much better employed when editing the Gulistan and collecting materials for his various Handbooks, than in speaking on the Indian Budget and propounding unnecessary questions to the Secretary of State. In truth he was an elegant and accomplished scholar, and was well versed in Oriental history and languages. His Handbooks for Madras and Bengal are full of information, generally correct in details, and digested and arranged on sound principles. He says truly, in his Preface to his latest work, that whether for beauty of scenery, splendour of architecture, historical association, or political importance, the Panjab and North-Western India may fairly claim precedence over any other Presidency. We may omit the Himalayas from such comparison, for our mountain barrier is not really the property of any one particular Province. In variety of aspect, combination of wood and water, sparkling rivers, grassy slopes and ranges of hills, the Central Provinces surpass anything that the Panjab or Scinde can show. Madras has specimens of Hindu architecture of magnificent extent and unequalled proportions. Nor would any one with an eye for colour compare any one of the finest districts of the Doab of Hindostan at their best, with the plains of Central and Eastern Bengal at their worst. And the Ghauts of the Bombay Presidency, with their rapid descent into the Konkan, present features almost unique. But the Panjab has always claimed a large share of public attention; and, though one of our later acquisitions, has never from the very beginning of this century been left out of account in estimating the progress, position, and risks of our dependency. It needs no long argument to show why this is so. A good deal may have happened, as Mr. Gladstone might say, between Alexander's victory over Porus and the battle of Chillianwala. But the Panjab has always been the gate of India. Traces of Grecian art and ancient coins in abundance attest the influence of Græco-Bactrian dynasties. The influence of Buddhism from the south, or of Scythians from the north, the changes in royal families between the Macedonian invasion and the final ascendency of Mohammedan conquerors in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, are to this day stock subjects of dispute with antiquaries. Several of the early Mogul Emperors attempted to rule India from Cabul and Lahore, and never fully succeeded in this attempt. Jehangir's tomb is one of the sights of the latter city, and may partly justify the remark of Mr. Eastwick that this "mausoleum is one of the finest in the world, and, after the Taj and Kutb Minar, is the noblest building in India." But it is curious that in this comparison the author should have omitted the tomb of Akbar at Secundra, near Agra. Those who have seen the mausoleums of that great Emperor and of his son have no hesitation in declaring the tomb of Jehangir to be the inferior of the two. Then when the Mussulman Empire passed from the hands of decrepit and effete successors of Aurengzebe to vigorous Nawabs and Subahdars, or was cut and carved by the Mahrattas, or was signed away to the representative of the foreign adventurer and merchant, the Sikhs from a reforming sect became a first-class military power. And so for forty years, what with Rangit Singh, his vigour, and sagacity, with the anarchy which ensued after his death, with the marvellous tact shown by our political officers on the frontier in keeping our road open to Afghanistan after our first disaster there, and again with Sikh campaigns ending in the annexation of the kingdom, the Panjab continued to hold a foremost place in the estimation of all Indian statesmen. Then came a period into which, by a combination of rare ability and good luck, was crammed as much of administrative success as is ever given for one generation to witness and for its successors to admire. There were no impediments in telegraphs, in platform meetings, in the platitudes of Liberal Associations, and in light-hearted questioners in Parliament, ready, at ten minutes' notice, to adapt the British Constitution to the rival sects and races which we can only just manage to discipline into the appearance of a peaceful community. But there were the Lawrences, with a picked band of some of the best civil and military officers that could be got together, not by competition but by the pure process of selection; and at the head of all was Lord Dalhousie himself. And so a fine chapter was added to the annals of the East India Company; and, if there were some errors of haste or misapprehension, there was an amount of real permanent progress in everything that can make a community prosperous and a Government an object of reverence and awe.

It was not, however, Mr. Eastwick's purpose to distil an essence from Blue-books or to rival Sir Richard Temple in describing in gorgeous hues the change of a province from anarchy to order. His plan seems to have been as follows. First we have a slight sketch of the ancient and modern history of the Panjab. Then a brief catalogue of the objects of interest in the Panjab proper, as well as in those districts made over to its Government after the Mutiny. Then comes a notice of its tribes and a vocabulary in Panjabi and Sindhi. The remainder of the book is divided into forty-three routes, which can be varied by every traveller according to his means, fancy, or leisure. Hints as to diet and dress have been judiciously compressed. With exception to a few canons, on which most men are agreed whether their experience has been acquired on the Megna, on the Indus, or on the Kaveri, there is nothing about which Anglo-Indians differ so much as the details of outfit or the nature of personal comforts. And nothing is more irritating to a tourist who has laid-in a plentiful stock of what he is assured are indispensables, than to be told on landing at Bombay or Calcutta by his candid host that about one-half are absolutely noxious or useless, while the other could have been procured as good or even better in Bandi Bazaar or Dalhousie Square. In his account of the Commissioners and Lieutenant-Governors of the Province, there are divers not unimportant omissions. There is no mention at all of the Board at Lahore established in 1849, of which Sir H. Lawrence was President, and John Lawrence and Mr. C. G. Mansel the members. Then the distinctions between the judicial and the financial Commissioner and the several Commissioners of divisions are not well observed, and to an ordinary traveller would be as perplexing as were to Hadji Baba the Chairman and Deputy-Chairman of the East India Company, who came in a hackney-coach and were announced as sitters on chairs and sitters on stools. And we find no allusion to the establishment of the Chief Court at Lahore, which is to the Province pretty much what the High Courts are elsewhere. At p. 187 it is stated that the celebrated Koh-i-nur diamond was brought to England by Colonel Mackeson and Captain Ramsay, and delivered to the Court of Directors, whence it passed to Her Majesty the Queen. There was no division of responsibility about so priceless a jewel. Lord Dalhousie entrusted the gem to the sole care of his kinsman, who went home in a Queen's ship, and, we believe, never parted with his treasure for a moment either by day or night. A more serious blunder occurs in the account of the battle of Chillianwala, in which a well-known panic of cavalry is set down to the account of the 3rd Dragoons. For this regiment read the 14th. The 3rd or Mudki Wallahs, was not present at Chillianwala at all. Mr. Eastwick draws attention to a ridiculous entry in the register of the church at Peshawar regarding the death of the Rev. Isidore Löwenthal of the American Presbyterian Mission, who was murdered in 1864 by one of his own servants. It is another instance of the sheer inability of some well-meaning persons to discern what is incongruous and absurd on the most solemn occasions. The entry, according to Mr.

by his own Chaukidar (Watchman). 'Well done, thou good and faithful servant.'" No wonder that the native stone-cutter who carved the inscription and had some sense of humour, added in Persian the words "Don't laugh." At p. 333 wood is put where wool is meant, but the error will hardly puzzle any traveller. And, generally, the accuracy in names, dates, and spelling is very considerable.

The interest of this Handbook is enhanced by the inclusion of certain notable places in Rajputana. Owing to the spread of railways this remarkable tract is now easy of access. The Handbook draws attention to the masterpieces of Jain architecture to be found at Mount Aboo, to the plateau which is more than five thousand feet above the level of the sea and which forms a delightful sanatorium in the hot season, to the lake 2,000 feet long by nearly as many broad on the plateau itself, regarding which there is, of course, a legend that it was scooped out by the nails of an ascetic, and to a curious episode of a huge lion seen basking on one terrace or walk while a party of servants were taking English children for their airing on another just below. We find also one of those "anomalies" of which we have heard a great deal lately. There is abundance of game on Mount Aboo and naturally plenty of sportsmen. But these persons, by the express orders of our Government, refrain from shooting peafowl and blue pigeons, because these birds happen to be sacred in the eyes of Hindus. Mr. Eastwick might have added that this prohibition was deemed of sufficient importance to be included in a formal treaty made with the Rao of Serohi, from whom we hold the land: and that other stringent clauses were inserted. Soldiers are not to fish in the lake near the residence of the priests, or to take mangoes, nectarines, and honey from the native gardens. No trees are to be cut without the permission of the Political Superintendent; and no cattle are to be slaughtered on the hill, nor is beef to be brought up from the plains below. And the Rao has practically refused to modify or abolish this "invidious and degrading" distinction of race and creed, though beef is considered a necessary in English cantonments, and, what is more strange, the British Government has never insisted, as it might do with a tributary State, on the abolition of this dreadful clause. Ajmir is remarkable for a monument to the late Colonel Dixon, of the Bengal Artillery, who was Superintendent there for many years. The efforts of this officer in reducing the Mairs to order, in clearing a jungly country of bands of robbers, in forming an irregular corps out of those very banditti, and in persuading the inhabitants to do away with witch-finding, female infanticide, and slavery, were repeatedly acknowledged by such men as the late Colonel Sutherland, the late Mr. James Thomason, Lord Hardinge, and Lord Dalhousie. Felix opportunitate mortis might almost be applied to him, as he died in June 1857, though he had, with others, to leave Ajmir when the Bengal Sepoys broke into mutiny at Nusseerabad, the military cantonment, and the Bombay cavalry, till then believed to be staunch, refused to charge their comrades. We have before us an excellent History of Mairwarra, published in 1850 and now out of print, in which the administration of Colonel Dixon, and his predecessors Mr. Wilder of the Civil Service, Colonel Tod the Governor-General's agent, and Colonel Hall, C.B., are recorded in no boastful or vainglorious spirit. We must warn tourists or students who adhere to the old-fashioned spelling to look for an account of the most ancient of the Rajput Princes under Udaipur. Mr. Eastwick, after duly chronicling the difficulties of transit by bullock-cart when the railway is left, and the Dawk bungalows very badly provided with furniture and cooking utensils, remarks that the Maharana (not Maharaja) is said to be lineally descended from the hero of the Ramayana, whose date is some time before the Trojan War. He should have added that the present family can trace its descent, without solar myths or vague traditions to help it, as far back as the second century of our era, and that by universal admission the Maharana is allowed to be the first of Rajput chiefs, neither Jaipur nor Jodhpore making any counter-claim. But Udaipur or Oodeypore has been often at issue with his own feudatory chiefs, and the British agent has repeatedly had to interfere and settle disputes about the sums which these chiefs are bound to pay to their superior for marriages or administration, or the number of horse and foot which they must equip for his service. These elements of "feudality," somehow, die very hard, and are often found where advanced thinkers would least expect. But if Oodeypore is the oldest, Jaipur is the best administered of the Rajput States. The late Maharaja was a worthy descendant of the celebrated Jai Sing II., nicknamed Sewai, or "a man and a quarter"—as we should put it, a man and a half. The Chouk, or central street, is remarkable for its width, cleanliness, and regularity. The rest of the city is laid out in streets and cross-streets at right angles. In the Maharaja's palace the hall of audience is built of pure white marble. There is a menagerie and a public garden seventy acres in extent, which it cost 40,000*l.* to lay out, and requires 3,000*l.* a year to keep up. The late Maharaja set up at his own expense a fine statue of Lord Mayo, with a suitable inscription. And there are many other sights; the Jaipur College, the cenotaphs of deceased Maharajas burnt long ago, including that of Sewai Jai Sing where a lamp is always burning like Vesta's fire, the observatory, and the old capital of Amber, within easy reach of the modern town. Mr. Eastwick might have omitted a footnote, in which he sneers at Mountstuart Elphinstone as "a so-called historian," because he has omitted the precise date of one of Nadir Shah's battles. Now a very fair Karnál between Nadir and Mohamed Shah, is given at p. 626 of Elphinstone's second volume; and in the synopsis it is expressly stated that the battle was fought in February 1739. And when Mr. Eastwick talks of "meagre" accounts, we might retort that his own account of the Botanical Gardens at Saharunpore is not, for a guide-book, very full, and that he does not allude to the famous Government stud at that station, lately abolished on account of an expense which was incommensurate with the object of horseing our cavalry. The vocabulary of the Panjabi and Sindhi dialects will have an interest for civilians and military men. A large proportion of the words will easily be recognized by any fair Urdu or Persian scholars. But there are divers local terms and some curious contributions and varieties of pronunciation. We close the book with regret that we shall have no more Handbooks from an author in whom were united scholarship, industry, and correct appreciation of the many wonderful sights and scenes of our Indian empire.

TO the important question as to how we can best promote the health of the community, and thus in some measure lessen the doctor's occupation, various ostensible answers are given in the shape of medical literature. They do not all hit the mark, or show equal bona fides. There is the alarmist school, not altogether unrepresented in the medical journals, which dilates, in terms more dogmatic than science warrants, on the multiform causes of disease, and renders life not worth living to many nervous people who take for granted everything that they see in print. Then we have the "Family Physician" and "Domestic Medicine" category of books, which, as a rule, benefit, if anybody, the writers or the publishers, and in the long run may help rather to fill than to empty the pockets of the doctors, from the ignorant meddling which they encourage. Far different from these is another class of books which seek to put before the public the principles of health rather than the causes of disease, and, by emphatically teaching what is natural and normal, endeavour to instil into our minds the belief that to live according to the dictates of science is the best way to attain to that prevention which is confessedly better than cure. Even a little physiological knowledge, if sound, is not dangerous, but useful, and the more such knowledge is diffused in the community the more may we expect both physical and mental health to abound. In a great measure The Book of Health, now before us, is deserving of a welcome as tending in the right direction. It is meant, as stated in the preface, to teach how disease can be prevented, and, though it has several drawbacks from its usefulness, it contains among the contributions of its various authors very much that is valuable, and some of its matter is of really great merit. The introductory article by Mr. Savory is a clear and practical résumé of important physiological knowledge, and strikes the right note in discrediting the preaching of the ultra-sanitarians. The author's remarks on alcohol and tobacco, for instance, will meet with the approval of the scientific doctor and the broad-minded philanthropist alike, and are in striking contrast with the claptrap medical writing, so common in our day, which condemns a practice in toto because it may perhaps do infinitesimal harm or conceivably shorten a long life by an insignificant period. We have had enough of the alarmists who tell us that we must disinfect books from circulating libraries and give up using hansom cabs because some horses may possibly have the glanders.

A very sensibly-written and interesting article by Sir Risdon Bennett, the late President of the College of Physicians, gives accurate and useful instruction regarding "Food and its Uses in Health." Being based on the work of well-accredited authorities, it contains no debatable matter, and is to be thoroughly relied on. Dr. Lauder Brunton's treatment of "Stimulants and Narcotics" is quite accordant with the line taken in the introduction, and is at once elaborate and broadly philosophical in tone. One remark in this paper concerning smoking will appeal to most reflective indulgers in tobacco—namely, that one great inducement to smoke, perhaps we may add often the greatest, is the immediate effect the act produces as a local stimulant to the nerves of the mouth, nose, or lungs; and Dr. Brunton instances the practice of a distinguished physiologist and physician who, when trying to solve a difficult point, is accustomed to light a cigaretto and smoke for a minute or two until the difficulty is solved. The effect produced here, of whatever value it may be, is unlikely to be due to the absorption of the constituents of the smoke. We imagine that many brain-workers indulge in the practice of the physiologist referred to. In this otherwise excellent article, the author occasionally shows a tendency to a little ultra-speculation, and perhaps a slight want of humour. Many physiologists and physicians, as well as others, may smile, for instance, when they read that "good wine or beer is said to make a man fall on his side; whisky, espe-

Four per Cent. Perpetual Preference Stock. 1884.

Price of Issue, £85 for every £100 of Stock.

Dividend contingent on the profits of each year, and to commence to accrue on January 1, 1887.

Authorized by the Special General Meetings of the Proprietors, held on February 24, 1883, and on August 25, 1883, in accordance with the provisions of the Hull, Barnsley, and West Riding Junction Railway and Dock (New Works) Act, 1882, and the Hull, Barnsley, and West Riding Junction Railway and Dock (Various Powers) Act, 1883.

Subscriptions are invited for the balance unallotted of the above Stock, on the following terms and conditions:—

1. The price is £85 for every £100 of stock, and no sum less than £10, or that is not a multiple of £10, will be allotted.

2. The deposit on allotment is £30 per £100, and must be paid to the Bankers named on the Allotment Letter on or before the 31st January, 1884. If not so paid, the allotment will thereupon become cancelled.

3. The balance is payable in the instalments, and on the dates of payment subjoined, viz.:—

£15	per £100	on the	1st July, 1884.
£15	"	"	1st January, 1885.
£15	"	"	1st July, 1885
£10	"	"	1st January, 1886.

4. Subscribers will have the option of paying the above-named instalments in advance on the day fixed for the payment of the deposit, or any one of the days fixed for the payment of the first or any subsequent instalment; and interest at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum will be allowed by way of rebate for the time the payment in advance is made

5. If an instalment remains unpaid after the due date, interest at the rate of £6 per cent. per annum, will be charged upon the arrears.

6. In the event of any instalment and the interest due thereon remaining unpaid for more than thirty days after the due date, the Directors reserve to themselves the right to declare all previous payments forfeited, and to dispose of the Stock at their discretion for the benefit of the Company.

7. No sum less than £10, or that is not a multiple of £10, will be transferred, and Stock transferred is to be held by the transferee subject to the conditions of the original Allotment; and no Stock will be transferred until any instalment, of which notice has been given, is paid.

8. Twenty-one days' notice of the first and subsequent instalments will be sent by post to the Registered Proprietors of the Stock.

The rapidly approaching completion of the Company's works, authorized by their Act of 1880, renders it very desirable that the extension of the Company's system to Huddersfield and Halifax, the construction of the new Fish Dock, and the erection of the Central Passenger Station in Hull, as authorized by the Company's Acts of 1882 and 1883 respectively, should be proceeded with without delay.

It has been resolved to enter upon a contract with Messrs. Lucas and Aird for the construction of the entire works, on arbitration terms and prices, with a view to the greatest economy. This arrangement has been accepted by that firm, and it is believed the works can be completed in three years from their commencement.

The trade of Hull, upon which the prosperity of the Company's undertaking must always largely depend, continues steadily to increase. The tonnage upon which dock dues were paid in 1882 was 2,146,477 tons, against 2,017,719 tons in the previous year, showing an increase of 208,158 tons. The estimated tonnage to the close of this year is 2,355,000, showing a further increase of about 100,000 tons over 1882, and a total increase over last of more than 300,000 tons.

The extension of the Company's system to Huddersfield and Halifax will be of incalculable advantage in preserving and fostering the trade of the port with the West Riding and the Midland districts.

The construction of the Fish Dock, urgently called for by a large section of the trade, will largely increase the volume of that trade, and put a highly remunerative traffic on the railway.

The Company's Act of 1880, authorizing the extension of their system to Huddersfield and Halifax, was promoted at the request of a deputation, composed of members of the Corporations and Chambers of Commerce of Huddersfield and Halifax, and the merchants and manufacturers of those towns and the surrounding districts.

It is no exaggeration to say that the deputation, in seeking to obtain further railway facilities, truthfully represented the views not only of the respective Corporations to which they belonged, but those also of a manufacturing and industrial population approaching 400,000 in number.

The Corporations of Huddersfield and Halifax were desirous of contributing each the sum of £50,000 to the Capital required, and their desire in this respect although not acceded to by Parliament, was in each case unanimously supported by the Ratepayers in public meeting assembled.

The objects sought to be obtained by the Company's Act of 1880 were:—

1. The establishment of good local connexion between Halifax and Huddersfield.

2. To obtain improved communication between those towns and the Midland districts, the West of England, and the Port of Hull.

3. To open up new sources of Coal supply, for household and manufacturing purposes, to the towns of Huddersfield and Halifax, and the surrounding districts.

That portion of the line which lies between Cudworth and Huddersfield passes through an important section of the Flockton coal field, and, in addition, will open out the South Yorkshire coal field to the Huddersfield merchants and manufacturers, who are in a great measure forced to seek their supplies by means of carting at a heavy cost. The railway facilities hitherto given to the towns of Huddersfield and Halifax have been lamentable in the extreme, not only as regards local traffic with each other, but with regard also to their connexion with the Midland districts, and with London.

This state of affairs will be entirely remedied by the construction of the proposed line, together with the joint Midland and Hull and Barnsley Station at Cudworth.

The HULL AND BARNSLEY RAILWAY COMPANY have made an agreement with the Midland Railway Company whereby the use of the line is accorded to the latter Company on equitable terms, and the HULL AND BARNSLEY COMPANY have received an intimation, in writing, that the Midland Railway Company, in entering into that agreement in 1882 for running powers over this line, did so with the full intention, which they still retain, of exercising those running powers between Cudworth, Huddersfield, and Halifax, upon completion of the railway.

The relations between the HULL AND BARNSLEY RAILWAY COMPANY and the Midland Railway Company continue to be of a friendly character, and hold out the strongest assurance that the traffic of both Companies between Cudworth, Huddersfield, and Halifax will be worked harmoniously and economically, and that the whole trade of the district will be thoroughly developed.

It is impossible to conceive any announcement of greater importance than the above, to all who have the welfare at heart of the commercial and industrial classes in the West Riding of Yorkshire, or who are interested in the continued and increasing prosperity of the Midland Railway Company.

There can be little doubt that the co-operation of the two Companies working over this line will alone secure the payment of the reasonable dividend of £4 per cent.; but it should be borne in mind that when the dividend on this Stock commences to accrue it will be secured as a first charge (after payment of Debenture Interest) upon the profits of the entire property of the HULL AND BARNSLEY RAILWAY COMPANY, which will consist, when those authorized works are completed, of 97 miles of railway and a Dock Estate of about 400 acres in extent, supplied with two docks of 46 acres and 14 acres of water space respectively.

The price of £85 per £100, at which this Stock is issued, renders it a very desirable investment, having regard to the prospect of its ultimate value, and the present value of English Railway Preference Stocks.

A Bill has been deposited in Parliament by the merchants and others of Halifax for the construction of the necessary short connecting link between that town and Holmfield, on the Great Northern Railway, and it is hoped that arrangements will be made whereby, if this proposed line be also sanctioned, the HULL AND BARNSLEY COMPANY (and through them the Midland Railway Company) will have the use of it on terms to be agreed, thus securing the long-needed route to Scotland and the North through Huddersfield and Halifax.

An epitome of some of the principal evidence given before the Committees of Parliament, together with explanatory maps, and forms of application, may be obtained from the Bankers of the Company, Messrs. Smith, Payne, and Smiths, London; Messrs. Samuel Smith Bros. & Co., Hull; also from the following Brokers:—Messrs. Capel & Co., 5 Throgmorton Street, London; Messrs. Mallens, Marshall, & Co., Lombard Street, London; Messrs. Moore & Son, Huddersfield; Mr. J. H. Thackrah, Halifax; and from the SOLICITOR of the Offices of the Company in Hull.

Full particulars of the conditions are published in the "Record of Family Faculties" (Macmillan & Co., 2s. 6d.), which consists of Tabular Forms and Directions for entering Data, with an Explanatory Preface, by FRANCIS GALTON, F.R.S., Author of "Hereditary Genius" &c.

EXTRACT FROM THE TIMES OF JANUARY 9.

A new and instructive recreation is offered by an eminent man of science to the families of England. It may be called the game of Family Records. It is at least as attractive as most of the games, puzzles, and strings of questions with which many families now beguile their leisure and weary their acquaintances, and it is likely to be far more useful in its results.....The inquiry he proposes to institute is in many respects a novel one. It is, perhaps, as well not to take it too seriously at first, lest those who are invited to co-operate should be frightened rather than attracted by it. If the plan is to succeed, as we sincerely trust it may, it must recommend itself by various motives to various minds, and we are convinced that there are many who would consent at once to play an attractive and interesting game, though they would be very likely to decline if they were asked to take part in a serious scientific inquiry. Which of the two classes of contributors to Mr. Galton's "Records" is most likely to win the prizes is a different question.

By JOHN OGILVIE, LL.D.

NEW EDITION, CAREFULLY REVISED AND GREATLY AUGMENTED.

Edited by CHARLES ALLANDALE, M.A.

Illustrated by above 3,000 Engravings, printed in the Text.

From the SATURDAY REVIEW.

The promise of the first volume has been kept throughout, and the whole, as completed, is a monument of patience, industry, and good work. From beginning to end it has received the same thorough and conscientious care: it is copious, it is trustworthy: it is beautifully illustrated, and it is admirably printed on good paper.....It will be for many years the most serviceable and most highly valued of English Dictionaries.

LONDON: BLACKIE & SON, 49 AND 50 OLD BAILEY.

CHAPMAN & HALL'S
NEW PUBLICATIONS.

CHRONICLES of NEWGATE. By Major ARTHUR GRIFFITHS, H.M.'s Inspector of Prisons. 2 vols. demy 8vo. illustrated, price 36s.

"The purpose which Major Arthur Griffiths has had in view was not to draw any conclusions from his mass of materials, but rather to collect and describe the incidents of a venerable pile, such as Newgate is, which has occupied 'the same site for almost 1,000 years, and which can boast of a consecutive history from the days of John.' Those incidents include every note in the broad gamut of human suffering, and the feelings of the reader are appealed to in turn, by the disproportionate punishment to the guilty, and by the unmerited misfortune of the innocent. The reader will find in these volumes not only much to make him ponder on the immense improvement that has been effected within the last seventy years in laws which had, till then preserved the rigour of former ages, but also much to interest him by the narrative of some of the misdeeds of the more notorious malefactors connected either directly or indirectly with Newgate Prison. Five years cannot be said to have been misspent when the result is a work like this of Major Griffiths, which will amuse, and may, perhaps, instruct that large body of readers who carry on their literary explorations by the easy and agreeable routes of historical romance and anecdotal memoir. What is daily meat to readers of this class becomes an agreeable repast to those who prefer or affect more serious reading."—Times, December 28.

THE CREATORS of the AGE of STEEL: Memoirs of Sir W. Siemens, Sir H. Bessemer, Sir J. Whitworth, Sir J. Brown, and other Inventors. By WILLIAM T. JEANS. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"That steel has had a remarkable history no one will doubt after reading this attractive volume by Mr. Jeans, who evidently writes from stores and accuracy of knowledge. . . . We have not space to deal more at length with Mr. Jeans's volume, and will therefore content ourselves by adding that it deserves a wide circulation."—Times, January 8.

THE NEW LUCIAN; being a Series of Dialogues of the Dead. By H. D. TRAILL. Demy 8vo. 12s.

"In all Mr. Traill's pen is equally happy and equally at home. His varied knowledge is incidentally evinced rather than expound: or, rather, he wears his learning lightly, like a flower." Politics, literature, and philosophy were never rendered more pleasant reading . . . Mr. Traill's book is one of the happiest contributions made by modern literature to the politics of our day."—Daily Telegraph, January 1.

THE ELEMENTS of POLITICAL ECONOMY. By EMILE DE LAVELEYE. Translated by A. W. POLLARD, B.A., St. John's College, Oxford. Crown 8vo. 6s. [This day.

HISTORY of AUSTRALIA. By G. W. RUSDEN, Author of "History of New Zealand." 3 vols. demy 8vo. £2 10s.

From the Times on New Guinea, and on Australian Federation:

"The Anglo-Saxon race in Australia has had an eventful history, though less than a century comprises it. How many hours were the difficulties it has had to encounter few Englishmen and as few or fewer of the Australians know. We commend to the attention of both countries the elaborate and impartial 'History of Australia' which has lately appeared from the pen of Mr. G. W. Rusden. The narrative.....deserves study equally in Great Britain and in Australia."

A HISTORY of ART in CHALDÆA and ASSYRIA. By GEORGE PERROT and CHARLES CHIPIEZ. Translated by WALTER ARMSTRONG, B.A. Oxon. 2 vols. royal 8vo. with 452 Illustrations, price 42s.

"It is profusely illustrated, not merely with representations of the actual remains preserved in the British Museum, the Louvre, and elsewhere, but also with the ingenious conjectural representations of the principal buildings from which those remains have been taken. To Englishmen familiar with the magnificent collection of Assyrian antiquities preserved in the British Museum the volume should be especially welcome. It is not even to every observer to perform the effort of constructive imagination necessary to invest with their full significance the scattered remains and fragments preserved in a museum; but an intelligent study of the work of MM. Perrot and Chipiez will greatly facilitate the effort, and render it doubly instructive. We have further mention that an English translation by Mr. Walter Armstrong, with the numerous illustrations of the original, has just been published by Messrs. Chapman & Hall."—Times.

HOW WE DEFENDED ARABI and HIS FRIENDS: a Story of Egypt and the Egyptians. By A. M. BROADLEY. Demy 8vo. Illustrated by Frederick Villiers, 18s.

"I advise all who really wish to realize what the present Egyptian Government is, to read Mr. Broadley's book. The story is well and clearly told, and Mr Broadley has contrived to make his book amusing as well as instructive."—Truth.

SWEET MACE: a Sussex Legend of the Iron Times. By G. MANVILLE FENN. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"Mr. Fenn's strikingly clever book—the whole is woven together with a web of true love and a woof of false, which gives the whole a wondrously comprehensive human interest."—Whitehall Review.

A MARCH VIOLET. By the Hon. Mrs. HENRY CHETWYND. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"'A March Violet' is a pleasant book which has the charm of being thoroughly feminine. That charm is, perhaps, rather out of date, but there are plenty of readers not insensible to it. Mrs. Chetwynd is stronger in her studies of women than in those of men, but she is not didactic, and girls will read her book with interest. It is a book which any girl may read without harm. The story is told clearly and with skill, and there are plenty of lively passages in it."—Athenæum.

HARD LINES. By HAWLEY SMART. New Edition, 6s. [This day.

"It is just as good as everything else which Captain Smart writes. It is full of wit, repartee, and the delightful humour which pervades every page this most prolific writer pens.....The theme is new, and the plot excellent."—Whitehall Review.

ALARIC WATTS:

A Narrative of his Life.

By his Son, ALARIC ALFRED WATTS.

The subject of this narrative was a man of note in his day and generation, from the reputation he enjoyed in it as a poet and a man of taste. In the latter respect he anticipated by half a century the Æstheticism of to-day.

The impulse given by him to the earlier developments of the feeling for Art in this country by the introduction into his annual "The Literary Souvenir," established by him in 1825, of fine engravings from good pictures, is still remembered as an important factor in the foundation of the love of the Fine Arts now so universal. Associated thus with the Literature and Art of the first half of the century, the "Life of Alaric Watts" will be found to contain interesting and valuable facts, reminiscences, and correspondence hitherto unpublished, of and concerning his friends among the poets and painters of that day—of Coleridge, Wordsworth, Southey, Hood, among the former; of Leslie, Constable, Etty, De la Roche, Ary Scheffer, Deveria, among the latter.

Sketches will be found in it of very opposite aspects of the life of its day. Life among the Quakers; life on the stage; life of the man of taste; life in the studios; life in French, literary, and artistic society at the period of the rise of "Romanticism" and Victor Hugo in 1830; life on the newspaper press, &c.

The narrative will, it is believed, be found to combine with a faithful delineation of individual human nature in many surroundings, the changes and varieties of incident of a novel of real life.

Next week, 2 vols. large crown 8vo. with Portraits, 24s.

THE COURT OF THE TUILERIES:

From the Restoration to the Flight of Louis Philippe.

With Sketches and Anecdotes of the Courts of Louis XIV., XV., and XVI. By Madame CAMPAN. An entirely New and revised Edition, with Additional Notes. 2 vols. with 16 fine Illustrations on Steel, 30s.

"Madame Campan's position was undoubtedly unsurpassed for this process of collection, holding from an early period the position of first lady-in-waiting to the beautiful and much-maligned Queen Marie Antoinette, and moving all her life in those Court circles where, for good or for bad, history is formed by the fashions and foibles of those surrounding the throne."

THE MILLIONAIRE.

By LOUIS J. JENNINGS,

Author of "Field Paths and Green Lanes," "Rambles among the Hills," &c.

"The Millionaire is the romantic figure par excellence of the nineteenth century. Mr. Dexter File, the American millionaire of the story before us, is a decided success. We follow his doings with unflagging interest. To the story we have little but praise to give."
Pall Mall Gazette.

"'The Millionaire' shows much ability. It is never dull. No just idea of its merits could be given without saying that it is a novel of a high order, and a piece of excellent workmanship." Athenæum.

"Where the author breaks new ground is in America, with the railroad beings of New York and the lobbyists of Washington; the character of Dexter File, the millionaire, is wholly fresh and wonderfully interesting. The book throughout is smart and racy."—World.

"A good, well-written, dramatically conceived story. What is more, there is a great deal of admirable dialogue in it."—Scotsman.

"'The Millionaire' is an achievement in the highest range of fiction. The creator of Dexter File must, it seems to us, have had good opportunities of studying his model."
Edinburgh Courant.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MISS MOLLY."

ALISON. 3 vols. crown 8vo. 25s. 6d.

"The heroine's pure and affectionate, though passionate, nature is well exhibited, and her relations with her charming but rather reckless guardian, Dick Latimer, and her sturdy nephew Bob, are very natural and touching."—Athenæum.

"In the lives of those whose fortunes are more particularly dealt with there are as many moving incidents as though the tale had been one of passion and adventure.....Slight in its outline, this story is full of charming details. It has the advantage too of forming one continuous narrative; while the characters, few in number, are all charmingly life-like."
St. James's Gazette.

"Those who like a quiet story without sensationalism of any kind, but yet, at the same time, an admirable study of the inner life and its affections, will find undoubted pleasure in this work."—Academy.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY by ANTHONY TROLLOPE.

Second Edition, 2 vols. post 8vo. with Portrait, 21s.

"Since Mr Trevelyan told the story of his uncle's life, there has been published in England no more genuine or interesting record of a literary career than that unfolded in these volumes."—Saturday Review.

"Mr. Trollope never wrote anything more vivid or more graphic than the Autobiography which has just been issued."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"In this extremely frank autobiography of Anthony Trollope, there is more of the sensational than in any of his novels.....The whole of the volumes are of extreme interest, and we have had no little difficulty in making selections for comments."—Times.

"A lucid statement and clear case for bimetallists."
Finance Chronicle.

"This is one of the cleverest and most intelligent expositions of the thesis of bimetallism which have appeared. Mr. Jordan is indeed a practised writer. This well-written book can be read with pleasure and instruction by all, however much one may disagree with the author's ultimate conclusions."—Money.

"A pleasant historical résumé, as well as a free statement of the case of the bimetallists."—Schoolmaster.

"A perusal of the work, which is written in an attractive and popular style, should effectively dissipate the misty prejudices entertained on the question of bimetallism, which has become the most important question of the present age."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"Three timely papers on bimetallism."—Graphic.

"Ably and forcibly written."—Glasgow Herald.

"We do not see how it is possible carefully to read the facts which Mr. Jordan sets out, or candidly to consider the arguments which he grounds upon them, without coming to the conclusion that Lord Liverpool's 'mistake' on the Currency question was a very disastrous one, and that Sir Robert Peel's Act of 1816 is now bearing bitter fruit."
The British Mail.

"British taxpayers at large are interested more deeply in the disputed question of bimetallism than they perhaps imagine. It is, in fact, a question in which every one is interested, for we all pay taxes, either directly or indirectly. Those who wish to get an insight into the bearings of the question, as presented by one having decided views, cannot do better than read Mr. Jordan's little book. It is written in a clear and interesting style, and whether the reader carries his studies further or not, he will, at all events, be enlightened upon one sufficiently curious aspect of the case."—The Glasgow News.

"There is no denying that the question of 'The Standard of Value' is not only a 'living one,' but one that will sooner or later become a burning one. Those who desire to be well informed on the subject ought to read Mr. William Leighton Jordan's contribution to the controversy."—Society.

"Mr. Jordan shows a knowledge of the subject and its bearings which implies a familiar acquaintance with questions of finance."—The Daily Review, Edinburgh.

"An interesting contribution to this much-vexed question."—Lloyd's Weekly.

"Contains some very interesting remarks on the origin of the funding system."—Banker's Magazine.

"The remarkably able essay of Mr. Leighton Jordan in his little book on the Standard of Value, which should certainly be read by all interested in trade or commerce, has again roused attention to this all-important question. If his arguments do not fail to prove the point, it is not likely that any other writer will succeed: few advocates of bimetallism have put their case so ably and so clearly."
The Mercantile Shipping Register and Commercial Review.

"This is an ably-written answer to the question, 'What is a pound?' We recommend an actual perusal of this excellently written and valuable work. The reader may assure himself that these pages are well worth a perusal, and the writer thinks for himself."—Metropolitan.

"Those interested in the bimetallic controversy will peruse this well-written book with much interest."
Edinburgh Courant.

"This third edition of Mr. Jordan's views on an important public question deserves calm and earnest consideration. We recommend a close perusal of the entire work."—Colliery Guardian.

"The essay on the pound sterling is extremely interesting; although inspired by enthusiasm, it is perfectly logical.'
Schoolmaster.

"Those who interest themselves in bimetallism will find the arguments in its favour ably stated by Mr. Jordan, and the lengthy preface to the third edition of his book brings the controversy down to date."—Echo.

"Mr. Jordan has in such large development the faculty of making abstruse questions clear that we do not wonder his little book has passed into a third edition."
Sheffield Daily Telegraph.

"Those who desire to acquaint themselves with the arguments of the bimetallists will find them clearly stated by Mr. Leighton Jordan."—Westminster Review.

LONDON: MACMILLAN & CO., BEDFORD STREET, STRAND, W.C.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S PUBLICATIONS.

OF THE
COMPLETE WORKS OF W. M. THACKERAY.

To be completed in Twenty-six Volumes, large 8vo. each 10s. 6d.

This Edition is being printed from New Type, on fine paper, it will include some of Mr. Thackeray's Writings which have not before been collected, with many additional Illustrations, and, with the exception of the EDITION DE LUXE, it will be the largest and handsomest Edition that has been published

THE FOLLOWING VOLUMES HAVE ALREADY BEEN ISSUED:

VANITY FAIR, 2 vols.; PENDENNIS, 2 vols.

And a New Volume will be published on the 1st of each succeeding Month until the conclusion of the Series.

EXTRACTS FROM NOTICES BY THE PRESS.

The TIMES

Messrs. Smith & Elder whose monumental edition of the works of Thackeray gave an example which has been somewhat widely followed of erecting memorials to the fame of men of letters by splendid issues of their writings, have now commenced an equally worthy, and, perhaps, more practically useful, enterprise in the publication of another collected edition of the writings of the same novelist. It reproduces the form, and contains the quaint illustrations by Thackeray himself, of that original issue in monthly parts which lingers in the recollections of his earliest readers. This will be, in the opinion of many, a very considerable advantage

The STANDARD.

It is now thirty-five years since "Vanity Fair" was written, and if we allow twenty years for the novel reading period of each generation, Thackeray's popularity has stood the test of two generations, and barely a year passes without some fresh edition of his works being called for To use the common phrase no library is considered complete without him, and no one who buys his works is content with anything short of a library edition For this reason, we may safely predict a ready welcome and a rapid sale for the present issue, which, in respect of paper, typography, and binding, is altogether satisfactory

"The magazine reader will find no better investment for his sixpence."—Pall Mall Gazette.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE.

Printed by SPOTTISWOODE & CO. at No. 5 New-street Square, in the Parish of St. Bride, in the City of London; and Published, by DAVID FUNKE, at the Office, No. 29 Southampton Street, Strand, in the Parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, January 19, 1864.

ships from leaving port, and to punish the people who use them as a means of making profit.

This machinery Mr. CHAMBERLAIN proposes to supply in the form of a Court, to be formed of one representative of the Board of Trade and one delegate of the shipowners in each port. When both agree their verdict will be without appeal, but in case of disagreement either party can refer the question to a superior Commission. With superfluous good-nature, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN informed his hearers that if they did not like his plan, they might refuse to accept it. In that case he would withdraw it at once. The offer might be made with perfect safety, since few shipowners are likely to prefer the present cumbrous and slow system of Board of Trade inspection to that proposed by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is early to decide finally on the probable merits of this promised Court of First Instance, and it may be taken for granted that more than one will have to be established in some ports; but, on the whole, it looks as if it ought to work rapidly and without friction or red-tape. The new Merchant Shipping Bill is to be referred to the lucky Grand Committee on Trade, which will have another opportunity to show how well it can deal with a business measure. It will have the experience of the past Session to guide it, and the warning example of the fate of the Bankruptcy Act, which is already in working order, and is already accused of confounding existing confusion, to keep it in a modest frame of mind as to the probable good to be obtained by its exertions.

SPAIN.

THE defeat of the Spanish Ministry is decisive; but it is not yet certain whether the Moderate Liberals or the Conservatives will reap the fruits of victory. Señor CANOVAS DEL CASTILLO and Señor SAGASTA wound up the debate in elaborate speeches after the rupture between the Ministry and the majority of his hearers had been fully disclosed. It is to be regretted that the Conservative leader should have professed his readiness to accept in certain contingencies either universal suffrage or the impracticable Constitution of 1869; but possibly admissions which appear to be dangerous may have been limited by the context of his speech. Unless a coalition takes place between CANOVAS DEL CASTILLO and SAGASTA, it may, after all, be necessary for the KING to try a dissolution. The Republicans seem not to have acquired additional strength, notwithstanding the internal differences of the supporters of the dynasty. From the beginning of the confused debate which has occupied so many days, the speech of the greatest Republican orator has been expected with interested curiosity. The disappointment which seems to have ensued was not caused by any failure of rhetorical volubility or force. Señor CASTELAR has long been considered by his countrymen, and by some foreigners who have heard him, the greatest speaker of his time and country. In fluency and readiness he is not even surpassed by Mr. GLADSTONE; and Spanish taste approves of sentimental and imaginative decorations which would scarcely be tolerated in the House of Commons. Expositions of the inherent superiority to other nations of the country to which an orator happens to belong would possibly shock the modesty, as it would certainly jar against the business-like instincts, of an English assembly. The Spanish Parliament has been engaged in discussing a motion which is nearly equivalent to a vote of confidence in the Government. It is not surprising that the debate should have extended beyond ordinary limits; but it could perhaps scarcely have been expected to include an exposition of the inherent pre-eminence of the Latin races. It is not stated whether Señor CASTELAR condescended to such trifles as the question whether the pay of the army should be increased, or to compare the personal claims of different candidates for the office of Prime Minister. It would appear that the Republican party, as far as it is represented by Señor CASTELAR, is not disposed to acquiesce in the continuance of the Monarchy. Some members of the party have professed to tolerate a mode of government which they theoretically disapprove as long as the national institutions were otherwise democratic. It is to be regretted that one of the most eminent Republican leaders should think another revolution indispensable.

Señor CASTELAR, though he has recently compromised himself in the estimation of Englishmen by his wanton apology for Irish assassination, has always been deemed an honest politician. An extravagantly copious writer and speaker necessarily makes many mistakes; to cool observers of political matters, a passionate devotion to the name of a Republic seems unintelligible and absurd; but it is known that Continental Republicans are often fanatics; and CASTELAR had before his late escapade in the matter of Ireland never professed the Jacobinical creed. On the only occasion of his active interference in politics, he earned just credit by his patriotic repudiation of all the professions and theories of his life. Having by a strange series of events become the chief of a Republic which was rapidly tending to anarchy, the celebrated orator at once suppressed Parliamentary discussion, and ruled the country for some months as a self-appointed dictator. It was unfortunate that conscientious scruples induced him after a time to revive an incapable Legislature, which was consequently soon afterwards, to the universal satisfaction, turned out of doors by an honest general officer at the head of two or three regiments. Since that time Señor CASTELAR has been content to maintain his former principles without seeking to precipitate violent change. From the condensed account of his recent speech, it is difficult to judge whether he thinks that the time is come for a renewed attempt to establish the Republic. Some part of his invective seems to have been personally directed against the KING, and his prejudice against monarchy tempted him to commit the gross impropriety of attacking the German EMPEROR.

It is difficult to believe that the most rhetorical of theorists seriously wishes to found a policy on lingual or ethnological relations. It is certain that Frenchmen, Spaniards, and, it may be added, Roumanians, all derive their language from the Roman conquerors of their respective countries. In Spain and France the original dialects have disappeared, except as far as they are traced in the current language by sagacious philologists. The Italians, having no barbarous speech to be exterminated, may most properly be designated as the inheritors of the Latin name. The blue blood of which Spaniards were once proud flowed in the veins, not of Romans, but of Goths; but it is true that the Northern tribes failed to change the language of their subjects. It is enough for an orator to record points of likeness, and to overlook divisions and discrepancies. In a certain sense the modified Latin tongue may be considered a bond of union; and perhaps some Spaniards may be gratified by the arbitrary assertion, not only that the Latin race is not only superior to other Europeans, but that it ought to be allied against Teutons, Scandinavians, and other alien populations. Nearly twenty years have passed since a political projector, not less ingenious than Señor CASTELAR, used precisely the same assumptions and arguments for the suppression of a Republic and the substitution of an Empire. NAPOLEON III., amongst other reasons for making an Austrian Archduke Emperor of Mexico, declared that the institutions which then prevailed in France were suitable to the political wants of the Latin race. The Indians, who form nine-tenths of the population of Mexico, were to become subjects of an Emperor, on no other ground than that those among them who had acquired any civilized language understood or spoke a dialect of Spanish, which, again, was a dialect of Latin. Flourishes of this kind, as far as they have any meaning, may be reduced to the proposition that France ought to be preferred to Germany, because it is at present a democratic Republic. It is true that in Spain and in Italy an ancient dynasty is still seated on the throne; but Republicans hope that the nation which in its own judgment is the head of the Latin race will have sufficient influence to transfer its own institutions to the allies whom Frenchmen are sufficiently ready to regard as dependents. It is in the hope of such a change that the glorification of the Latin race is employed as a mode of promoting a Republic.

At some point of his declamation it seems to have occurred to Señor CASTELAR that, if the Latin races were to form a cluster of allied Republics, their Teutonic neighbours would be entitled or bound to enter into a hostile league of their own. English is a Low German language, and, according to the linguistic scheme of politics, the English nation is naturally united by a permanent alliance with the German Empire. Señor CASTELAR, having as little ground of quarrel with Germany as with England, wishes to confine his hostility to one of the two kindred Powers. According to his doctrine, England and America ought to help to keep Germany in check, though in both countries a Teutonic language is universally spoken. There is little satisfaction in criticising capricious rodomontade. Probably Señor CASTELAR may have had a definite purpose, and he may have been understood by his audience. Through a cloud of words it is possible to discern a censure on the policy of the late Government, and especially on its share in the KING'S visit to Germany. The Marquis of LA VEGA DE ARMIJO, who, as Foreign Minister, was officially responsible for the journey, replied to some of Señor CASTELAR'S attacks, in accordance with the fact, that the honorary colonelcy of the celebrated Uhlan regiment was selected only because there happened to be no other vacancy. Neither the KING nor his Minister intended to offer any slight to France; but in party contests it is usual, and perhaps not unjust, to impute to opponents the unforeseen consequences as well as the deliberate purpose of their acts.

Nothing can be further from the thoughts of any political party in England than to take part in any Latin or anti-Latin combination. The only English interest which is likely to be affected by the Ministerial or Parliamentary contest in Spain is of a prosaic and practical nature. The commercial convention which had been provisionally concluded with Señor GOMEZ has since been disapproved by a narrow majority in the Council of State. The arguments for and against the measure were probably confined to a comparison of political forces, and the decision of the Council, which is a strictly consultative body, is principally important as it indicates the comparative strength of parties. It seems that the Fusionists or followers of SAGASTA control the Council of State; and it is, therefore, inferred that the policy of the late Foreign Minister will be revived now that the present Government is defeated. The Marquis of LA VEGA DE ARMIJO, whatever may be his leanings toward Germany or France, or the Latin races, was always opposed to the extension of commercial intercourse with England. His return to power would undoubtedly be fatal to the Convention. It is possible that the result of the present party contest may be affected by the apparently irrelevant issue of favoured-nation treatment and of the alcoholic standard. The Catalonians care more for the exclusion of English goods than for the Latin races; while the wine-growers are, with good reason, anxious to facilitate the exportation of their produce. A certain number of votes given on economic grounds may perhaps derange the calculations of party managers. At this distance it is impossible to judge whether the wine-growers or the manufacturers possess greater Parliamentary strength. It is true that the opinion of the Council of State is not binding on the Cortes; but there is some reason to fear that the same party predominates in both bodies.

MINISTERS AND OPPOSITION.

SOME important speeches have been delivered during the past week; and it is observable that, on the whole, those delivered by the leaders of the Opposition have a very decided advantage, one much greater than in recent tournaments of the kind. It is true that only one Minister of the first rank, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, has spoken against the leaders of the Opposition in both Houses. For Sir CHARLES DILKE, who seems to have passed a singularly uncomfortable evening on Thursday in trying to gloss into decency the utterances of Mr. THOROLD ROGERS and Mr. JOSEPH ARCH, can hardly be counted. But the difference referred to is not in mere number of guns or weight of metal; it is in the spirit, aim, and rapidity of the firing. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, at Newcastle, had all the advantage of sympathetic audiences (save on one occasion, when he did not talk politics); and the world has been informed that he came specially to receive, and did receive, the condolences and consolations of his party on the attacks which wicked men have lately been making on him. This should have been encouraging. But, whereas Mr. CHAMBERLAIN at his last appearance in public was, and was acknowledged to be, emphatically cock-a-hoop, he was on Tuesday and Wednesday not cock-a-hoop at all. He told a legend about a little boy and a bogie and a jam-pot in reference to the Caucus, or the mob, or something of that kind, from which it appears that, instead of the Caucus or the mob eating up the Tories, the Tories are going to eat up the Caucus. It may be imagined that, if any one quarrels with the moral of this apologue, it will not be persons of the Tory faith. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN tried, and with conspicuous ill success, to prove that the cry for reform is anything but the result of a feeling on the part of Ministers that they must strengthen themselves before a new election, and of a knowledge on their part that the existence of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S favourite instrument enables them to simulate at pleasure the national demand which does not exist. About Egypt, about Ireland, even about the House of Lords, with a view to the presence of a Whig noble of rather doubtful allegiance, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN was, as nearly as it is possible for him to be, apologetic. With this attitude, considering its rather unusual seemliness, it would be ungracious to quarrel. When Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (softened it would appear by a short excursus on the cultivation and decorative use of flowers in which he indulged) asks Tories seriously whether he, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, is not an Englishman, it is certain that he is on the right track. For, if Mr. CHAMBERLAIN will remember that he is an Englishman (which in common with his colleagues he seems to have forgotten on several occasions), he may depend upon it that a good deal of the criticism with which he has been met will be spared him in future, both by Tories and by other persons. And if in his turn he will remember that his antagonists, even if for their sins they happen to be dukes or royalists, are Englishmen also, a still further step will be made towards a state of reconciliation and general friendliness which it is delightful to contemplate.

It would appear that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S chief adversaries are not in an equally conciliatory frame of mind, and the contrast is perhaps instructive. Ministers have the opening of Parliament before them, and, despite the loud declarations of their own unanimity with which they indulge the world, and the louder declaration of the unanimity of the country with which some of their followers respond, they know perfectly well that the opening of Parliament means a very difficult business. Lord SALISBURY put their difficulties at Dorchester with a frankness and a precision which militant politicians are not accustomed to use unless they are pretty sure of their ground; and Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE and Mr. GIBSON, a little further west, simultaneously showed that the Opposition has at last perfectly grasped the situation, and is clearly determined to make the most of it. It is of course impossible for any one to say what will happen in the most mechanically-elected and the most mechanically-drilled Parliament that England has yet seen. But, in the first place, and as a general thing, it may be said that a Minister who deliberately proposes to carry a Franchise Reform Bill on the great scale, a Redistribution Bill, and a Bill for revolutionizing the municipal affairs of the capital, to mention nothing else, in the fifth and following Sessions of a Parliament undertakes what he is very unlikely to perform. And this conclusion is certainly not weakened by the consideration of the particular circumstances of the case in regard to the Reform Bill itself. There is, in the first place, the question of enfranchisement with redistribution or enfranchisement before redistribution. It is assumed that the Caucus and the Radical newspapers will threaten, or have threatened, the majority into acquiescence with the plan which the Government, for obvious reasons, prefers; but this is perhaps a little premature. Secondly, there is the Irish difficulty. If Ireland is not included, the Government will meet with determined opposition from the Irish members and the extreme Radicals. If Ireland is included, the Bill will seem madness to that considerable minority in the country which does not take its criteria of political sanity simply from Mr. GLADSTONE'S convenience. In the background there is the difficulty involved in the almost public threat of the Ministry, in case the Bill be rejected in the Upper House, to defy constitutional practice and refuse to go to the country. These three main difficulties are partly divisible into, and partly can be supplemented by, others, too numerous to mention, but perfectly discernible by any one who is familiar with the temper and the history of English Parliaments. The confidence of the Radical party, on the other hand, is founded on two things only. It is thought possible to browbeat or pester members into voting for a measure which probably not two hundred men in Parliament think to be really called for, and it is believed that Mr. GLADSTONE'S headstrong belief in himself, and his colleagues' conviction that without him they cannot hope to retain or regain power, will encourage the Ministry to set precedent and decency at defiance in any way necessary to hustle the Bill through. On the other hand, no writer or speaker on the Liberal side has attempted with the smallest success to show that any change in the electorate or the distribution of seats has been made necessary by the tenor of recent legislation, by the character of Parliament, or by the urgent demand of the persons and places now said to be unrepresented.

In face of this signal failure it is, to say the least, idle to taunt Conservatives, and Liberals who are willing to rest and be thankful, with neglect to answer a case which has never been put. There appears to be a belief in the Radical mind that persons of the two persuasions just mentioned are in some way afraid to state their real views on the subject. What reason there may be for that persuasion certainly does not appear. No reasonable Conservative or Liberal of the old type would hesitate to say frankly that he considered an enlargement of the franchise at the present time an evil per se. When this is stated, the usual reply is either the stale phrase about trusting the people—a phrase vaguely suggestive of a political confidence trick of a new kind—or else Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S somewhat newer defence that the Radicals are the real saviours of society. That description is not one of such a history that Liberals proper or Tories should grudge it to Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and his party. And it may probably suggest that saviours of society usually prepare their salvation by the employment of another class of persons—the tools who bring about the state of disorder from which the saviours save. There is, moreover, one other curious fallacy which has been repeated constantly of late. The opponents of reform have been told over and over again that they have opposed it twice before and have been shown to be wrong each time. This calm assurance that what has happened necessarily ought to have happened is a little peculiar in Radicals. Of course no opponent of Reform would for a moment admit that the results of 1832 or of 1867 prove him wrong. He would say that the circumstances in the first case were entirely different, and that the history of the second distinctly proves that both in home and foreign policy an enlarged electorate is dangerous to the best interests of the country. It is in this conviction much more than in any party feeling—which indeed does not apply to Liberal opponents of Reform at all—that the strength of the Opposition consists. And it is this feeling which justifies them fully in using any constitutional means whatever in defeating, delaying, or modifying the measure. It is said that it must be passed some day. A man must die some day; but he need not on that account take poison to-morrow, or hold out his throat without a struggle to the knife of the first comer of homicidal tendencies.

FRANCE AND CHINA.

THE French operations in Tonquin are progressing very slowly indeed; but there are signs that they are at last beginning to approach a decisive crisis. Up to the present the various events of the campaign have been curiously barren of results. The capture of Sontay led, apparently, to nothing, or next to nothing. Certain Parisian newspapers were excited by the victory, and began to speculate on schemes of conquest of the most ambitious kind. It was proposed on all sides to bring China to a proper frame of mind by seizing some island on its coast. The whole business seemed so simple to literary gentlemen in Paris that they talked as if the only difficulty to be encountered was the difficulty of choice. Within the last fortnight there has been a marked change in the tone of the French press. The threats, like the victories of Admiral COURBET, have led to nothing. It is possible that the MAHDI, who has given us such an opportune and convincing demonstration of the necessity of an English occupation of Egypt, has also been so good as to postpone trouble in the Far East. The chance of restoring the Dual Control has seemed so well worth following up that the attention of France has been temporarily drawn off from Tonquin. It is also permissible to suppose that the more pacific tone of the Parisian press was at least partly due to the prompt discovery that China was not indisposed to accept the threatened challenge. Although, according to the Marquess TSENG, the Government at Pekin was unable to take Admiral COURBET'S word for what had happened at Sontay, and was compelled by etiquette to wait for the reports of its own agents, it has shown no such scepticism or respect for forms and ceremonies when a French occupation of Formosa or Hainan was talked of. Garrisons have, it is said, been despatched to these places, and the coast towns are being put in a state of defence. The eight thousand men sent to Hainan are probably not disciplined in any serious sense of the word, but they are provided with good rifles, and would be quite as formidable as the Black Flags, whom the French have not found by any means easy to beat. At the same time the Chinese Government is reported to be taking active measures to fortify its coast. The approach to the Bogue forts is being blocked up, and other steps of the same nature are being taken in other places. All these precautions show that the Chinese Government has no confidence in its power to limit the war to Tonquin when it has once begun, and also that it is fully aware of the serious character of a struggle with France. If French interests were likely to be seriously injured by a war with China, these measures might have the effect of permanently preserving peace. That is, however, very far from being the case. The French trade with China is insignificant; and if war does really break out, the main loss will fall upon a third party. If, therefore, M. FERRY'S Ministry is resolved on an active colonial policy of some sort, it will probably abstain from attacking China as long as there is any prospect of finding an opportunity to intervene in Egypt, since two such enterprises would be too much at the same time. When that fails, the French will return to Tonquin with renewed spirit. Meanwhile it is hardly possible for two nations to continue long brandishing their swords in one another's face without actually coming to blows, particularly when one of the two is barbarian, and the other has a civilized but ignorant contempt for its opponent's barbarism.

In Tonquin military history continues to repeat itself. Admiral COURBET is again advancing, this time with the intention of attacking Bac Ninh, and all that was said before the attack on Sontay is being said once more. We are told that there is a Chinese garrison in the town, and that an attack on it will be treated as a casus belli. It may safely be predicted that the result will decide whether any recognized Chinese force is in the town. If Admiral COURBET is beaten back, the credit of the feat will be attributed to the Chinese troops by the Government at Pekin and its agents in Europe. In the other case, we shall be assured again that the French have only had to deal with the Black Flags as yet, and that the serious trial of facing the Imperial soldiers has yet to come. It would be interesting to learn why the Admiral did not advance immediately on Bac Ninh after the capture of Sontay. The story that he was waiting for reinforcements hardly deserves to be accepted. Even if he was not strong enough to advance, it does not follow that he was under the necessity of retreating. A fairly satisfactory explanation of his tactics may, perhaps, be found in the report that one of the Tonquinese towns within his lines had been sacked by pirates. The French are, in fact, engaged in a regular guerrillero warfare of the traditional kind. They can defeat their enemy in the field with no very great difficulty, but as soon as they concentrate their forces for operations on a considerable scale, they are surrounded by swarms of partisans, who cut their communications and worry them on every side. It is only possible to get rid of such assailants by spreading the army over the country, which practically puts a stop to general operations. A war of this kind can be soon brought to an end if the general is only supplied with men enough; but as yet Admiral COURBET has not been given a sufficient force to do both things at once. When he is advancing on the fortresses, he has to neglect the partisans, and when he turns on them, the fortresses are safe for a time. Meanwhile, Tonquin has discovered that the blessings of civilization, as interpreted by the French, mean anarchy, disorder, and misgovernment of a far more oppressive kind than anything they ever suffered before. The presence of Admiral COURBET, his gunboats, and his soldiers has deprived them of their one chance of remaining at peace. They can no longer make themselves safe by paying blackmail to the pirates without running the risk of offending the French.

While it is daily becoming more obvious that France will not, and cannot, withdraw its troops from Tonquin, the Chinese Ambassador to France and England is fighting his country's diplomatic battles with great spirit and the newest weapons. A recent, and perhaps inspired, biographer of the Marquess TSENG has informed the world that the men of his province never, under the severest trials, neglect the work of progress. The assertion is fully borne out by the tactics of the Ambassador, who has been indulging freely in the modern diplomatic practice of using the press. Although he is the representative of the most conservative of States, the Ambassador has obviously nothing to learn even from an American statesman as to how to make the most of an interviewer or a friendly editor. After favouring the Times with much useful information, and a good deal of political speculation, he has now turned to the German press.

Although the Marquess TSENG has good modern precedent for mixing journalism with diplomacy in this way, he would on the whole have been wiser to keep to the safe old paths. Possibly from want of experience in an unfamiliar art, he has made several mistakes, which may have serious consequences for himself and his country. It is never wise in a diplomatist to express a decided opinion in a public way unless he is also able to back it up by force. Prince BISMARCK may warn and threaten in leading articles, but that is because he is Prince BISMARCK, and everybody knows how much more serious is his bite than his bark. The Chinese Ambassador is in a different position, and may have to learn that it is a dangerous thing to conjure with the magician's rod unless you know all his spell. It was also obviously imprudent to begin appealing to the German press unless he had fair reason to count on German support. This step had an appearance of threatening France with the terrors of its old enemy, which was extremely imprudent. Nothing would give the French more pleasure than to do something which would show the world that they are not in the least afraid of Germany, provided they could do so without fighting its army. The Chinese Ambassador has given them just such an opportunity. He has appealed to Germany for help, and has been told that he cannot get it. The appeal has been made in the most open way, as if with the intention of irritating the French, and no practical good has been got by it. The result can only be to embitter them against his country still further, and diminish what little chance there ever was that peace can be maintained without a complete surrender on the part of China.

THE DIOCESE OF SOUTHWELL.

THE new see of Southwell is as good as created, and so five out of Sir RICHARD CROSS's six bishoprics are accomplished facts. This success led to the usual patter of carping letters. The new see comprises the two counties of Nottinghamshire, which belonged till forty years ago to the see and to the province of York, but was then transferred to the see of Lincoln and the province of Canterbury, and Derbyshire, which has since the twilight of English Christianity followed the fortunes of Lichfield, from which, much as that diocese has been curtailed, it never before was parted. So it only ceased to be a member of the southern province for the few years, long ago, of Mercian supremacy during which Lichfield itself was an archbishopric. Even after the severance Lincoln and Lichfield will be heavy charges, and Southwell will range over two counties, both of them containing a big and growing county town, only parted from each other by a few miles, and each exceedingly jealous of the rival borough. Nottinghamshire also boasts of a large and beautiful minster, collegiate in its dignity and constitution from Saxon times down to our own day, standing in the snug little town of Southwell. This minster has been carefully restored, and within a few yards of it stands the still surviving palace of the Archbishops of York, which has lately been by great private munificence purchased for the use of the new Bishopric, while other houses suitable for the members of the Cathedral are to be found in this town of old gentility. Accordingly Southwell was by Sir RICHARD CROSS's Act declared the seat of the new Bishopric, a position for which it had been recommended by Lord POWIS's Commission nearly forty years ago. So now the sound of grumbling rolls hoarsely in from the rival local capitals.

We do not profess ourselves to be thoroughly satisfied with the scheme as it stands. It would have been, we believe, better to have dared the bolder policy of proposing two sees, including perhaps a transfer to Derbyshire of some of the enormously populous shire of Stafford. As it is Derbyshire only gains a loss. It never had a Bishop of its own, but for some twelve hundred years it has been attached to the historical and famous church of Lichfield; now, while still continuing bishopless, it has to pass over to a new and unorganized see in another county. Still, as anything is better than the old arrangement, Derbyshire, with much wisdom and generosity, has willingly acquiesced in the actual plan, if only as an instalment. Presuming then a Bishopric for Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire, we cannot see what better course could have been taken than to place it at Southwell. A Bishop of Derby would have been cold-shouldered at Nottingham, and a Bishop of Nottingham would have been told at Derby to go to Coventry. Nothing, on the other hand, prevents the Bishop of Southwell from spending as much of his time as he likes, or as duty calls on him to do, in either town. He may make all the use he can of the great church at Nottingham, and persuade the men of Derby to build one like it. At Southwell itself he will have his house for rest, for country air, for study, and for hospitality; and he will have at his door a noble cathedral church, available for all those purposes of worship and of education which the size of the towns in which the various institutions are placed has not prevented Lichfield itself and Ely and Chichester from purveying to dioceses containing larger and more enterprising towns than the Cathedral city. No sane man has ever proposed to transfer the see of Lichfield to Stoke or Wolverhampton. Why, then, should we, in face of the undoubted antagonism of Nottingham and Derby, refuse fair play to an experiment which only repeats a condition of things with which one of the component counties has so long been familiar? Rigid utilitarianism may decry the necessary connexion between episcopal government and the grandeur, architectural and ritual, of Cathedral churches; but the healthy instinct of Churchmen has always accepted it; and, as in the case of the new see of Truro, has expended no little trouble and money to create it. The combination is ready to hand at Southwell, and if this good fortune were despised, it is probable enough that the irrepressible band of letter-writers would strike a rich vein of sarcasm and lamentation over such a lamentable blunder. For Derbyshire, at all events, the dose is sweetened at not finding itself subjected to what is only a large parish church in lieu of the world-famous Cathedral of Lichfield; and even Nottinghamshire can hardly fail to see the incongruity of possessing such a minster as Southwell and passing it by. Anyhow, the question was virtually decided when the union in one see of two counties was decreed.

STREET ROBBERIES.

IT is seldom that a week passes in which the newspapers do not forcibly remind us of the barbarism which is lying close by our civilization. Civilization, it is true, develops vices of its own which are perhaps, if we look at them rightly, as odious as those which belong to the savage state of mankind. But there is a difference. The habit of the savage is to look upon his fellow-men, unless they belong to the same tribe as himself, as his natural enemies, and to treat them accordingly whenever he gets the chance to do so. And this is precisely the view that a considerable class of persons in this country takes of the rest, and which the rest are simple enough to tolerate. Day after day fresh instances of brutal assaults come before the public. Sometimes they are assaults made with the object of robbery; quite as often they are made for the mere enjoyment of maltreating a fellow-being. The other day a letter appeared in the Daily News stating that a respectable working-man was attacked on Hackney Downs by a party of roughs and was badly cut about the face. In the same letter it was said that a girl was also attacked near Stamford Hill and knocked down, but on her screaming the gallant assailants took to their heels. On Tuesday last a letter appeared in the Times in which the writer recounted his own experiences and those of others whom he knew. About half-past seven on the evening of Thursday of last week, in the neighbourhood of St. Giles's, when on the way from Pall Mall to Hampstead, he was assaulted by a ruffian who seized his watch, cut the chain, and made off to the nearest alley. The gentleman whose watch was taken gave chase and called on those whom he saw for help. The two men nearest proved, however, to be confederates; and after chasing the robber to the point where he vanished among the slums, it became evident that discretion was the better part of valour, and that it was more desirable to put up with the loss of the watch than to take the risk of a chase in such courts as abound in the neighbourhood of St. Giles's. The same writer gives instances of other assaults and robberies which to his own knowledge have taken place recently in the same district. On the evening before, on the spot where he had himself been robbed, a lady waiting for the omnibus to take her to Hampstead was attacked by a member of the same gang. She was struck on the face, her bag was opened, and her purse was taken from it. On Christmas Eve last, as we read in the letter, a gentleman was attacked in the same neighbourhood, and was beaten, robbed, and left unconscious by four scoundrels of a similar kind. In the Times of the following day further testimony appears to the same effect. On the 3rd of December last another gentleman was returning home northwards from his office in Whitehall, and at about six o'clock, close to St. Giles's, his watch-chain was seized and carried off. He pursued the robber; but, as in the case already quoted, he found himself in a labyrinth of lanes and alleys, in which it proved both useless and dangerous to pursue the thief. The writer consoles himself philosophically with the reflection that the gold chain only was taken from him, but that the watch was fortunately left unstolen. In the Standard of Tuesday last there is an article which bears on the same subject, entitled "Midnight London." The writer there discusses fully the various methods of deceit and violence by which the criminal classes contrive to make a living out of those who have something which can be stolen. To say nothing of violent assaults in the streets, the decoys by means of which unsuspecting people are led into situations where they can be conveniently plundered are here, for the hundredth time, set forth. To get a good chance of stealing a watch, the thief asks to know what o'clock it is; and while the simple owner of the watch goes to the lamp-post to give his answer, it is easy enough for the thief to seize it and get away without detection. Or, again, a passer-by is lured off a main thoroughfare by a woman, who persuades him to go down a narrow street or alley, where he finds himself surrounded by half a dozen of her confederates, and pays the natural penalty of his folly. It must be remembered that for one of these cases which comes before the public there are ten in which the individual who is robbed or beaten finds it more convenient to hold his tongue. Even if he has ample evidence to convict the offenders, a regard for his own reputation will often keep him silent. Most men would prefer to lose their watch or their purse rather than have the questions asked which an appearance as prosecutor in the police-court under such circumstances often suggests. There is no doubt that many cases occur of assault and robbery which are never reported to the police, for the simple reason that the sufferer does not care to report them.

Nevertheless, a large number occur which could certainly be prevented by a more efficient organization of the police. A few weeks ago we pointed out that at places in the various districts of London where disorder is frequent or habitual it is not enough for a policeman occasionally to pass by in the course of his beat. It is necessary that a constant watch should be kept. It seems incredible, but is a fact, that, where the policeman is regularly stationed, he is withdrawn precisely about the time when disorder is likely to begin. Thus in districts in which the small hours of the morning are more than usually hideous and perilous, the stationary policeman actually goes off duty at one o'clock. Such protection as the inhabitants of the neighbourhood or the casual wayfarers receive from that time till five o'clock comes from the walking policeman, who may or may not be passing by on his beat at a time when mischief is brewing. In almost every part of London there are points in which the lawlessness and violence of the criminal classes tend to concentrate themselves as in a focus. At such points the supervision of the police needs to be constant, both by day and by night. A mere casual supervision is little better than none at all. The thief or rough finds out quickly enough what are the times and seasons in which he can ply his trade with impunity. When a constable is in sight, he not unnaturally, unless very drunk, restrains himself; but, when once the constable has passed by, he has from half-an-hour to an hour in which to do as he likes. In the greater part of London the occasional presence of a policeman is all that is needed. But in the foci of disorder the permanent and vigilant attention of the police is the only remedy. There are, scattered about London, certain thoroughfares or junctions of streets which are known to be dangerous. Five minutes' walk to the right or to the left of them anybody may go by with perfect safety. These local tastes of the criminal classes are even better known to the police than they are to the public. The average criminal is, like respectable persons, a creature of habit; and the regularity of his proceedings should be met by a corresponding regularity on the part of those whose duty it is to keep him in check.

Much more should be done by the police to keep these classes in order, and much more should also be done by the administration of the law. For the savages who make the streets of London impassable at certain times and places there is only one penalty which they can understand, and this is the lash. Over and over again it has been shown that nothing else has any practical effect upon them. Imprisonment puts no stigma upon them. They lose no credit among their friends when they come out by having passed a month in gaol. In fact, they return to their old associates with their natures unchanged, and with their constitutions strengthened by a course of regular and temperate living. A man who has been half a dozen times convicted in a police-court loses no caste among those who have gone through the same experience if he is convicted a seventh time. His recurrent convictions are only natural episodes in his career and in theirs. But a whipping is another thing. Apart from the pain, which none of those who suffer it are known, according to prison authorities, to bear manfully, it leaves a moral as well as a physical mark on the man which can be appreciated by everybody, and by none more than by his own special associates. In fact, it is one of the few stigmas which they can appreciate. It comes home to them as nothing else can. Surely, if ever there is a case in which the lex talionis may justly be applied, it is in inflicting physical punishment on men who, without provocation, rob, beat, kick, and maim those whose watches and purses they covet. Often, indeed, they have not even the excuse of coveting the property of the persons whom they assault. They beat, kick, and maim them for the pleasure of doing so; and for such offenders there is no kind of cure but many stripes.

COMMONS AND THE PUBLIC.

TWO very well known bits of English scenery, the Malvern Hills and Ilkley Moor, are threatened by the incloser. Perhaps the victories gained some years back over the Inclosure Commissioners have lulled the guardians of common land to sleep. Perhaps these very victories have operated in another way. They have shown the owners of waste land precisely what they can do and what they cannot; and, as a consequence of this, the attacks upon commons are now conducted with greater judgment. As soon as this kind of opposition has to be faced, the public discover how weak they really are. In their own character they have no locus standi against the incloser, except so far as he destroys ancient rights of way. The law recognizes certain rights as vested in the commoners; and, if the lord of the manor interferes with these, redress may be had. The public can often promote their own interests by identifying them with those of the commoners. The uses to which the ground is put by those who claim rights of common over it are, for the most part, not of a kind that interferes with its enjoyment by the world at large. Consequently, to preserve a common for the commoners is to preserve it for everybody else. In Ilkley, apparently, the rights asserted by the lord are not inconsistent with the rights enjoyed by the commoners. The inclosures which he threatens would probably leave enough of the surface unoccupied to satisfy their wants. But the public have neither sheep to pasture nor turf to cut, and it is idle to suppose that, by defending rights of this kind, not perhaps seriously threatened, needs of a quite different order can be satisfied. What the public wish to have secured to them is simply the liberty of walking or riding at will over the land. Except in a very few cases, this is a liberty of which the law knows nothing. If it is to be maintained at all, it must be in some way purchased from those whose title is at once more definite and more extensive.

The inhabitants of Malvern have already come to understand this, and a Bill will be introduced next Session to give effect to an arrangement which shall save the Malvern Hills from further encroachment. At Ilkley things have not yet got so far as this. It is only lately indeed that the necessity for bestirring themselves, if they want to keep the moor as it is, becomes apparent. The townspeople had come probably to regard the picturesque hill which rises behind them as their own possession. It was only when the skyline of the ridge became broken by posts bearing notices warning off trespassers that they became seriously alarmed. As yet no harm has been done. An energetic local champion has given public notice that he shall disregard these warnings himself, and advise others to disregard them, and this challenge has not been taken up. There is no certainty, however, that matters will long remain in this state. The lord of the manor is entitled to shoot game on the moor, and, as grouse are still found there, this is no barren right. It has an appreciable money value, and as such is worth fighting for. The rapid growth of Ilkley itself and its neighbourhood to Leeds must make the moor less and less fit for a game preserve, unless something is done to keep the public off it, and the notices to trespassers were no doubt intended as the first step towards systematic enclosure. Enough was to be left to give the commoners no grievance on which to found an action, and, this precaution once taken, the chances of successful resistance would be but small. It is not at all likely that the lord of the manor will submit to see his property yearly becoming less valuable without making an effort to arrest the process. What is wanted, therefore, is that the Ilkley people should do what the Malvern people have already done. The liberty they wish to maintain for themselves is really one to which their legal right is something less than doubtful. Unless they can show some very unusual title to the enjoyment of the moor, the Courts will decline to interfere, and by that time so much money will have been wasted and so much bad feeling aroused, that it will be difficult, if not impossible, to have recourse to any other method of action. Yet what the Ilkley people claim is nothing more than what it is very much to the public interest that they should have. There are moors in abundance on which rich men may shoot grouse; there are very few on which poor men who can only get half a day's outing from Leeds can ramble at will. To preserve this privilege to such a district as that in which Ilkley stands is a matter of high public moment. Nor ought there to be much difficulty in preserving it. Whatever compensation is fairly due to the lord of the manor for any falling off in the value of his moor ought of course to be paid him; but when the money wherewith to do this is provided, Parliament will be quite ready to give the force of law to the arrangement, if voluntarily concluded, or to impose it upon the lord of the manor, supposing him to withhold his consent. It is not Ilkley alone that is interested in bringing about such a settlement. It is just as much a matter for Leeds, and for those suburbs of Leeds, which are themselves large towns. Nowhere, perhaps, would it be so easy to secure to the public all that is material for them to have. The need of keeping the moor open is too patent to be passed over, and the district is one in which any money that can be required to keep it open can at once be raised.

There is one caution, however, that it may be well to offer, and it is one of which the people of Malvern stand equally in need. We do not wish that either Ilkley Moor or the Malvern Hills should be bought by the public. If that were done, there would be reason to fear that both the one and the other would run very great risk of being spoiled. If they are bought by the public, they must be held by some body on behalf of the public, and as soon as such a body gets possession of land, that land becomes a mere open space, to be laid out and adorned in the most approved style of local landscape gardening. What the public ought to buy is simply the right to keep Malvern Hills or Ilkley Moor as they are. There is no need to prevent the lord of the manor from shooting over the ground just as he does now, or to prevent the commoners from pasturing sheep or cutting bracken just as they do now. It will be quite enough to enact that neither the lord nor the commoner shall ever inclose any part of the ground, or claim any right in it which is inconsistent with its reasonable enjoyment by the public. The purchase of such a right as this is a very much smaller affair than the purchase of the soil, and it ought to cost proportionately less money. But, inasmuch as it gives the public the only thing they want, there is the best possible reason that this, and nothing more, should be bought.

RAILWAY SHAREHOLDERS' ASSOCIATION.

THE Railway Shareholders' Association may probably be useful to those whom it proposes to represent; but the proceedings at its first meeting were not in all respects calculated to promote its objects. Sir EDMUND BECKETT'S unrivalled powers of invective and sarcasm appear not to have rusted by comparative disuse; but co-operation in a common purpose is not rendered more zealous by the disclosure and exacerbation of internal differences. Chairmen and general managers may, perhaps, sometimes mistake the interests of their constituents; but they are always earnest in their desire to protect and improve the property which they necessarily control. Sir EDMUND BECKETT, who has little sympathy with democratic aspirations, must know that authority is weakened when those by whom it is exercised are described as ridiculous or odious. Having once for all expressed his disapproval of jealousies and rivalries which are certainly not imaginary, Sir EDMUND BECKETT will probably hereafter be one of the most judicious as well as one of the most vigorous leaders of the Shareholders' Association. Anxious holders of railway stock will, if they are well advised, act in concert with the official representatives of the Companies. It may be added that other owners of property, from great capitalists to modest annuitants, ought to hesitate before they join in attempts to tamper with Parliamentary guarantees. Communistic agitators naturally direct their attacks against the victims who seem to them weakest. It is because English landowners are a small numerical minority that the GEORGES and DAVITTS promulgate schemes of plunder which might be dangerous to themselves if they were addressed to the peasantry of France. Freighters who demand arbitrary reductions in railway tariffs are not conscious advocates of communism; but, as far as they implicitly assume the right of the State or the Legislature to readjust according to some vague notion of equity the economic relations of persons and of classes, they become involuntary accomplices of the Democratic Federation.

The recognition of a just and necessary control over railway administration is perfectly compatible with a regard to proprietory rights. The general Acts, as well as the special Acts, define to a great extent the duties which are always made conditions both of incorporation and of the periodical or occasional grant of additional privileges. Several years ago, in pursuance of the Report of a joint Committee of both Houses, the Railway Commission was constituted for the purpose of enforcing the obligations undertaken by the Companies. It may be incidentally remarked that the same Committee remonstrated by anticipation against encroachments on the rights of the Companies, and especially against interference with their legal tariffs. The jurisdiction conferred on the Commission had previously been vested in the Court of Common Pleas; but the experiment was supposed to have failed, because few cases had been decided, or even tried, under the Act of 1853. Some of the judges were prejudiced against the exercise of functions which they regarded as novel; and it was thought that a special tribunal which had nothing else to do would be more efficient than one of the superior Courts. Notwithstanding ill-informed opinion, and in spite of confident assertions, the Railway Commission has proved a failure. The amount of litigation before it has been absurdly small, and its decisions have not commanded public confidence. If the present legal member, or his predecessor, had been allowed to sit alone, his decisions would probably have been received with respect as authoritative interpretations of law; but, as he can always be outvoted by his lay colleagues, the defeated party is naturally disposed to believe that legal rights have been made subordinate to considerations of supposed expediency. As if for the purpose of still further discrediting the tribunal, the Commissioners are not in the habit of delivering separate judgments; so that the only member of the Court who is properly qualified is not responsible for the reasons even of a judgment in which he may possibly have concurred. Questions of great importance, sometimes involving difficult questions of law, are thus disposed of by a body of judges which cannot be compared in competence to a county court. It is not surprising that they have habitually enjoyed a vacation extending perhaps over three-quarters of the year.

It is true that the commercial and industrial community generally desires the maintenance in some form of the Railway Commission, though its duties would be better discharged by a Judge of the High Court, whose services would at other times be available for ordinary judicial purposes. A professional judge, if he were required, as under the present law, to make an annual report to Parliament, would not, like the Commissioner, take the opportunity of always asking for enlarged powers, nor would he criticize the reasons for which some of his judgments might have been reversed on appeal. The questions of economical advantage or practical convenience which sometimes arise would be at least as satisfactorily decided by a professional lawyer. The legal rights of Companies and traders cannot properly be entrusted to the judgment of a layman. Judges in Courts of Equity command public confidence in the discharge of their administrative functions, because they are competent to distinguish between expediency and law. Mr. LAING, who seems to be more tolerant than other railway chairmen of external interference, is favourable to a certain amount of State control, if it is exercised through the Board of Trade. It is not a little remarkable that he protests in the strongest language against the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission. Even a convert to advanced Radicalism apparently desires that the kind of property which he specially represents should receive judicial protection. Whether the Board of Trade or any other official department would protect the public interest without suffrages or positive rights may be reasonably doubted. Mr. LAING thinks that the functions of the Commission or of the Board of Trade should be almost exclusively administrative. If his plan were adopted, legal rights ought to be determined by the High Court.

Some of the questions which have been settled by the Commissioners concern competing freighters rather than the Railway Companies. It is extremely difficult to determine whether all the ports or all the collieries on a great railway system should be put on an equality in the adjustment of rates, or should retain the whole advantage or detriment of their respective geographical positions. The consumers or consignees would in almost all cases prefer a system of equal competition. On the other hand, it has been plausibly and successfully contended that the carrying Company is guilty of undue preference if it attempts in any degree to counteract the natural advantage of proximity to market. The doubt ought to be solved by a higher authority than the Railway Commission. Until lately the Companies almost always inclined to the policy of equalizing rates over large districts. Managers have had to consider not only the more or less profitable character of local tariffs, but the competition with one another of various ports, markets, and coal-fields. No arrangement in the complex system of railway administration has excited so much dissatisfaction as the preference which is in certain cases given to foreign produce. American corn is brought at a lower rate from Liverpool to London than English corn conveyed for shorter distances; yet the causes of an apparently invidious distinction are simple and obvious. Between those ports the railway competes with the sea, which has cost nothing to make or maintain. The importer and consumer for good reasons prefers railway carriage to the extension of the ship's voyage; but if the difference of charge passes a certain limit the railway will not be used for the traffic. The consequence would be that the sea-borne corn would, as at present, have an advantage in freight over domestic produce. If the Companies were compelled to charge by mileage, the only result would be that they would discontinue their competition with the cheapest mode of conveyance.

Those who engage in controversies relating to railway administration would do well to discontinue the repetition of a commonplace which has done duty for the last forty years, though it contains only half the truth. Competition among Companies is, as all traders and dealers are well aware, not abolished, though it is modified by combination. A few years ago the Midland Company compelled its neighbours and rivals to reduce to a great extent the passenger fares between competing points. It is not known whether the experiment has been profitable to the innovating Company; but it has undoubtedly conferred pecuniary benefit on the trading community, though it was connected with a partial withdrawal of accommodation. Except in the Eastern and North-Eastern counties, every considerable town has secured the competition of two, and sometimes of three, or even four, Companies. The strong feeling against monopoly has within three or four years been conspicuously illustrated by the construction of the Hull and Barnsley railway, which is now to be extended to Huddersfield, and, if Parliament sanctions the measure, to Halifax. Parliamentary Committees have, perhaps, of later years been too ready to authorise unnecessary lines; but their more experienced members well know that a general discouragement of competition would be felt as an intolerable grievance. It may be hoped that the power of authorising great public works will be always reserved to an independent and non-professional body. There is greater reason to apprehend a miscarriage of justice in the control of railway administration. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN announces a Ministerial Bill for perpetuating the Railway Commission, and for investing it with additional powers. If the Government is well advised, it will take the opportunity of fundamentally altering the constitution of the tribunal. Laymen are ill qualified for judicial functions, and experts are of all lay judges the most objectionable.

DEATH IN THE PIT.

AS soon as any one draws attention to the abuses of any vested interests, he is certain to be denounced as a wrecker and an impenitent thief. When the vested interests are those which theatre-owners possess in the peril of the public, the critic is called a "panic-monger." Ordinary observation and recent letters in the Times make it perfectly certain that when any one goes to the play in some houses he takes his life in his hand. There are degrees of course. Some theatres have sufficient exits; others have inadequate exits; and in others, again, the long, narrow, winding passages leading to but one or two doors positively invite a catastrophe. The habit of cramming the stalls so close together that it is difficult to get in or get out supplies another danger; while men who smoke in all the lobbies might almost as safely smoke in a coal mine.

Can any one deny these propositions? No one can deny them. But when attention is called to this disgraceful state of things, in which men and women are nightly exposed to a horrible death for the sake of saving a few pounds, people cry, "Hush, you will cause a panic." The theatres are very crowded just now, full of women and children. Precisely, and that is the reason why we wish some ordinary precautions to be taken by the managers of theatres. As to panics, these arise when the public knows that in case of an alarm it has little chance of escape. If the theatres had exits sufficiently numerous, wide, and accessible, if all our stages were fitted, as in Germany, with an iron curtain, alarm of fire would cause little or no panic. Are all our theatres thus happily accommodated? Emphatically no. In the long period during which a crowded audience moves, as slowly as a glacier almost, to the rare exits provided, one always hears people ask, foolishly enough, "what would "happen in the case of a fire?" Why, every one would be crushed to death or burned; that is the long and the short of it if we may trust the letters which Mr. CLEMENT SCOTT and other correspondents print in the Times.

Mr. SCOTT is a dramatic critic and a dramatic author. It is not the interest of dramatic authors or critics that the public love of the theatre should decline. Still, authors and critics are, in the first place, concerned to preserve their lives if possible. Their duties bring them constantly into these closely-wedged rows of stalls, reached by passages like the winding tunnels of rabbit-warrens, and exposed to all the dangers which arise from flaring gaslights, artificial fires, and the burning ends of cigarettes. Critics are not more timid than other people, but they have to risk being burned more frequently than other people. No one can say that they lack experience or that they are hostile to the interests of managers. Their interests lie in the same direction as those of the owners and the officials of theatres. They are thoroughly acquainted with all the stock arguments against taking any trouble in the matter. They have heard a hundred times that to speak of danger is to "cause panic"; that theatres are not often burned while the audience is within them; that hotels are just as dangerous as theatres. To all this critics reply that, if the public is alarmed, the public can stay away from the play. By boycotting death-traps the public could soon make managers keep all the doors open, at an enormous extra expense of a couple of pounds a week. By staying away from houses in which the stalls are crammed together in a kind of wedge the public could teach managers to be more liberal of space. These things the public can do, if it be really panic-stricken. Besides, as we have said already, if theatres were properly organized a panic could not be created. Panics are due to the public knowledge that they who do not escape in the first flight will not escape at all. Again, it is argued that theatres are not often burned while they are full. Perhaps not; but once is too often; and the accidents at Nice and Vienna have not yet been absolutely forgotten. At Nice there was a door specially meant for use in case of fire, but of course the door was locked. In these cases the door always is locked. A correspondent of the Times tells the world that he induced an official in one of the London theatres to try to open an escape-door, just by way of experiment. The man readily attempted the experiment, but of course he had not the key, nor did he even know what had become of the key. In the case of a fire or a panic the results would have been what they were at the Ring Theatre or at Nice. Mr. CLEMENT SCOTT's letter lays emphasis on the same class of dangers, and on the happy-go-lucky management which leaves an audience to make its undirected way through one narrow passage, though other exits are actually open. Even at matinées fires may occur, and the expedient of turning out the gas in the passages during a matinée (not an unheard-of economy or accident even at the gaudiest houses) cannot be commended. We need lay no stress on the uncontradicted report in the Times of Captain SHEAN, who seems to be a kind of amateur, unofficial, unaccredited inspector of theatres. He says he found one in which the exits had not been timed "because the Lord Chamberlain has passed it, and it is all one to us." In the same house there was no water in the buckets, the firemen were unacquainted with the nature of the mechanism of the hydrants, and so forth. All this, as we say, has not been publicly contradicted, and indeed even to contradict such statements, though a gratuitous, is not an enviable advertisement. But on this we lay no more stress than on the last argument for holding our peace, that hotels and other places are as dangerous as theatres. This is an example of the fallacy often pointed out by nursery logicians, "two blacks do not make a white." If there were a class of hotel critics, perhaps they would hold meetings as theatrical critics did not long ago, to denounce the recklessness of managers. Besides, the exits from hotels are at least wide enough. We never heard of people being crushed to death in a hotel because they could not get downstairs for the crowd. Now a crowd jammed in the warren-like burrowings of the subterranean labyrinths that often lead to the stalls would be in a parlous state indeed, especially as the gas would be sure to go out. To provide lights not liable to this accident in the burrows should be within the resources of science. But it would cost money, and therefore we can hardly expect the provision to be universally made.

The truth is that this matter can only be disposed of by "pegging away." The forces of inertia muster strongly on the side of doing nothing for the public safety. The theatre was never more popular, indeed it is too popular, and the public excitement constantly has small local eruptions in the shape of amateur performances. Houses were never more crowded. Hence the temptation to perilous encroachment on space, to squeezing seats together, and placing chairs in gangways. All this means increased receipts, but the recipients are not the more inclined to add to expenses when the cause of expense is not something brilliant, but only something necessary. Many theatres have exits enough, but those exits (supposed to be open in case of fire or alarm) are often hermetically sealed. Now the extra doors can only be of service if the public and the officials are used to seeing them open, and to making their way out by them. But to have these doors always open during performances would demand the presence of more attendants, their wages would be an item in expenditure, and an item for which nothing of a brilliant and attractive nature could be shown. Therefore the doors are kept shut. A respectable attendant has the key, but when he is asked to produce it (as has been seen in one instance) he has not the slightest idea where it is. All this economy is false and niggardly, and may be homicidal.

To burn or chance burning some hundreds of people, for the sake of saving some pounds a week, is a bright example of the character of capitalists and of spirited enterprise. In collusion with this recklessness of the persons who are (or ought to be) responsible is the happy-go-lucky temper of the public. The public "will chance it," as they say, till they are frightened by some general auto de fé in a theatre. Then the public gets in a fright, stays away from the play, clamours for precautions and inspections, and has all the extra doors of theatres left open. In a fortnight the public forgets its alarm, the outcry ceases, nothing has been done, the doors are closed again, and the keys are rusting in disused old coats in the houses of the officials. Nothing will ever cure the happy-go-lucky temper, the official contempt of the public and indifference to public safety, nothing short of close and vigilant Government inspection. Constant "surprise visits," followed by fines and withdrawals of licences when the ordinary precautions are neglected, would soon prevent theatres from being potential death-traps. The old folly of laissez-aller has broken down here as elsewhere, because the collective wisdom of the theatre-going public is, like the law denounced by Mr. BUMBLE, "a Hass." It is as well to keep preaching this doctrine before an accident happens. It is as imprudent to lock the doors before a fire as to leave them open till the proverbial steed is stolen.

BACKSWORD AND SCHLAEGER.

ALTHOUGH the sabre is a weapon of much more general use than the small-sword, the art of using it has never been brought to anything like the same perfection. The small-sword can hardly be called a military weapon, whereas a single-edged cutting sword, generally, but not always, fashioned so as to admit of effective thrusting as well, has been the chief arm of European cavalry for more than two centuries. Yet the sabre has been left in comparative neglect. The soldier's official instruction in handling it is mostly confined to the execution of a certain number of conventional cuts and guards. Fencing-masters, with few exceptions, have dismissed it with short and slight notice; the treatment of it in French books, as far as we are aware, is not only scanty but weak. On the whole, it has perhaps fared best in England, where our love of hard and visible knocks, or some other reason, causes the practice of the singlestick to be preferred to that of the foil. But there are compensations in all things. And the sabre has taken out its compensation in England and in Germany in ways curious in themselves and curiously similar. In Germany there is a modified combat with swords, in England an imitated one, under such rules and conditions as to make it quite unlike real warfare, and yet in each case with a distinct seriousness of its own. The conventional restrictions are so much alike that it is not easy to believe the two forms of play to be independent; but we do not know that any evidence exists of historical derivation or connexion. The exercises in question are that of backsworded or singlestick as practised, until pretty lately, in the West of England, and that of the Schlager as still practised in the German Universities.

The game of backsword is shortly treated of under the name of singlestick in Walker's Defensive Exercises. But the classical authority for it is the second chapter of Tom Brown, which describes a contest for local championship among the humours of the "yeast" held in the White Horse Vale. As the judicious author tells us, "the weapon is a good stout ash stick with a large basket handle, heavier and somewhat shorter than a common singlestick." Probably the players had forgotten by the beginning of this century what the stick originally represented. The name, however, leaves no doubt of this. "Backsword" was the English name of a sword with a thick back and only one edge, as distinguished from the long double-edged sword commonly worn as late as the seventeenth century; a distinction exactly corresponding to what French authorities state to be the correct usage of sabre as opposed to épée. We now use the term small-sword, as our ancestors of the last century did, for the three-cornered duelling blade (many people call this modern thrusting sword a rapier, but wrongly; the Spanish and Italian rapier had a narrow double-edged blade, capable of cutting though mainly used for thrusting). But the weapon we speak of as the broadsword or sabre was called by those same ancestors the backsword. This, with other more or less diverting matter, appears in a treatise upon the Useful Science of Defence published by one Captain John Godfrey, which attained a second edition in 1747. The author complains of designs to pirate and undersell his book, and, whether or not he succeeded in preventing these at the time, it is certain that considerable traces of his work occur in later manuals. Probably it would be found by any one who would be at the pains of examining (we do not say it would be worth the pains) that writers on this class of subjects have for generations gone on copying from one another as much and as unintelligently as dictionary-makers. However that may be, Captain Godfrey's reasons for studying the backsword, as well as his not over-lucid counsels about the play itself, show that in his time this weapon was nothing else than the military sabre. The backsword, he says, "is as necessary in the Army, as the other" (the small-sword) "is mischievous in Quarrels, and deadly in Duels. The Small-Sword is the Call of Honour, the Back-Sword the Call of Duty. . . . The Back-Sword must be allowed essentially necessary among the Horse; and I could wish it were more practised, than I find it is. Sure it ought to be a Part of a Trooper's Duty to learn the Back-Sword, as much as of the Foot to learn the common Exercise." Captain Godfrey's personal reason for making the backsword his favourite arm was, however, not a patriotic one. "I have followed chiefly the Practice of the Back-Sword," he says, "because Conceit cannot so readily be cured with the File [a common spelling of foil in eighteenth-century books] in the Small, as with the Stick in that: For the Argumentum baculinandi is very strong and convincing: and though a Man may dispute the full Hit of a File, yet if he is knocked down with a Stick, he will hardly get up again and say, it just brushed him." He had closely followed, moreover, the play of the best-known masters of his time, and celebrates them in a style bearing a certain grotesque resemblance to some passages of the Book of Ecclesiasticus. A specimen or two must suffice:—

Timothy Buck was a most solid Master, it was apparent in his Performances, even when grown decrepid [sic], and his old Arm could not hide his uncommon Judgement. He was the Pillar of the Art, and all his Followers, who excelled, built upon him. . . .

Fig was the Atlas of the Sword, and may he remain the gladiating Statue! In him, Strength, Resolution, and unparallel'd Judgement conspired to form a matchless Master. There was a Majesty shone in his Countenance, and blazed in all his Actions, beyond all I ever saw.

It is evident from Godfrey's account that the backsword or broadsword play of his time was aimed indifferently at the head, body, and legs. The cut at the leg seems indeed to have been rather favoured. But in the later "backswording" with sticks, as explained in Tom Brown, and seen as near London as Windsor by divers other good witnesses who are not yet old men, the head is the sole object of effective attack. It is defended, first by the stick placed in a high hanging guard, and also by the left elbow and forearm, which are held as much before the face as a handkerchief passed round the left thigh and held in the left hand will admit. The elbow may be on a level with the crown of the head when the handkerchief is drawn tight. Victory is with the player who first makes an inch of blood appear anywhere on his adversary's head. Blows on the arm or body do not count, but may be used to gain an opening at the head. The men stand fast pretty close to one another, so that there is no lunging, and of course no scope for movements involving judgment of time and distance. A stout and supple wrist and quickness in the returns appear to have been the main conditions of success. This backsword or singlestick (thus limited by conventions of whose origin we know nothing) seems a monotonous kind of play compared with fencing or sabre practice. But it must have been no bad training for nerve and eye, and, inasmuch as the first hit that took effect was decisive, must have required close and steady play. Modern amateurs are perhaps too light-hearted in giving and receiving in the course of one assault a dozen or more hits that with real swords would be disabling, if not fatal.

In the German Schläger combat the position is the same as in backswording, save that the left arm is kept, as in sabre play, behind the body: commonly the waistband of the trousers is grasped by the left hand. The weapon is a long, narrow blade, like a pointless rapier, but much more flexible. It is sharpened for a length of twenty centimètres (say eight inches) on the true edge, and five on the false edge. For practice and instruction blunt and rather stouter blades are used. The mask is like an English singlestick mask, but stronger and heavier. A padded leather vest, coming almost down to the knees, covers the body, and the right arm is encased in a sleeve attached to a gauntlet, which may be compared to an elongated Rugby football. In the actual duel there is an even more elaborate system of defence; the right wrist is guarded with a ring of mail, and the arm with folds of silk, which, like the turban of the East, are enough to stop any ordinary cut. Practically, though not according to strict rule, the body is altogether covered. The eyes are protected by iron spectacles, with strong wire net instead of glasses. A padded cap, defending the top of the head, is added to all this for students in their first year, who fight only under the direction of their seniors. The more advanced Burschen do not wear these caps, and are thus exposed to much more serious blows.

It is known to English readers by many descriptions that the duels are not, as a rule, the outcome of any real quarrel; they are arranged by the leaders of the fighting "Corps" of students, or by the senior members between themselves. At the same time challenges to serious duels with the Schläger are not unknown. Such a duel is called "glacé," because only town gloves (Glacé-Handschuhe) may be worn, and the ordinary equipment is discarded. It involves very serious danger, and is outside the rules of the game, no man being held bound to accept a challenge in this form. There are, however, sundry degrees of severity in recognized duels. First-year men (Füchse) fight with caps, for twenty-four rounds (Gänge, equivalent to the French phrase in fencing) of seven blows each. The regular form of duel for seniors is a quarter of an hour's fighting without caps. This may be made sharper by dispensing with seconds; for the second in a Schläger duel has not merely judicial or diplomatic functions. He stands close beside his man, holding an unsharpened Schläger with which he may parry as many blows as he thinks fit, and often he does parry a large proportion.

As to the manner of play, the cuts are aimed only at the head, and are delivered, not with the centre of percussion, but with the extreme forward part of the blade, which alone, as we have said, is sharpened. It is worth notice that the Schläger is derived from the long straight sword of the German Reiters, the force of whose blows made them famous in the sixteenth century at the battle of St. Quentin and elsewhere. They gave neither sweeping horizontal cuts like Orientals, nor drawing cuts like most European swordsmen, but struck in the line of their own motion with a continuing forward impetus, and did great execution. With the modern Schläger the blow comes entirely from the wrist, and (as in English backswording) has no movement of the body or limbs to aid it. Nevertheless, it is of great power, and has to be parried with a sharp forward motion of the fort of the opposing sword, otherwise it beats in over the guard. The lines of attack and parry are limited by the scope of the object to be attacked. From the position of the engaging guard, which, in the terms of fencing, may be called a very high prime, cuts may be made in the high outside line at the right side of the head (Terz), or with a turn of the wrist at the left side of the head (Quart), or the same in a lower line under the point (Tiefquart). Attacks in the outside line under the blade (corresponding to the fencer's seconde) are not allowed. The Terz attacks are mostly taken on the padded right arm. Such are the elements, to which certain variations have to be added. Thus Hinterkopfterz and Strewhquart are vertical, or nearly vertical, cuts over the guard at the top or even back of the head. When caps are not worn blows of this kind may inflict a rather ugly wound. Really serious ones are hardly known, but it is quite possible for the surgeon in attendance to have a troublesome piece of work. Small arteries, for example, may be divided and have to be taken up.

On the whole, there is not more danger to life or limb in a Schläger duel, for healthy men and with the usual precautions, than in any other rough pastime; probably there is not so much as in the Rugby game of football under the old rules. But the effusion of blood and the necessary presence and use of surgical appliances make it appear a barbarous affair to any one not bred to familiarity with it. And the play is said to be falling off in the skill which was its only justification. Twenty years ago the players hardly ever led off with a direct attack, which was thought too rash, but feinted and watched for their opportunity on a return. Of late years it has become a fashion to discard policy, and try for hits by main force; the weapons are also heavier than they used to be. Some local differences exist, or existed not long ago, in the fashion of the Schläger. The Glockenschläger, common in the North-German Universities, has a peculiar mounting, and is grasped like an Italian foil with a finger round the cross-bar. Formerly the small-sword was used as well; it is mentioned by Crabb Robinson in his Diary as being somewhere (at Jena, if our memory serves us) the regular instrument of students' duels. This usage, however, survives, if it still does survive, only at Munich. Possibly some reader may be curious concerning the literature of the Schläger. We believe that of technical literature there is little or none. The rules of the duel are preserved in manuscript books, and may probably be found in print. But the art seems to depend wholly upon oral tradition, which is to be regretted. For, whatever we may think of Schläger duelling, it has been for many generations a singular feature of German University life; and it deserves to have some better record than the casual descriptions of strangers before it goes the way of English backswording.

THE DEFINITION OF THE SNOB.

IT would appear that some preliminary remarks which were made here a few weeks ago on the necessity of a new Critique of Snobs have produced a certain effect. This is not surprising, and the fact may be noted without fatuity and without offence. For forty years mankind in England has been actuated to a great extent by a strong and healthy desire to escape snobbery, and a sudden reminder that mankind has got into a wrong groove is sure to be startling. It is creditable, very creditable, to any one that he should have tried to make his exit from Avernus, and it is not discreditable that the escaper should be somewhat froissé at being reminded that the escape is not facile. It will not do simply to reverse the proceedings of the ancestors who are within the grasp of Tartarus; if it would do, there would be no such great difficulty about the matter. Happy, too happy, would the human race be if any such receipt were effectual. Because the snob of the Forties achieved his destiny by loving a lord or a rich man, the snob of the Eighties thinks to escape that destiny by laughing at lords and (in print) condemning riches. Alas! it will not suffice. Κακὸν ἐσθλὸν ἔμμεναι; and the hardness is not made less hard by the simple resolve to avoid certain forms of badness which the bad men among our fathers did not avoid. But the deserving among the snobs possible (that is, among the Englishmen of to-day) may justly call for something like a guiding rule to replace that negative one which has so fatally miscarried. Therefore let us in all modesty attempt, not indeed the definition of the snob (properly to treat so vast a subject would require reams of snobscap paper, and reams of snobscap paper are not at our command), but some remarks as to his definition. The really genuine neophyte must await the illustration in detail which we trust to give him. But something like a preliminary sketch may be attempted. And, following Aristotle and the Oxford Spectator, it may be legitimately observed that accuracy is not to be expected. Absolute accuracy, indeed, in this matter must be postponed for some generations at least—until documents are fully registered. In our Original one kind of snob has himself fully delineated; in the present feeble and tentative essays another kind will, with the permission of those gods who may be protectors of snobbery, find himself taken pretty well sur le vif, though by an inferior hand. The future forms of snobs will await the future snobographer; and each snobographer will be met by the angry reclamation of his subjects, which subjects will, no doubt, be diverse.

> Nunc hic, nunc illic, superant vitalia rerum,
> Et superantur item.

When we and our followers have noted with a humble spirit, and, to use the words of a great writer of this day, "in the grave and chaste manner," the snob-phenomena of many generations, then accuracy may be expected, but not before.

To the best of our remembrance, a remembrance founded on many years' constant reading, the great Original did not attempt to define a snob, indeed he once said literatim, "We can't define it." The attempt has been, however, made in the form "The snob is he who admires base things basely." But this will not stand a moment's examination. Like all bad definitions, it extends to the wrong things and does not extend to the right. Here and there a snob would be caught by it; but for every one so caught many snobs would go free. For a man may admire things which are not at all base in a wrong way, and may so be a snob. He may admire base things with a knowledge of their baseness, and so be something even worse than a snob, but not one. He may, in hopes to guard himself against "fate which does so fast pursue," resolve not to admire anything, and so be the utterest and most hopeless of all snobs. And there can be little doubt that the mistaken notion that snobbery consists in admiration has, more than anything else, been the genesis of the snob of the second degree—the snob who thinks that, if he is sufficiently contemptuous of all hitherto recognized ideals, he is safe. Ce n'est pas plus facile que ça. The heaven of safety from snobbery can be attained by the simple process of talking disdainfully of the House of Lords.

Another, and a much safer, though still not quite a perfect, definition, which we have never seen given, is this—that a snob is he who follows the multitude to do evil. And note here that the multitude may be a merely relative multitude. It may be a majority of his own set as well as of his nation or of the world at large. Here we get rid at least of one drawback of the earlier attempt. For we recognize that there may be a snobbery of contempt as well as a snobbery of admiration. One, at least, of the chief notes of the snob, the deference to fashion, is happily set down by this definition, and it is so specially applicable to the present day that it may have special temptations to men of the present day. And yet it will not exactly "wash." For a snob might differ from the multitude for snobbish reasons, and so slip out at one loophole. He might follow the multitude to do good by an exception, and rejoice in his foolish, snobbish heart that he had got rid of the curse. And, lastly, a great many evil deeds which the multitude do, and are followed in doing, are not per se snobbish. It is impossible for the most violent partisan to say that it was snobbish of Cromwell to cut off Charles I.'s head. It is true that on that occasion he had the great multitude against him, but he had the small with him, and he followed it, and he did evil. Yet was he in this respect most assuredly not a snob, though he may have been on certain other occasions of his life. Napoleon, on the other hand (the usual historic name suggested by the Protector's), was always a snob ab initio ad finem, though he very rarely followed the multitude to do anything, bad or good. In fact (though this is not presently to the purpose) a comparison between Cromwell and Napoleon might be as fruitful as anything else in experiments and discoveries on the nature of the snob. We abstain (also for the present) with still greater reluctance from some comparisons of modern English politicians, which would be almost as luminous, but might give rise to more controversy.

It might be possible by an ingenious use of the old "Rule of False" to extract from the comparison of these and of other definitions something more satisfactory. But the safer and wiser way in this infancy of the science of snobography is to refrain from the attempt at absolute aphorism. Snob-detection must for a long time, if not always, be a branch rather of æsthetics than of mathematics; the snob must be felt rather than demonstrated. But certain marks of him may at least be pointed out and may help the explorer far more advantageously than an imperfect definition in his quest after the beast. One such mark has been already indicated. The snob almost always attempts to be in the fashion. In an aristocratic era he is a blind devotee of rank; in an age of wealth-getting and devil-take-the-hindmost, of riches; in a democratic age, of numbers and popularity. And it is a further and an almost crucial test of him that his admiration is never a really genuine admiration. When he grovelled before lords it was not because he knew the history of the peerage, its great deeds for England, its connexion with the noblest social conceptions ever reached by the human race—the conceptions of chivalry, and of a graduated society, in which each higher rank fought for and protected the lower. It had nothing to do with the past—the snob never thinks if he knows it of the past, except to derive petty grudges from the thought. He admired it because it was glittering and apparently powerful in the present. Now that he contemns the peerage (while for the most part chattering about peers in preference to anything else) it is not because he has any reasoned idea of equality (which indeed is a contradiction in terms), but partly because he has an ignoble jealousy of a privilege which he does not possess, and partly because it is the cant of the day to sneer at peerages. When he bowed the knee, and when he still bows the knee, before wealth, it was, and is, not because of the immense potentialities of wealth, for good or for evil; not even in most cases because he had or has a genuine thirst for the baser pleasures that wealth can give. Wealth makes a man conspicuous and talked about—the snob's heaven in itself. In short, the snob's is less a peculiar idiosyncrasy than a mixture of many bad idiosyncrasies in a mean and moderate degree. When he transcends this degree he ceases, at any rate in that particular instance, to be a snob, though he may still be one in other matters. Probably it requires the restraining influence of a complex civilization to breed snobs, and that may be the reason why, beyond the Renaissance at earliest, it is nearly impossible to trace them. You must have a set convention of some kind before you can have a snob; and, when the convention is set, the snob congenially manifests himself in attempts to burlesque, degrade, and exaggerate it. Then there comes a reaction, and he either does the same with a new convention, or, as we have seen in these days, having no new one ready made, hastens with equally congenial clumsiness to burlesque, degrade, and exaggerate the revolt against the old convention. And throughout his various and changing forms the one characteristic which remains to him is unreality. He can never give a reason for the faith, or the unfaith, that is in him. Mrs. Grundy or the Caucus, "the county" or the moral standard of the Particular Baptist Synod of Llanpumpsaint, hold the place to him of his proper judgment and taste. A man who really on intelligible principles admires a bright blue wall-paper, with gold stars thickly powdered on it at mathematical intervals, is not a snob by any means; neither is a man (if such there be) a snob who on intelligible, or even unintelligible, principles thinks Mr. Jesse Collings a statesman. Again, all snobs are necessarily objects of dislike tempered by a little pity and some amusement; but an object of dislike is not necessarily a snob. So also every snob is a fool; but every fool is not a snob. For the chief characteristic of the snob, difficult to seize as it is in its essence, is not primarily political, or artistic, or literary, or religious; it is moral. And, if we look among the old-fashioned moral virtues for the nearest antipathy of snobbishness, we shall find it in Magnanimity—that is to say, Pride in the good sense. A really proud man may have many vices and weaknesses, but he can never be one of two bad things, a democrat or a snob—which two bad things, be it remembered, are two, and not necessarily though often enough by accident, one. He thinks too much of himself to conceive it possible that he can be lowered by paying to any one else the respect which is by the courtesy of convention that one's due, and in the same way he is saved from the danger of exaggerating that respect. He covets and envies no rank, and therefore he neither adulates nor carps at any. He forms and holds his own opinions, and is therefore in no danger of borrowing them from the multitude. He would laugh at the idea of the most sweet voices conferring any dignity on him or depriving him of any, of their having any right to command his obedience or intelligence to command his respect. And he would equally laugh at the notion of its being worth while to set the most sweet voices at defiance by any violent eccentricity or recalcitrance. Such is the anti-snob temper, from which, by reading backward, the snob temper may be most easily described, if not defined. But there are other touches which must be put to the description, and these cannot yet be applied. Indeed, as was said at the outset, we want more information; we want a Royal Commission on snobs, renewed every generation, before their nature can be scientifically pronounced upon. In the papers which may possibly follow this we shall only attempt to display our art on the snobs quos nati sumus.

THE RESTORATION OF THE BISHOPRIC OF BRISTOL.

FUTURE Church reformers may well learn caution from the way in which, bit by bit, the steadfast unintelligent ecclesiastical legislation of the Church Commission of the beginning of this reign is being annulled. The work is not yet half a century old, but it has not worn well, and it is constantly calling for alteration. To legislate under a panic is proverbially unwise. What is enacted is not what is best and wisest, but what will still the clamour outside and stave off the threatened danger. It is not surprising that such measures should want the principle of permanence, and, being destitute of any wide view of the subject, or any firm grasp of its real bearings, their inadequacy should become growingly apparent until a radical change is once more imperative. When the Bishops were warned by Earl Grey in ominous tones to "set their houses in order," if they were not to be swept away in the rising torrent of reform, one might have thought that they would feel that the most important thing to be done was to make episcopacy a more real power in the country, To prove its practical value was the surest way to save it from destruction. But to do this, to transform bishops from stately functionaries, making formal progresses through their dioceses at stated intervals for the mechanical performance of confirmations and other episcopal functions, into real overseers of their dioceses, manifesting a fatherly interest in their spiritual well-being, and coming into living relations with their pastors and their flocks, was an idea which had hardly yet dawned on the episcopal mind. Bishop Wilberforce had not yet created the modern type of an English bishop. Besides, if the idea had been conceived, to carry it into execution would have demanded a large increase of the number of the bishops. And such an increase was regarded as impossible. Twenty-six was the number of English diocesan prelates, and twenty-six it must remain. The limits fixed by Pope Gregory twelve centuries before for the English episcopate were those Quos ultra citraque nequit consistere rectum.

They were laid down in a prophetic spirit for all time. There was a seeming sacredness about the number two dozen and two—two metropolitans and four-and-twenty suffragans—like that attaching to the mysterious "tetractys" of the Pythagoreans, or the sacred number of the Incas, which might not be violated with impunity. The Sacred College had been a long time in attaining its full complement. Nine centuries and a half had elapsed before the pious care of Henry VIII. for the restoration of "true religion and the worship of God" in the hallowed seats which had been polluted by "the enormities into which the life and profession of the monks had long since lamentably deviated"—"deplorabiliter exorbitaverat" (we quote from the Royal letter decreeing the privation of the see of Bristol and the other sees erected at the same time; Rymer, Fœdera, xiv. 749)—completed the tale. But, that once reached, advance was impossible. "Roma locuta est, causa finita est." True, our legislators were Protestants, and had been called again and again to renounce certain "damnable doctrines and positions" of the Church of Rome. But this numerical terminus, though fixed by a Pope, had an awful sanctity about it, which it would be profane to tamper with. "Actum esset de ecclesia"; it would be all up with the Church if its episcopate were enlarged by a single member.

And so, when the claims for increased episcopate supervision for the teeming thousands of the manufacturing populations of Lancashire and West Yorkshire could no longer be ignored, and it was decided that the dioceses of Manchester and Ripon should be constituted, the sacred number was to be preserved intact by the abolition of two of the existing sees—we ought rather to say by their absorption into other sees—thus putting an end to their independent existence, and converting them into "nominis umbræ." The two dioceses selected for this "happy despatch"—the "painless extinction"—were, as we well know, those of St. Asaph and Bangor, and of Gloucester and Bristol. On the next avoidance of one of these pairs of bishoprics the surviving bishop was, "nolens volens," to take over the widowed diocese, and become bishop of the two. The process proposed was the reverse of Cowper's for there were to be two thrones, and only one bishop to sit in them. We need not remind our readers how through the providential tenacity of life in the North Welsh prelates and the heroic resolution of the late Lord Powys—in bringing forward the repeal of this union again and again—never knowing that he was beaten till he had achieved success, one part of this monstrous measure never took effect. Bishop Bethell and Bishop Vowler Short obstinately refuse to die. Lord Powys refused to throw up the sponge, and the two Welsh bishoprics were saved to the Church.

From the first the see of Bristol seems to have caused the Commissioners the greatest perplexity. Its existence as an independent see was no longer to be allowed. It was to be united with something. That was a settled question. But with what? That was the "crux." It is not generally known that the proposition in the Commissioners first Report was that the sees of Llandaff and Bristol should be united. It was nothing to them that the Bristol Channel interposed its "stormy water" between the two—

Nequicquam Deus abscidit
Prudens oceano dissociabili

if the "impious" Commissioners decreed that the Bishop, whether good sailor or bad, should bound over the shallows he had rather not touch. Indeed the Commissioners, safe from having to suffer themselves from the consequences of their legislation, seem to have been perfectly enamoured of separating a bishop and his cathedral from the chief portion of his diocese by a stretch of salt water. Thus they assigned to the Bishop of Rochester the counties of Hertfordshire and Essex, with his cathedral on one side of the estuary of the Thames, and his chief charge on the other, while, crueller still, they proposed to unite Sodor and Man with Carlisle, thus entailing on the unlucky occupant of the joint see six hours of tossing on one of the roughest pieces of water to be found anywhere round our coasts, every time he had any episcopal functions to perform on the Isle of Man.

The reason alleged by the Commissioners for the union of Llandaff and Bristol is not unimportant in its bearing on the scheme now so energetically promoted for reconstituting the ancient see, which we rejoice to be assured has the full sanction of the Prime Minister of Her Majesty's Government, as well as the hearty approval of the present Bishop, and is therefore not unlikely to take effect within a measurable period. The Commissioners say (Third Report, 1836) "when we recommended the Union of the Sees of Llandaff and Bristol, we were influenced chiefly by a Desire to retain for the City of Bristol its Ecclesiastical Character; and to secure to it the Advantage of a Bishop resident upon the Spot, or at no great distance from it." The Commissioners, however, forgot entirely to take into account the feelings of the diocese of Llandaff. They were as unwilling as Bristol could be to exchange "the Benefits which they derived from the Residence and personal Superintendence of their Bishop" for the casual favours of a Bishop whose home would be on the other side of the Severn sea. The remonstrances from Monmouthshire and Glamorganshire were so loud and urgent that this pet scheme of the Commissioners had to be given up altogether, and some fresh arrangement suggested. The Commissioners' second scheme was equally unlucky. In fact, they seem throughout to have succeeded in disgusting as many people as possible, and causing the greatest offence to the greatest number. This second proposition was (we give it in their own words) "that the City and Suburbs of Bristol, being within a convenient Distance of the City of Wells, where the Bishop of Bath and Wells resides, should be united to that Diocese."

If the former recommendation was unpopular on one side of the Bristol Channel, this was still more obnoxious on the other. Bristol was lashed to a fury. We hear of no voice being raised in that city against the union with Llandaff, and reasonably enough. In that case they were to be the absorbers; in this they were to be the absorbed. Bristol and Bath have always maintained a kind of friendly rivalry, a sort of amicable jealousy of one another. But the suggestion that Bristol should lose its independent dignity and be merged in a see, in the designation of which its rival's name took the prominent place, was intolerable. The Bristolians "represented in strong Terms their Objections to a Plan which would merge their Episcopal See in that of Bath and Wells, and their earnest Desire to retain the Advantages of the pastoral Superintendence and Example of a Bishop resident amongst them."

Once more the Commissioners were forced to yield, pronouncing the "Feelings" manifested to be "not less honourable to the Citizens of Bristol than encouraging to the Friends of the Established Church." So they tried a third scheme, already adverted to in their First Report, and this time with better success—"Numero Deus impare gaudet. The Churchmen of Bristol had a sop thrown to them in the promise that they should retain their Bishop—at least half of him—and the whole of their Cathedral. A house was to be provided in some convenient situation near the City of Bristol so that the Bishop might reside alternately there and at Gloucester. To make up for the addition to the see of Salisbury of Dorsetshire, the two northern deaneries of Wiltshire were to be transferred to the newly-constituted diocese of Gloucester and Bristol, the whole scheme to take effect at the first avoidance of either see. The accomplishment of this ill-arranged plan was not long deferred. The fates were as favourable to the one union as they happily have proved unfavourable to the other.

The South-Western sees were less fortunate. In 1834 Bristol was vacated by the death of Bishop Gray, the father of the dauntless Metropolitan of the South African Church, who, with the same inflexible courage which characterized his son, when warned during the terrible Bristol riots of 1831 of the danger of going to his Cathedral on Sunday morning, since the mob had threatened to destroy it and him, calmly remarked—"Well, if they kill me, where could a bishop better die than in his Cathedral in the worship of God?" Divine Service over, he saw unmoved his palace fired by the rioters and reduced to a blackened ruin. Bishop Gray's successor was the Rev. Joseph Allen, Lord Althorp's college tutor, with the promise that whenever Ely should become vacant he should be translated to that far more comfortable and well-endowed see. Bishop Allen's hope was not long deferred. Within two years Bishop Sparke died, and the see of Bristol became once more vacant. There had been no chivalrous champion to do battle for its independence, as for that of its Welsh sisters. Less fortunate the see of Sodor and Man, which had been saved from being merged in Carlisle by the memory of the sainted Bishop Wilson. Even the venerated name of Bishop Butler was powerless to preserve it from absorption. The Act was imperative. The easygoing, scholarly Monk—the last of the "Greek-play bishops"—was not one to raise any objections to its provisions being carried out. Besides, the transfer was made as agreeable as possible. The Palace at Gloucester—since rebuilt by Bishop Baring—was an inconvenient, dilapidated building. The mob, as we have said, had burnt down the palace at Bristol; the Bishop of the united sees, as we have said, was to have two houses, and reside alternately at each of his Cathedral cities, and, to enable him to meet the increased expense, an addition of 500*l.* was made to his income. So a grand new house was built, at enormous cost, at Stapleton, in a pleasant suburb of Bristol, in which—"proviso" notwithstanding—the house at Gloucester being declared uninhabitable, Bishop Monk passed all the rest of his episcopal life, except such portion as was spent in his residentiary house in the Cloisters of the Abbey, as Canon of Westminster. The successors of Bishop Monk—Bishops Baring, Thomson, and Ellicott—the palace there being rebuilt, have preferred Gloucester as a residence. The magnificent house at Stapleton, so lately built, has been sold, and has been converted into a charitable institution. Beyond occasional visits, often in the case of the present Bishop extending over a considerable period, the great City of Bristol with its vast and rapidly growing population has seen but little of its Bishop. It is needless to say how greatly the work of the Church has suffered in Bristol from the absence of a responsible head. The injury inflicted on the Church in Bristol by robbing her of a resident Bishop has been made increasingly manifest by the growth of the population. It has been growingly felt that a great wrong had been done to one of the chief cities in the kingdom, and that this wrong ought to be redressed. Bristol claims to have a bishop for itself, and it proves the validity of that claim and the earnestness with which it is put forward by the manner in which it takes the matter into its own hand, and asking nothing from the Legislature but permission to undo the rash work of half a century back, displays its determination to secure the restoration of its bishopric by raising the sum needed for its endowment. The income proposed for the future bishop, 2,500*l.* a year, including 500*l.* resigned by Bishop Ellicott, is not a large one—hardly large enough indeed to meet the perpetual demands that are made on a bishop's purse. But the diocese will not be a large one, and we may hope the pecuniary tax will be in proportion. The new see is proposed to include no more than Bristol itself and its Deanery, and the two Northern Deaneries of Wiltshire, which since the changes in the boundaries of the diocese have belonged to the see of Gloucester. No rash attempt will be made to do away with any more ancient landmarks, by robbing the Somersetshire see of any portion of its historic territory; least of all—which we have been gravely told was a recognized portion of the plan—of the City of Bath, which was at one time the seat of that bishopric, and has for many centuries given it its distinguishing name. The population of the proposed diocese will be about 400,000, which will exceed that of the neighbouring diocese of Salisbury, and will be little inferior to that of Lincoln, when—as by the time this is in the hands of our readers we trust it will be—it is relieved of the county of Nottingham by the foundation of the see of Southwell.

The hearty unanimity displayed at the recent meeting at Bristol, the character of the speeches made, and the liberality shown by the subscription list, prove that the citizens of Bristol are thoroughly in earnest in their resolve to have their bishop restored to them. And when such men are in earnest there is no withstanding them. It only remains for us to express our hearty sympathy with the movement, and an earnest hope that the manifest injustice of in any way hindering the Church from making provision for her own needs by her sons' munificence will forbid any substantial opposition being made to the Bill when it is introduced into Parliament, so that the "Bill" may speedily become an "Act." That point gained, we have no question that the pecuniary requirements will be soon met, and that it will not be very long before we have to congratulate the reconstituted diocese on the consecration of its first—or may we more truly say its forty-eighth?—bishop. Happy will the diocese be if it secures one to inaugurate its renewed independent existence who will exhibit the calm wisdom, the quiet perseverance, the moderation, the devotion to duty, and the Christian love which have characterized the venerable prelate whose resignation, however necessary, we cannot but deplore, whose episcopal virtues have rendered the diocese of Chester one of the most enviable dioceses in England.

ENGLAND IN AMERICA.

A FEW weeks ago the City of New York celebrated the centenary of its evacuation by the British troops after the close of the revolutionary war. There was a procession of the practical sort which finds favour in the eyes of Americans: there were regiments of the State National Guard, and crack corps invited from other States; there were detachments of the veterans of the war of the Rebellion, bearing the torn and tattered battle-flags, almost shot from their standards in four years' hard fighting; there were carriages containing the few survivors of the war of 1812 with Great Britain; there were other carriages containing the President of the United States, the Governors of New York and of a few other States, and the mayor and other officials of the City of New York; there were detachments of police and firemen; and there were a few hundred men from the tiny regular army which the Government of the United States deems adequate for its needs. In the evening there was a banquet, and there were speeches. Perhaps the most noteworthy circumstance of the whole affair was the friendly tone toward England. Nowhere in the speeches, in the newspapers, or in the talk of the crowd, was there any evidence of the slightest hostile feeling—always excepting, of course, the utterances of the wholly un-American and unrepresentative section of the public which thinks of Ireland first and of the United States last. There were many positive signs of a friendly feeling. With doubtful taste one wandering Briton hung a British flag from a window of the hotel in which he was staying, and although the procession passed under it there was no protestation of any kind. It is not too much to say that there is now no trace at all of the ill-will toward England which naturally lingered after the revolution, and which was fanned to a flame before the war of 1812. This ill-will was perceptible easily enough down to the outbreak in 1861, although it was slowly fading away. During the Civil War there was not a little anger against Great Britain among both parties; but the Civil War, overshadowing all other questions, wholly killed the early ill-will, and the anger died out soon for lack of fuel. It is perhaps scarcely accurate to describe the present feeling as cordial, and the sentimental declarations after dinner that the two countries are brothers, and that "blood is thicker than water," are perhaps not quite sincere on either side. The attitude of the really representative American is that taken by Mr Lowell in his delightful speech at the dinner given to Mr. Henry Irving on the Fourth of July last year. This attitude may perhaps be described as a dignified and sincere friendliness, as far removed from hysterical sentimentality on one side as it is from enmity on the other. So distinctly is this the position of the best Americans, that the well-informed American critic is always inclined to ascribe the authorship of a violent invective against England in an American journal to some renegade Englishman; and the ascription is rarely inaccurate.

There is to be seen just now in America, in what is known as Society, a strong tendency to imitate English ways and customs and fashions. This tendency is gaining strength, and spreading from New York and Boston to smaller inland cities. It is a new thing in many ways, for until lately New York has taken its cue rather from Paris than from London. During the Second Empire many good Americans made pilgrimages to the Tuileries as to a Mecca, and some settled permanently near the shrine. But Paris is no longer more fashionable than London. The American girl continues to get her gowns in the French capital, of course; but she is glad to get her habit and her ulster and her cloaks in the English capital. As there is now no Court in France, she looks forward to a presentation at Court in England; and the possibility of marrying a title is perhaps present to her mind as she crosses the ocean. That she is quite capable of taking care of herself in the presence of English noblemen and of their female relatives all readers of Mr. James's International Episode and of Mr. Howells's Woman's Reason will bear witness. In fact, the American girl is in no danger of losing her head before parting with her hand. It is her consort, the American young man, who is most likely to be contaminated by contact with the Englishman. There is no denying that a certain set of young Americans, more particularly in New York and in Boston, affect the Englishman and ape all his affectations. They mimic every English trick in the most snobbish way. They attempt an English accent, and they sprinkle Britticisms freely through their speech. They talk of their "fads," and they call people "cads," and they abound in the most amusing little affectations. Their greatest happiness is to be taken for an Englishman—a joy not often vouchsafed to them. It was to one of these pitiful imitations—a young Bostonian—that a clever New York girl said, "Mr. Blank, I should think you would be so glad to meet Lord So-and-so; you know he is a real Englishman!"

This Anglo-mania has resulted in the introduction into certain American cities of not a few British customs. Rich men drive heavy carriages imported from England, ignoring, or ignorant of, the fact that the use of the native American woods, tough and springy, allow American carriages to be much lighter while quite as strong. Rich young men play polo in the broiling heat of an American summer. Attempts are made at fox-hunting. Unfortunately the foxes are few, so that a drag has frequently to be employed. So marked a feature of New York society has the forced imitation of English customs become, that a light and lively little weekly called Life, now about a year old, has best made itself known by constant attacks on this. And the chief cartoon of another American comic weekly, published on Evacuation Day, was a picture of all the importations from England, both men and things, now to be seen in the streets of New York, with a sarcastic query as to the exact date of the English evacuation. The variety of Anglomania which most excited the joy of the comic journalist was the Dude. There are those who pretend to see a resemblance between the Dude and the Masher. But these are not profound observers. The Masher, we venture to think, although chronically tired, is, on occasion, boisterous. The Dude is never noisy; he is a living protest against indecorum; he is the embodiment of the desire to be a perfect gentleman of the strictest English order. In his dress there was to be seen a certain likeness to the Masher. But here, again, the likeness was superficial. The Masher was dressed in the height of fashion always. The Dude, although clothed in imitation of an Englishman, sought always to be as unobtrusive as possible in his attire. Yet his quiet, stiff, British manners often attracted malicious criticism. There is even a story current of a worthy farmer who saw two Dudes in town, and who remarked, with great grief, "Gosh! what things a man does see when he ain't got his gun!"

Mr. Matthew Arnold, who is enlightening the Americans by personal ministrations and a set of three lectures, finds Barbarians, Philistines, and Populace in England, and declared his expectation of finding in America only Philistines. But he reckoned without the American Anglomaniac. The American Anglomaniac, as we have seen, is a Philistine who apes the Barbarian. The genuine British Barbarian Mr. Arnold credits with various good qualities, and he has at least the consciousness of a solid position. The American pseudo-Barbarian has all the faults, and none of the virtues, of the English model, and he cannot but be conscious that his position is false and hollow. He is but a brummagem Barbarian—and a brummagem Barbarian is a sorry sight for gods and men. It is fortunate for the future of the United States that this class of Anglomaniacs, although beginning to be large enough to be counted, is only an infinitesimal section of the American people. Nothing is plainer to the wayfaring man, though a fool, if he will but keep his eyes open and note the signs of the times, than the growing divergence and independence of the United States from England in literature and in life. The English and the Americans are of one stock, but they are two peoples; and there is nothing to be gained by a pretence that the Americans are colonial or provincial. The colonial spirit has been invisible in the United States for fifty years, and the provincial spirit died during the war of the Rebellion. The conditions of life in the United States, the climate, the blending of customs brought from other lands than England, these unite in making the American unlike the Englishman. What the American is like can best be seen in Mr. Howells's novels, or in the striking anonymous story of the Breadwinners. Mr. James has dealt admirably with the Europeanized American; but he is himself too Europeanized to be altogether satisfactory as a portrayer of the uncontaminated American; in fact, we doubt if Mr. James knows New York, or even Boston, as well as he knows Paris and London. As Colonel Higginson neatly put it, "Mr. James is not a true cosmopolitan, because a true cosmopolitan is at home even in his own country." Mr. James is so far abroad in his own country that he cited in a story in the Century, not long ago, as a typical Americanism, "in the swim," a phrase which not one American in ten would be likely to understand.

Sport is one of the things in which American habits are widely different from English. Polo and foxhunting—or the pursuit of drag under difficulties—are recent importations, and as such they are the amusement only of the fast and fashionable few, and have no interest whatever for any others. Cricket, in spite of many strenuous efforts, has never been acclimated in the United States; there are a few clubs here and there, mostly managed by Englishmen; but the popular interest is wholly in baseball, and a "crack" game of baseball easily attracts a gathering of twenty thousand. Racing is rapidly becoming more popular and profitable, but the real liking of the people is for trotting. The owning of fast trotters, for his own private use and behoof, is one of the joys of the American millionaire; and the one crumpled rose-leaf in Mr. Vanderbilt's existence is, that a much poorer man has a faster pair of trotters than he has, and that the much poorer man, with a painful disregard of his duty toward a man worth twenty million pounds, refuses to sell his team. Here occasion serves to say that wealth merely as wealth has less weight in the United States than it has in Great Britain. We know that there is a common belief that wealth is more worshipped and is more powerful in New York than it is in London; but the belief is unfounded. Whether it is that wealth is too common in America, or that most Americans expect to be wealthy some day, or that they can remember when the rich man was a poor man, or whatever the reason may be, the fact remains that the possession of money counts for far less in New York than it does in London. And if we may credit Mr. Archibald Forbes, the same state of affairs obtains in Australia as in America.

Where English influence in America might be supposed to be strongest is in literature. There is no denying that it is strong. But the influence of other countries, and especially of France, is also strong. There are many more translations from the French and the German published annually in the United States than there are in Great Britain. French authors little known in England are widely read in America; and of authors of importance more works have been translated. In New York it is possible, for example, to get a uniform edition in English of all of M. Taine's writings, and of nearly all of Turgenief's. The American Philistine differs from the British Philistine chiefly in that his ignorance is never hostile; he knows not the light, but he is ready to receive it when he sees it. And this willingness to learn is responsible for the many American translations from foreign authors. And this again redeems what there may be of American provinciality, which is broadened by its allegiance, not to one capital, but to many. Accompanying this study of the best foreign work is a growing indifference to foreign opinion. The American is glad when the value of an American work is recognized by an English or a French critic, but he never waits for the foreign approval before declaring his own opinion. Indeed he is wont to wonder at the English liking for certain American authors, and he is wont also to take up certain English authors and to hail them as masters before their position in England is quite as secure. We believe, for example, that Mr. Austin Dobson and Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson have a wider following in America than they have in England, much liked as they are here. The unfortunate condition of copyright law has driven the better class of American publishers to give up English novels and English books of general literature, and more and more to confine themselves to American books, with a consequent increase in the quantity and quality of the latter. The invasion of England by the American magazines is sufficient proof of their independence, and their success in England is due, we incline to think, to the resolute American tone, and not to any misguided attempt to cater to English taste. At the present day the circulation in England of either Harper's or the Century is several times as large as the circulation of any English magazine in America.

PRINCE BISMARCK'S SOCIAL EXPERIMENT.

As a rule, the internal policy of a nation can possess but little interest for foreigners. The social reformer may make a study of the way in which other countries provide compensation for the workmen who are injured by accidents in mines or cotton mills, but if he talks too freely upon such subjects his acquaintance will vote him a bore. Yet no one who is acquainted with German politics can have failed to read with interest the draft of a Bill on this subject which was published last week. It is one of the great social reforms that were promised in November 1881; it has been given to the public at an unusually early stage, as if to invite discussion; and the North German Gazette has hastened to inform its readers that, though the details of the measure were of course worked out in the Ministerial offices, the principles on which it is founded are entirely the conception of Prince Bismarck. Nor is the scope of the draft unworthy of its origin. It aims at nothing less than the organization of the whole industry of Germany; only for a special purpose at present, it is true, but in a way which, if it can be worked out successfully, will certainly lead to far more important consequences.

Since 1871, when the masters were first legally compelled to make compensation to the workmen for injury incurred by accidents, they have for the most part insured against this risk, and some of the Companies are said not to have acted in a liberal spirit. The sufferers complain that they cannot obtain their just due without vexatious delay and litigation. It is the object of the present Bill to remedy this and other evils by rendering all the manufacturers and mine-owners of Germany liable for any accident that occurs in their own line of business. For this purpose it is necessary to form them into professional Associations, which is to be done in the following way. Every person who comes under the Act is bound to make a statement to the local authorities as to the line of business in which he is engaged and the average number of hands he employs; and this material, after being duly digested, is to be submitted to the Imperial Insurance Board, a new administrative body, to be formed in a manner that will shortly be explained. After these preliminary steps have been taken, if a sufficient percentage of the masters who are interested in any single branch of industry apply to the Bundesrath for permission to form an Association, this will be granted, unless it be found on examination that the number of persons concerned is too small to render such a step desirable. A general meeting will then be called, at which a member of the Board must be present. Each master will be accredited with a number of votes proportionate to that of the men whom he employs, and may be represented by proxy. The meeting will elect the acting committee, whose members are to receive no remuneration for their services, though their actual expenditure will be reimbursed. An Association thus formed will enjoy corporate rights and great freedom of action. Indeed, almost the entire management of its affairs will be left in its hands, subject to the control of the Imperial Insurance Board; and, as it will be empowered to issue regulations for the prevention of accidents, its influence will be considerable.

The workmen are to be organized in a somewhat similar way. As it would be obviously impossible to call a meeting of all the miners, spinners, or foundry workmen of Germany, the Government has been obliged to look round for some other plan by which the operatives may be represented; and it has discovered one which will probably give expression to their wishes more fairly and more fully than a direct election would have done. The workmen choose the companions in whom they have the greatest confidence to manage their Krankenkassen, which do part of the work of our Benefit Societies, though in a different way, and to these the choice of the delegates will be entrusted. No Association will be complete without a labourers' committee, which must consist of from nine to eighteen members.

The new Imperial Insurance Board is to consist of a president, and at least two other members, nominated for life by the Emperor; of four members of the Imperial Council (Bundesrath), appointed by that body for a term of four years; and of four representatives of the Associations, two of whom will be elected by the masters and two by the men, for the same period. The Board can come to no decision unless at least five members are present; and when any matter of great, especially pecuniary, importance, or a question relating to the prevention of accidents, is discussed, one of these must be a representative of the masters and one of the men.

If the Bill becomes law, it is probable that those who are interested in the more important industries of the country will hasten to avail themselves of it; if they do not, the central Board is invested with powers to compel them to perform the duties it imposes, even if they do not choose to avail themselves of the advantages it offers. On these we need not dwell, nor on the details of the measure, which can have little interest for any except those immediately affected by it. It may be worth while, however, to add a word or two on the functions of the workmen's Committee. When an accident has happened, they will be bound to send a delegate to assist the police in investigating into its cause, and to nominate two of the court of five who assess the compensation due to any one who has been injured; two others will represent the masters, and the president will be appointed by the Government of the State under the jurisdiction of which the case falls. From this court an appeal may in important cases be made to the central Board, on which, too, as we have seen, the labourers are to be fairly represented.

It is clear at a glance that this scheme differs in several important respects from the two which the Government has already presented to the Imperial Parliament. It is simpler and more precise, while at the same time it is far bolder. For once the Chancellor has deigned to profit by the criticism of his opponents. The workmen are no longer to be forced to contribute to the insurance fund, nor is any burden laid upon the Treasury of the Empire but that of bearing the expenses of the Imperial Board, except in the exceedingly improbable case of an association becoming absolutely insolvent. These are concessions to the Liberal party which it was wise to make and which are wise in themselves. The whole character of the associations, too, is conceived in a more statesmanlike spirit, and defined with a firmer hand than in the last draft. We may have our doubts as to whether they can be made to work; but if they do they will form a firm basis for many of the social reforms which Prince Bismarck is known to contemplate.

It is difficult to come to any decided opinion as to what the fate of this measure will be when it is presented to the House. To judge from the opinions expressed in the press, the dogmatic Liberals will oppose it on the ground that it is compulsory and that it interferes with the business of the Insurance Companies. But the elections are approaching, and there is some reason to believe that its rejection would be unpopular in the constituencies. At any rate, both the right and the left wing of the party seem to be wavering. The Conservatives of all shades will support it almost to a man, and the Centre has welcomed it with enthusiasm. It would be wrong to attribute this to the concessions that have been lately made to the Roman Catholic Church. No body of Christian men can view the misery of their fellow-creatures with indifference, and the Roman Catholics have long been honourably known in Germany for the efforts they have made to remove the physical and moral evils which poverty produces. From its very formation, the Centre has been consistent on this point. It bore the reproach of showing a sympathy with the demands of the Socialists long before State Socialism had been received by the Government and presented at Court. Besides this, in granting the trade associations corporate rights and so large an amount of freedom, the Chancellor has adopted principles which several of the leading Catholics have long advocated. The Liberals still command a majority in the Imperial Parliament, but a small defection from their ranks would give this Bill the force of law; and a foreigner with no personal interest at stake can hardly help hoping that he may have an opportunity of observing the results of Prince Bismarck's great experiment.

OVERHEAD WIRES

FOR some long time past the question of wires used by the Government Postal Department and Telephone Companies passing over the houses and streets in London has agitated the public mind. The serious inconveniences and dangers arising from the present almost indiscriminate way in which these wires are run forms, no doubt, a very legitimate source of public grievance. After a great deal of grumbling in the public press lately, certain deputations have waited upon Sir Charles Dilke to lay before him the inconveniences to which the householders are subjected and the dangers which the public generally run from these overhead wires; and certain District Boards of Works are actually opposing the erection of overhead wires in their districts by the Postmaster-General. Throughout the time during which this subject has been discussed in the public press the majority of would-be reformers have suggested but one remedy, and that is to put all telegraph, telephone, and electric-lighting wires underground. There is a certain charm to the non-technical mind about the obvious simplicity of this remedy, and as yet technical men do not seem to have thought it worth their while to point out in the non-technical press the enormous difficulties in the way of adopting it.

A very large number of the overhead wires which are at present causing so much uneasiness and discord are connected with the different telephone systems. Now there are two electrical phenomena, both included under the general name of induction, which tend to interfere with the good working of telephone lines. The best known of these phenomena, and the one most popularly known under the name of "induction," is the production of momentary currents in telephone lines produced by the intermittence or variation of electrical currents in other lines near to them, which produces that peculiar sound so often to be heard in telephones. This may best be described by likening it to the boiling of a kettle, and is often so powerful even under the overhead system as almost to drown the sound of speech. The strength of this effect increases very greatly the closer the telephone wire is to the wires which are causing this disturbance. Now underground wires, as London is not yet provided with subways, must be necessarily very much closer together than they are under the present overhead system, so that this particular effect would become so strong in the case of long lines laid close together underground that it might even interfere with the good working of the more delicate telegraph instruments.

The other effect also included under the general title of induction is scarcely felt on overhead lines. It is that effect which produces what is known as retardation on submarine cables, to overcome which the delicate and expensive instruments now used for submarine telegraphy were devised. This effect would certainly be strong on any long underground telephone line. The effect is not only one of true retardation, it really tends to act as a sort of governor or equalizer, so that a current rapidly changing in strength passed through a line subjected to this influence becomes more steady. Now as telephones depend upon abrupt and rapid changes of the strength of the current, this particular form of inductive effect would seriously impair the clearness of their articulation if the line were of any considerable length. There is no known means at present of overcoming the disturbance of telephonic working introduced by this form of induction. The first form of induction mentioned may be overcome, but the only practical method hitherto introduced consists in running a double wire and thereby enormously increasing the expense. This leads us directly to the other great objection to putting telegraph and telephone lines underground—namely, the greatly increased expense of the whole system. Whereas overhead wires can be run bare, merely requiring very inexpensive insulators on the posts, underground wires have to be carefully covered with an insulating coating, and the added expense of this coating is very considerable. In the arbitration between the Wandsworth District Board of Works and the Postmaster-General, before Mr. Paget as arbitrator, Mr. Henry Faton, the superintending engineer of the Metropolitan Postal Telegraphs, gave evidence as to one of the disputed lines, that an overhead wire would cost 8*l.* per mile, whilst an underground wire would cost about 350*l.* per mile. Nor does the expense end with the first cost of the line. No insulating covering has yet been devised suitable for telegraph and telephone wires which will remain in good order for any length of time; in fact, we may safely say that all underground lines have been laid with wire covered with gutta-percha. Unless gutta-percha be kept always covered with water, as in the case of submarine cables, it is subject to more or less rapid decay. This decay gives rise to "faults" on the line which impair or even stop its working, and even with the admirable system of tubes and test-boxes adopted in London by the Post Office authorities for their underground lines, it becomes a matter of time and difficulty to localize these faults and cut them out, thus greatly increasing the cost of maintenance. Every one who knows London well must already be familiar with the testing tents of the Postal Department and the spectacle of their lines-men testing for faults. From all these considerations we say that, even though it may be possible, though not convenient, to lay short telegraph and telephone lines underground, it must involve very considerable outlay to do so.

For the present we may leave out of the question electric lighting leads, which, on the whole, are rather better underground than overhead.

The real remedy for the present state of things must be found in legislation, and it would be a great pity if that legislation took the form of forcing the Postmaster-General and the Telephone Companies to place all their lines underground, for the very great cost of carrying this out—even where it is possible—must necessarily in the end retard the cheapening of telegrams and keep up the present high prices of subscriptions to Telephone Exchanges.

To deal first with the question of public danger, we may point out that there is no reason why an overhead wire should be more dangerous than a railway bridge crossing a road. The reason why at present the wires are a source of some danger is that when telegraphs were first introduced the wires were run by the side of railways and high roads and other places where their breaking would not be a source of danger. Hence the telegraph engineer put his line up as lightly and cheaply as possible, and, to use a technical term, he introduced a very small factor of safety. It may here be as well to explain what a factor of safety means.

In any engineering work, say a bridge, the dimensions of the different parts are first calculated by means of tables of the strength of materials, so as to be strong enough to bear the maximum strain to which the work is to be put, and then the dimensions are increased so as to be 10, 20, or 50 per cent. stronger. And this percentage is called the factor of safety—generally from the survival of the old habit, overhead wires are designed with an extremely low factor safety. What is required to make overhead lines perfectly safe is for some responsible body, such as the Board of Trade or Board of Works, to have absolute control over all overhead wires erected in towns, and to issue from time to time regulations as to the proper factor of safety to be allowed, and proper inspection of the poles and other parts of the line liable to decay, and have some such power as that now exercised over the railways by the Board of Trade through their inspectors, so as to ensure all overhead lines being really safe.

The question of public convenience and individual inconvenience would perhaps call for more difficult and more complex legislation; but surely some simple machinery might be devised by which the proposed route of any new line should be laid before a responsible body, and, when approved, should be advertised, so that individual proprietors might raise any objections which they might have to the wire passing over their premises, which objections might be discussed before some cheap and simple tribunal. Perhaps this is the point which will be most strongly agitated by the general public. Here there is the obvious difficulty that it will be necessary to prevent a few ill conditioned householders from stopping or adding to the cost of a line really of public utility, and, on the other hand, to protect all householders against needless and vexatious trespass and injury to property. The present system—or, rather, no system—involving, as it does, the consent of the individual householder—which, it appears, is not always obtained—and the jurisdiction, or non-jurisdiction, whichever it may happen really to be, of the district surveyor, is absolutely intolerable.

We further think that any legislation on this subject should control both the Post Office Department and the private Companies, on the ground that, when it was decided that telephonic transmission was an infringement of the monopoly of the Postmaster-General, and when it was arranged between the private Companies and the Post Office Department that the Companies should be allowed to continue their operations under license from the Postmaster-General, the private Companies became really the agents of the Postmaster, and that, therefore, it would be invidious to place restrictions upon them which do not control the action of the Postal Telegraph Department.

However this matter is to be arranged in the future, there can be no doubt but that the whole subject bristles with difficulties, both for the Legislature and for engineers; but the time has now come when the public will no longer submit to the risk of decapitation, the annoyance of unauthorized persons putting up posts on the roofs of their houses, and too often making their leads the scene of free fights, and, which is by no means the least, or least dangerous, of these nuisances, the presence over their heads of rotten posts and wires for which, owing to the break up of some company, nobody can be held responsible.

THE CHOLERA IN EGYPT.

THE completion of Surgeon-General Hunter's third and final Report upon the late cholera epidemic in Egypt is an event of international interest and political importance. The question whether the disease is now and has been for some time past endemic in Egypt is one of deep significance, and demands to be set at rest; for, much as it may concern the mercantile interests of other countries, at present it powerfully affects those of our own, and has no slight bearing on the welfare of all British subjects in the East. The term "endemic" should be understood to mean "existing permanently among the people" rather than "peculiar to them"; for the first interpretation invalidates the false and mischievous argument that a disease originally imported cannot become endemic. The expression of a definite opinion on this point in Surgeon-General Hunter's Report is a special feature. This opinion amounts to a distinct avowal that cholera is and has been for some long period of time endemic in Egypt; and all that has led the author to such a conclusion is given at length.

Thus every one can form some judgment on the value of the evidence itself, as well as on the soundness of the deductions drawn from it. Impatient curiosity on the subject has already produced many authorities. One, a lady, was heard to say that she knew cholera was endemic in Egypt, because a friend had told her so; and at about the same time M. Fauvel was asking the Académie Française to believe that the disease was imported from India because he was the author of that assertion. Now up to the present time the world has been somewhat in the position of the lady and the Académie Française, and as a result the answer to a question of vital value has become one of personal fancy. The Report just laid before Her Majesty's Government should enable the practical part of this question to be set at rest, for it is comprehensive, intelligible, and capable of bearing careful scrutiny. To the cautious critic it suggests the following important questions:—

(1) Was Surgeon-General Hunter a suitable person to have been chosen for the inquiry?

(2) Were the methods by which he conducted that inquiry the best that could have been adopted?

(3) Is the evidence he has obtained trustworthy?

(4) Are the deductions he has drawn from it just?

The answer to the first query can be found without difficulty. A record of Dr. Hunter's services shows that the English Government, in their selection of him, appointed a delegate whose name had always been associated with honour and distinction.

The second question also allows of an answer in the affirmative, for it would be difficult to conceive any plans for finding out what he wished to know better than such as Dr. Hunter adopted. These consisted in making personal visits to numerous towns and villages, holding personal interviews with those who were in a position to give him information, and employing others, whom he specially selected, to make inquiries throughout the Delta and Upper Egypt.

Therefore it is upon the third point—namely, whether or no the evidence obtained is trustworthy—that the burden of discussion has to fall. Critic and judge must therefore weigh this evidence in a careful and impartial spirit—careful because the issue at stake is of the utmost importance; impartial because the question involves many personalities and reputations. This is a précis of the chief evidence that bears on the point Dr. Hunter wishes to establish—namely, the existence of cholera in Egypt for months and years previous to its epidemic activity at Damietta on the 22nd of June, 1883:—

(1) Two patients were admitted into the European hospital at Alexandria, one on the 5th of June, 1882, the other on the 17th of April, 1883. Their symptoms are fully reported, and are described as "choleriform"; Dr. Mackie and Surgeon-General Hunter, however, agree that those symptoms were typical ones of cholera.

(2) Four cases of cholera are reported by Dr. Mackie, all having occurred in his own practice. Two were in 1872, and the others in the summer of 1881.

(3) Dr. Kartoulis furnishes a suspicious case as having occurred in September 1881.

(4) Dr. Mamlouk mentions two cases, one of a suspicious character which had occurred in 1875, the other a typical case of cholera which he saw in 1879.

(5) Dr. de Castro states that in 1866 he observed several cases of cholera which he considered as a residue of the epidemic of the previous year. During the last seven years he has seen three cases, one having been previously attacked during the epidemic of 1865.

(6) Dr. Demech states that there was an outbreak of cholera in Upper Egypt which came from the Soudan through Dongola and Wady Halfa, reaching Korosko in November 1872. And he adds that since 1865 not a summer passed without his seeing one or two more or less severe cases of "cholera nostras," and that in 1866 he had two fatal cases in Europeans at Mansourah.

(7) Dr. Fouquet states that he attended a very grave case of "cholera nostras" in September 1881.

(8) Dr. Haddad, in a report dated September 1883, shows that choleraic attacks have been frequent at Assiout for years past, and that they account for one-third of the mortality among the people.

(9) M. Chevalier says:—"I think it will be admitted that there are some grounds for the belief that cholera has existed in Upper Egypt since 1872."

(10) Dr. Rabitsch reports a typical case of cholera which occurred in the summer of 1878 or 1879 at Cairo.

(11) Dr. Patterson affirms that from 1855 to 1868 he cannot recall a single year in which he did not see well-marked cases of cholera—conveniently classed under the head of "cholera nostras"—and that no one acquainted with the disease could doubt that cholera was endemic in Egypt. He also says that year after year there have been cholera panics, and not without reason, yet no one ever thought of attributing the cause to Asiatic or Indian origin.

(12) Surgeon-Major McNally shows that in the villages near Zagazig diarrhœa with vomiting existed since January 1883, and proved fatal to two hundred persons; that great mortality occurred at Chibin-el-Kom and at Benha prior to the outbreak at Damietta.

(13) Civil Surgeon Honman states that at Miniett-el-Samanoud and other villages there had been an epidemic of "diarrhœa" in May 1883, during which as many as four a day died out of a population of four thousand.

In addition to this evidence, which was collected in a few weeks, there are reports containing numerous other cases by Drs. Sonsino, Ambron, Sierra, and Dutrieux, all gentlemen of well-known position and ability.

So far, then, it seems to us that Dr. Hunter places the Government, to which his final Report is addressed, in this position: it must either accept the fact that a form of disease called by some cholera, by others "cholera nostras," choleriform, "cholerine," and diarrhœa, has existed in Egypt for years past, or it must admit that all men are liars. But Dr. Hunter reserves his bonne bouche until the end and then serves it up in a special paragraph, thus—"The next and last piece of evidence I have to bring forward is that obtained from an official enjoying a high position under the Egyptian Government, who told Sir Evelyn Baring—'We all know that cholera has been constant here and generally follows the cattle plague, but we are told to say nothing about it.'" Who was this high official? Who gave the order of silence? and who are the "we" to whom that order applied? These are questions which ought to be answered. We next turn to Dr. Hunter's remarks on the nomenclature of the disease. He says, "In India the term 'cholera' is only permitted to be used when speaking of a certain group of symptoms; when these are recognized the official return is 'cholera.'" "Choleraic diarrhœa has, for good and sufficient reasons, for some years past been struck out of the Returns. Were the same rule applied to Egypt in the registration of disease, much confusion would be avoided; and such terms as 'cholerine,' 'cholera nostras,' 'choleriform,' &c., applied to modified forms of cholera, would cease to exist. If the cases communicated in many of the attached documents be not cases of true cholera, but rather of cholerine and cholera nostras, then Bombay ought no longer to be regarded as the seat of endemic cholera, for the majority of the cases I have seen there during intervals of epidemic activity were cases of so-called 'cholerine,' 'cholera nostras,' &c., and they did not propagate themselves. These several forms of the disease differ in no essential particular, either clinically or pathologically, from one another, and therefore ought to be registered as cholera."

The above observations narrow the field of criticism; for, if it be admitted, as indeed it should be, that a something called "cholera nostras," "cholerine," "choleriform," or what not, exists throughout the Delta and Upper Egypt as an endemic disease, the only question left at issue is whether the proper name for that something is not cholera. Dr. Hunter says it is; and, if he is right, he is also right in asking the world to believe he has satisfactorily proved that cholera has existed in Egypt in an endemic form since the epidemic of 1865, and that the epidemic of 1883 was consequently the outcome of the disease which existed endemically in the country.

The main question may thus perhaps be reduced to a purely scientific one requiring for its solution clinical, pathological, and physiological knowledge and research. By way of complicating that solution, some will range themselves on Dr. Hunter's side, others will array themselves against him, and a pen-and-paper battle royal may be expected in which one half of the scientific world will probably contradict the other. In the meantime our Government is confronted by the fact that throughout Egypt there exists a malady which is declared by all to resemble cholera, and by many to be the disease in its endemic or modified form; that the whole country is in an unsanitary condition such as is most favourable for the conversion of an endemic scourge into an epidemic one, while the administrative powers of the country are unable to alter the state of affairs. In such circumstances a nation may well inquire what its Government is prepared to do. Will it wait until some scientific body presents it with a specimen of the cholera germ, which will stand in the relation of cause and effect instead of the reverse, or will it take what it can get—a series of effects resulting from an admitted unknown first cause? If it intends to wait, it will be adopting a very risky policy. Or will the Government act upon what it can get? If so, the sooner Dr. Hunter's suggestions are adopted the better.

THE PICTURE GALLERIES.

THE Reynolds exhibition at the Grosvenor Gallery is so important in every respect, historically and biographically, as well as artistically, that we are in danger of neglecting some of its competitors for the public favour. From the Grosvenor to the rooms of the Fine Art Society is but a step, but the effect on a visitor's mind of leaving an assemblage of figure pictures, the newest of which is a hundred years old, and entering a gallery full of landscapes, the oldest of which was painted barely thirty years ago, is by no means unpleasant, and almost a relief. Mr. Hunt's landscapes are of the highest quality which contemporary art can produce. But it is not possible in writing about them to find the interest there is in tracing the story of each of Sir Joshua's sitters, and in hunting through Boswell and Walpole for anecdotes. Besides the Reynoldses at the Grosvenor Gallery, there are others at the Royal Academy, and with them some Gainsboroughs and Romneys, which have all the same biographical interest. On the whole it will be best for us to take Mr. Hunt's pictures first, and then proceed to notice the Reynoldses at the Grosvenor and Academy which we have not already mentioned, and the pictures by other artists exhibited at Burlington House.

The biographical source of interest is imparted to the Hunt exhibition also by Mr. Gosse's notes. Mr. Gosse's style may be described as "epithetical." He likes calling names; and he calls Mr. Hunt some very pretty names indeed, "in epithetic measured prose." There is always a touch of ungracefulness in writing the biography of a living personage, and all the more if he happens to be your friend. But Mr. Gosse understands his business too well to let his notice be in the least more ungraceful than such a notice must be; and there are circumstances in Mr. Hunt's career well calculated to call forth the best powers of his biographer. Mr. Hunt went to Oxford with a scholarship, and won the Newdigate in 1851 with a poem on "Nineveh." It does not follow from winning the Newdigate that a man is to be called a poet. Far from it. But no one can look at these pictures and fail to see poetry in them all, and still more what Mr. Gosse calls "imaginative refinement," a "mastery over evanescent impressions of form and aerial colour," and a "poetical delicacy of composition." Mr. Hunt is the "sole living representative," we are told, "of the Turner tradition," but while his work wants the vigour of Turner, it has two qualities of its own which enable it to stand well by itself, even in so trying a comparison as this which Mr. Gosse institutes. Mr. Hunt is more faithful to nature than Turner was, and he is more delicate. He composes without violating truth. Any one who has visited Whitby or Durham, or even the Welsh valleys with impossible names, will recognize them at once through the sunny haze, or the evening glow, or the dashing shower. "Few painters," says Mr. Hamerton, "have impressed upon me the necessity for delicacy in water-colours so strongly"; and he goes on to remark that "the poetry of distance, which this distinguished artist has so often conveyed to those who are capable of feeling it, is dependent upon distinctions between pale tones incomparably finer than the recognized differences in musical notation, and resembling rather those faint, indescribable sounds of murmuring wind or water which come to us from afar." Mr. Hunt's oil pictures are wonderfully little known outside the circle of those who watch for them year by year at the exhibition of the Royal Academy. Turner never allowed his work to be killed by its neighbours. But Mr. Hunt is meeker than his master, and his one or two modest landscapes are often overlooked. When we visit the Fine Art Society's rooms, however, we recognize some old friends, and feel sure we shall never neglect them again. "Debatable Land" (108), painted in 1863, has never, we believe, been exhibited before, and will, from its breadth and grandeur, as well as its "delicacy," as aforesaid, be remembered as the chief feature of the present collection. It represents a favourite view with Mr. Hunt, that of Harlech Castle, and is a magnificent work in every way—as careful as a Brett, as gorgeous as a Palmer, and with a poetry of distance and atmosphere Mr. Hunt's own. Some people seem to prefer two views of Whitby—the morning effect (133), showing the harbour at sunrise, with its fishing-boats and sea over which the mist is clearing; and the evening effect (136), with the glowing cliff and the Abbey, and the crowd of tombstones.

It would be too easy to linger over Mr. Hunt's water-colours; but landscapes bear very little description. We can promise the visitor that he will not come away disappointed. There are wonderful rainbows in "Ben Slioch" (16) and "Dolwyddelan Valley" (58); but, on the whole, some of the quieter views—such as "Rokeby" (17) and "Ullswater" (27)—will be generally preferred. Two wooded scenes (98, 99) remind us rather of David Cox than of Turner; and Styehead Pass, with its grand cloud effect, is not like anything but nature. Some of the landscapes—as, for instance, the "Mountain Joyous with Leaves and Streams" (129) and "Summer Days for Me" (126)—are in Mr. Hunt's best manner, and wholly original.

Reynolds's one landscape, the "View from Richmond Hill" (165), is lent by Lord Northbrook to the Grosvenor Gallery, and many people will be forced to institute a comparison between it and the two splendid landscapes by Rubens in the Royal Academy. The juxtaposition of these two works is most happy. The first "Atalanta and Meleager" (70), is from Mr. Beaumont's collection. The Calydonian boar is pursued through a tangled thicket, into which the warm sunlight penetrates here and there. The picture is, in the first instance, a landscape, the figures being wholly subordinated. This is not the case with the "Farm at Lacken" (74), lent by the Queen, where the busy milking scene reminds us rather of a Bewick woodcut than anything else. Two finely-coloured damsels occupy the foreground. The cattle are in the middle, a man watering horses to the right, and quite in the background are the farmhouse, the village church, and the green hills. Of a totally different character are the tame, but sweet, poetical landscapes of Richard Wilson, of which the Academy has been fortunate enough to gather no fewer than eight examples, and every one will remark how well they hold their own with the Claudes, of which, however, there are only three examples. The finest of these is Mr. Beaumont's picture (167), briefly described last week, but the smaller, "Flight into Egypt" (162), lent by Lord Mount Temple, has much depth and beauty, while the "Seaport" (172), from the same collection, is of the ordinary type, very delicate and sweet, but not striking.

The Italian pictures at the Academy this winter are a treat for the student, but are not of a character to attract the public in general. There is a room almost entirely devoted to early Italian art, as well as one filled with Dutch pictures, none of which, besides those already mentioned, call for any special notice, being, in fact, for the most part of a highly uninteresting character. The Italian pictures are very curious, though it must be confessed that they are scarcely decorative, viewed as a whole. Among them a very much dilapidated series of portraits, lent by Mr. Willett, are very conspicuous, being no fewer than twelve in number. They formed, when discovered, the frieze of a chamber in a palace near Mantua, and certainly belong to the school of Mantegna, though almost equally certainly not to the great Andrea himself. An exquisitely finished, but highly unpleasant picture, is a "Head of St. John on a Charger" (269). It is evidently painted from a newly-decapitated subject, and but for the delicate gradations of tone, somewhat resembling what Bellini attained, and for an attempt to idealize the head by placing a faint halo, like a lunar rainbow, round it, this picture would be too repulsive even for study. The number of anonymous and unattributed pictures in this department of the present exhibition is so large as to have provoked an unusual amount of guessing on the part of critics, and, coupled with the fact that many of those which have names assigned to them are manifestly unauthentic, makes the Fourth Gallery very interesting, and, as a dealer would say, "speculative," but hardly worth prolonged notice outside the Catalogue, which, by the way, should be praised as a very careful and scholarly production. Before leaving this room, however, we should call attention to a very small Van Eyck, "Virgin and Child" (267), which is lent by Mr. Weld Blundell. It evidently represents a room in the house of John Arnolfini, whose portrait is in the National Gallery—a house which was only pulled down a few years ago by the Municipality of Bruges. The whole painting measures only ten inches by eight, and is rather like an illumination than a picture, but is, as usual with Van Eyck, fully harmonized and highly finished, but without servility. It is also in wholly unsophisticated condition; and, take it altogether, is, for its size, one of the most pleasing and beautiful works in the exhibition.

The famous portrait of Mrs. Sheridan as "St. Cecilia" (209), by Reynolds, in the Great Gallery, has been so over-praised that one approaches it with diffidence. The right-angled nature of the composition, the heaviness and duskiness of the shadows, the want of anatomical definiteness in the face and hands, are disappointing, as is the total absence of colour. The picture might be a mezzotint instead of an oil painting, and has either faded of late years, or else never possessed any lifelike warmth. At the same time it would be absurd to deny it the characteristics of beauty, sentiment, and grace, as well as of historically interesting association. Romney's "Lady Hamilton as a Bacchante" (212) hangs close by and is a very pleasing picture, and should be compared with the same artist's "Mrs. Jordan" (200). Both are conspicuous for the beauty of the faces and the unsubstantial character of the forms. They contrast unfavourably with Vandyck's "Henrietta Maria" (194) and Lely's "Eleanor, Lady Byron" (181), which are examples to show that grace and delicacy are not incompatible with solidity and anatomical completeness. A very theatrical and affected "Viscountess Crosbie" (148), a very dignified and soberly-coloured "Colonel St. Leger" (149), both by Sir Joshua, are hung at the end of the room, with two fine Gainsboroughs, "George IV., as Prince of Wales" (151), and "Mrs. Douglas" (152), and a great sprawling "Apotheosis" (150), by Rubens (a ceiling from Osterley), between them. The immense size of this canvas only brings out its faults more conspicuously.

There are many other pictures, both here and at the Grosvenor Gallery, over which it would be easy to linger. Among them we may specially mention the beautiful, if somewhat conventional, "Schoolboy" at the Grosvenor (192), which is well known by engravers; an unfinished "Marquis of Rockingham and his Secretary, Edmund Burke" (197), which would have proved, had it been carried out, one of Sir Joshua's masterpieces, and a very solid and ugly "Edward Gibbon" (59) in the Academy.

LOW WATER.

IT is a pity that Mr. Pinero's energetic protest against the production of Low Water at the Globe was not made public before its presentation. For, however fortuitous the verdict of a theatrical audience may be in these days of extreme toleration the faults of this play are too palpable to make its success probable to the most sanguine. If ever we are to have attached to the national dramatic college of the future a school of training for young playwrights, a useful feature of such an institution would be a stage of experiment, where Low Water might be given as an example of How not to do it. Salutary the example would prove; profitable, beyond doubt, as a deterrent. Mr. Pinero has expressed the hope that Low Water may be speedily forgotten; but, with a little inconsistency, promises to present it some day in another manner—a singular device to ensure its oblivion. It is as if, like the Ancient Mariner, having "penance done," he "penance more will do." We sincerely hope this may not be; but, although the recollection of suffering may be as fugitive as that of pleasure, the theatrical public is not much changed from what it was in Garrick's time, and forgives more than it forgets.

The leading motive of Mr. Pinero's play is highly susceptible of dramatic treatment, and is not of such a kind as to be alien to the spirit of comedy, despite its strong element of pathos. A favourite and petted daughter is seduced from her father's home by a wealthy scoundrel and is forsaken by him. In the meanwhile the father is ruined, and lives with his remaining daughter and son in the retirement of the Waterloo Road, all three finding occupation in a neighbouring theatre. The father believes his runaway daughter to be married, and is supported in his fond credulity by his son and daughter, who dare not tell him the truth. To their poor lodgings the erring child returns and is welcomed by her sister: the man she loves has also appeared, offers reparation to the sister in the shape of money, which is, of course, indignantly repelled; meets with a severe accident, and is nursed through subsequent illness by the woman he has wronged. In the final act all the persons of the drama meet at the chambers of the invalid in a most inexplicable manner; the truth is revealed to the agonized father through the agency of a legal person, but his grief is turned into joy at the last moment by the entrance of his daughter and the repentant invalid as man and wife, accompanied by the clergyman, doctor, and witnesses. It is clear that the failure of Low Water to move the audience to any other emotion than derisive laughter is due not to the solemn pathos of the subject but to the author's treatment of the pathetic. To move to laughter is not the chief, or indeed a necessary, end in comedy. The writer of farce may with propriety evoke the figure of Laughter holding both his sides; mirth is complex in expression, and the spirit of buffoonery is uncongenial to the muse of Comedy. Mr. Pinero seems to have forgotten that the ludicrous in art may as easily give offence as provoke laughter; certainly in the present instance he constantly outrages nature and truth. Throughout the play we have a violent alternation of pathos and farce, mutually destructive, and the wanton introduction of the grossest absurdities, to the degradation of those scenes where the purest pathos is paramount. Indifferent to the finer feelings, careless of imperilling the dignity of his subject, the author has determined to raise a laugh, even in his own despite or at the expense of his own creations and the humiliation of their impersonators. The spirited scenes where the offer of reparation is made, through Mr. Vereker, Q.C., to Linklater's daughter, and the pathetic meeting of the two sisters, are both rendered abortive by the unseemly intrusion of farce. In the former the dialogue is interrupted by the entrance of a man with a small sack of coal, with which he advances to a settee, occupied by Mr. Vereker, which turns out, to his surprise and that of the audience, to be an improvised coal-cellar. The transformation is effected in the true spirit of pantomime; the ludicrous result is ineffaceable, the dignity and spirit of "the Major" (Linklater's daughter), and the dry humour and imperturbable politeness of Mr. Vereker, are rendered ineffective by this happy invention. It is unnecessary to specify other instances of perverse ingenuity, for in the whole "comedy" the spirit of wanton and puerile aggression runs riot.

It is difficult to criticize the representation, still more difficult not to commiserate the actors in their thankless task. Congruous construction in competent hands invariably produces harmonious representation, and it is not surprising that in the final scene some of the Globe company displayed no effort to conceal their sympathy with the attitude of the audience. The knowledge that their endeavours were wasted, and that the more excellent their acting the more they confounded truth and libelled nature, the long-continued strain of their false position, the certainty that their passion and pathos must submit to some maladroit buffoonery, were all sufficient to try them to the uttermost. Mr. Cartwright, as Lord George Ormolu, and Mr. Carton, who represented the shrewd and cynical Mr. Vereker, were less subjected to the unpleasant influence of which we have spoken. The former endowed his part with all the nature and consistency possible under the circumstances. Mr. Carton's impersonation of the Q.C., a type new to the stage, was distinguished by its truth and finish and refinement; the contrast between the keen cynicism of his speech and the urbane grace of his manner was excellently maintained. Indeed, despite its unhappy vehicle, this striking piece of acting marks another advance in the young actor's career. Mr. J. F. Young, as Mr. Linklater, and Miss Abington, as his truant daughter Rosamond, had to bear the brunt of the ridiculous situations in which the author has seen fit to place his characters. The very excellence of their performance enhanced the absurdity of their position; the sorrows of the one, the penitence and self-devotion of the other, were displayed with real force and natural feeling, to be inevitably nullified by the pitiless destiny of the drama.

THE REAWAKENING OF SPECULATION.

THE number and frequency of colonial loans now coming out, and the success that has attended those of them already issued, are attracting much attention in the City. That the New South Wales loan should be readily subscribed was a matter of course. The colony has vast resources, and the Government has been sparing in the use of its credit. But the high prices at which the Cape Colony and New Zealand loans have been taken have excited some surprise. Respecting the financial position of New Zealand we spoke at length last week, and we need only say of the Cape Colony that its political difficulties are not small, especially because of the large native population subject to its jurisdiction. Nevertheless the Cape loan was allotted at a price 4*s.* above the minimum fixed by the Colonial Government itself; while the New Zealand loan fetched nearly 2*l.* more than the minimum fixed by the New Zealand Government; and both loans have since been quoted much higher on the Stock Exchange. The Cape loan this week has been at a premium of 4 per cent., and the New Zealand loan at ½ premium. It is evident from all this that a disposition to speculate is once more revealing itself on the Stock Exchange. And that it is so further appears from the rise in Egyptian bonds and other foreign stocks when the late Egyptian Ministry resigned. As the resignation was caused by the interference of the British Government, it was assumed that a British protectorate was about to be established, and prices rose very considerably. If English Ministers had been appointed, prices would have gone up still higher; indeed, there would probably have been an active speculation not only in Egyptian but in most foreign stocks. This disposition on the part of those who transact business on the Stock Exchange is in striking contrast with that which has prevailed for two years past. The great fall in prices consequent upon the panic on the Paris Bourse, the mutiny of the Egyptian army, and the collapse of the railway mania in the United States, has inflicted very serious losses upon speculators and upon such investors as have been compelled to sell, or have required to borrow upon the security of the bonds and shares they hold. In consequence there has been a great falling off in business on the Stock Exchange. It is estimated by stockbrokers who do an investment business proper that their commissions last year were only about two-thirds of those of an average year. And brokers whose business is principally speculative suffered still more heavily. It is in accordance with experience that after so long a depression there should be a revival. In the worst of years there are large savings accumulated in this country, and investors therefore have considerable sums which they wish to place in some good security. Owing to the agricultural depression, and to the too-rapid building of houses in most of the great towns, there is little desire to buy land or houses, or to advance money on mortgage on either kind of property. Foreign stocks are out of favour because of the political condition of the Continent and of Egypt, while American railway securities are discredited because of the mismanagement by presidents and the generally unsettled condition of railway business in the United States. At home, again, Consols and railway securities are very dear. Thus investors are almost driven to buy Colonial Government securities. At this season of the year the sums available for investment are exceptionally large. It is estimated that during the first fortnight in January the dividends payable in London alone amount to about 30 millions sterling, and of this large sum the greater part probably is reinvested. The Colonial Governments, then, have chosen an opportune moment for appealing to the money market. And in this fact is to a large extent an explanation of the high prices they have obtained for their bonds. The average price paid for the Cape loan was 98*l.* 4*s.*; and as the loan bore 5 per cent. interest, the purchaser obtained somewhat more than 5 per cent. for his money. As the Cape Colony is an English community, with English laws and institutions, and subject to a certain extent to the control of the Imperial Government, it is assumed by investors that failure to pay the interest is not to be feared. Somehow or other, they vaguely reason, the Imperial Government would help it out of its difficulties, even were political or other embarrassments to involve it very seriously at any time. In the case of the New Zealand loan the interest was only 4 per cent., and the price obtained was about 2*l.* higher than that given for the Cape loan. But besides the English constitution of the colony, and the good faith it has always kept with its creditors, the fact that the loan was brought out by the Bank of England was greatly in its favour. The Bank is the Imperial Government's banker, a consideration that has its weight with investors not skilled in politics. And those of them who know that the Bank, nevertheless, is not a State bank but a trading company took it for granted that so great an institution would not invite the public to subscribe to the loan if it had not satisfied itself of the soundness of New Zealand finance. Not a few of those who applied for the scrip were decided by the sponsorship of the Bank of England. Speculators of course, were well aware of all the circumstances that tell in favour of the success of these colonial issues, and they sent in applications for the loans, thus increasing the competition, and forcing up the prices. And, as already stated, they have still further raised prices since the allotments.

The particular causes acting upon the market for colonial Government securities are aided by more general influences. It is now two years since the panic on the Paris Bourse, and during that time there has been going on a slow liquidation of the bad business accumulated during the preceding period of inflation. The great financial houses of Paris, in their anxiety to cut short the panic, made immense loans to the speculators to prevent too many failures, and by so doing they to a great extent hampered themselves. They hoped, of course, that a little while would bring about a rise of prices, and that their debtors would then be able to sell without serious loss, and that the market would once more right itself. But political causes of disquietude disappointed them. The finances of the country fell into disorder; the Government plunged into a disturbing colonial policy, which threatened to bring about quarrels with several of the neighbouring States; the Austro-German alliance attracted to itself Italy and Spain, isolating France, and surrounding her with a ring of suspicious, if not hostile, Powers, able at any moment to humiliate her. The revolt of Arabi in Egypt, too, led to the loss of her influence in that country. And, lastly, anarchist movements began to reappear. All these events tended to alarm speculators and investors alike, and led to a continued fall of prices. Each successive fall caused additional losses, and every new loss induced a further fall. It is believed, however, now that the speculators, who were unable to meet their obligations two years ago, and were enabled to hold on only by assistance from the great financial houses, have been got rid of. The selling by these speculators has been on an enormous scale, and has been continued for two years almost without intermission. The result is that the losses by French speculators have been immense. The speculators who now remain with large masses of stock upon their hands are thought really to have means to hold on as long as may be necessary. In consequence, those who are interested in the market feel their position much safer than it has been during the past twenty-four months. They think that, if a rise of prices were to take place, the movement would not be stopped by renewed selling on the part of those who are practically bankrupt. And they are eager, therefore, that the rise should occur, as it would enable themselves to sell without loss, and in such a gradual and careful manner as would not check the upward course of the market. In addition to this, it is to be borne in mind that the Government is about to bring out a loan. For two years it has required money, but the condition of the Bourse forbade it to issue a public loan. The Government is, therefore, anxious in its own interest to see an advance in prices. The French Government influences the money market and the stock market much more directly than our Government does, and all the great capitalists who are amenable to its influence are eager to second its efforts in bringing about greater confidence in the financial situation. Lastly, the great Railway Companies are preparing to issue loans. Last year they entered into conventions with the Government, undertaking to build the new lines which the Government found itself unable to construct. They can fulfil the obligations then contracted only by means of loans; and, unless the money market is inspired with confidence, these loans can hardly succeed, or must be made on terms extremely disadvantageous to the great Railway Companies. But the great Railway Companies in France are themselves a great power in the money market. They make loans and discount bills more like bankers than English Railway Companies; and the result is that, when they join their exertions to those of the great capitalists and of the Government, they are able to affect prices very powerfully. For all these reasons there has been a marked change in the Paris Bourse during the past few weeks. Political causes may, of course, neutralize the efforts made to raise prices. But, if there should be no disaster in Tonquin, and if the political condition of the Continent should not again inspire apprehensions, the probability seems to be that the recovery in the Paris Bourse which has already begun will go on steadily. The greater confidence felt in Paris immediately reacts upon the London market. London and Paris are so closely united, and the interests of both are entwined in so many ways, that whatever strongly affects one also acts powerfully upon the other. Brokers and dealers on the Stock Exchange, and bankers here in London, learn through their correspondents that the prospect of things in Paris has greatly improved. They are thereby encouraged themselves, and they encourage their clients by the reports they give.

In New York, likewise, there is a prospect of recovery. In 1882 over 12,000 miles of railway were built in the United States. Last year the mileage constructed was only half as large. And in the current year it is estimated that less than 2,000 miles will be built, and that no new line of any kind will be undertaken, the mileage now under construction being merely completion of work already far advanced. The difficulties originating in the over-construction of railways will, therefore, not be augmented. Time has been given for the liquidation of much of the bad business of past years, and the growth of population and wealth are making up for the losses that have been incurred. Moreover, it would appear that the failures of which we now hear, and the appointment of receivers over Railway Companies and Construction Companies, are really the winding-up of the period of depression through which the United States have passed. The older Railway Companies, which have immense capitals and almost inexhaustible resources, and which were threatened with competition by the new Companies, have been endeavouring for the past couple of years to ruin the latter. In some cases apparently they have now succeeded. They will, therefore, buy up these bankrupt concerns, add them to their own systems, and put a stop to the manœuvres which were disturbing the market and injuring trade. Where, on the other hand, the new Companies have displayed greater strength than was anticipated, the old and the new will come to some kind of terms. They will divide the traffic between them, and both will have an interest in improving matters. It would seem, therefore, that after about two and a half years the difficulties in the United States caused by the over-construction of railways are drawing to an end, and that a considerable rise of prices in American railway securities may be soon expected. That, at any rate, is the opinion of those who have the best means of judging, and who have watched most intently the course of events in the United States. And the opinion thus formed is permeating the Stock Exchange, and is helping to produce that change of feeling which was exemplified in the success of the colonial loans and the rise in Egyptian, Turkish, and other securities at the time of the change of Ministry in Egypt.

EARLY TEUTONIC LAND-HOLDING.*

DURING the last half-century the labour and research of several scholars, chiefly in Germany, has worked out from a mass of scattered materials a fairly consistent account of the early history of landed property among the Teutonic stock of mankind. This account has gained very general acceptance among competent persons. It has received striking illustration and confirmation from observations made in a remote country, and for entirely different purposes, but minutely and systematically, by persons who knew nothing of the researches in question. We allude to the facts of Indian society which Sir Henry Maine, in his work on Village Communities, has exhibited side by side with the results of European inquirers. To that work, also, the English reader may most conveniently be referred for general knowledge of what the European results are. We may here say briefly that the accepted exposition shows a convergence of evidence to the conclusion that private property in land, as we understand it, is a relatively modern institution. Many points of usage and law which are found not only in the records of the earlier middle ages, but in the fully developed mediæval system, and even until our own time, seem to come down from a period when absolute ownership was an exception or innovation, and limited rights of use and enjoyment by the members of free communities under some scheme of communal regulation were the ancient and accustomed rule. Such is the doctrine which may be fairly described as in possession. To say this is not to say that it is exempt from criticism, but, on the contrary, that criticism is desirable. Theories in possession ought to be periodically tested by revision and re-examination of their evidences, accompanied of course by collation of the newer evidence, if such has meanwhile been found, on pain of losing their vitality. The fate of a theory left untested is to become a dry bone for letter-worshippers to wrangle over, and sciolists to make a pretence of learning with. Now in this case the theory represented by the names of Von Maurer in Germany and Kemble in England has been in possession for the space of about a generation. It has reached the stage of being popularized—a stage that rouses the attention of scholars and invites vigilance. In England, at any rate, much new material has come to hand, and there is promise of more. The time appears ripe for critical revision. And criticism is welcome on one condition, that it be competent and intelligent. If it be so, whether we agree with it or not is no great matter. Its function is not so much to correct specific conclusions as to keep thought fresh.

Within a short time two English books have been published, one on the English evidences of the village community, the other on the German; the former in part of a critical kind, the latter wholly. These are Mr. Seebohm's English Village Community and Mr. Denman W. Ross's Early History of Land-holding among the Germans. They proceed to some extent on similar lines, and Mr. Seebohm appears to have been to some extent impressed by communications of Mr. Ross's views. It is these last which now call for our attention. Mr. Denman Ross professes, and with sufficient frankness, to criticize the doctrine commonly received. Is he a competent and intelligent critic? We find ourselves constrained to pronounce, and that with no uncertain sound, that he is neither.

It is the more needful to speak plainly because Mr. Ross's work is, at first sight, by no means without a plausible air of being of the right and acceptable kind. The tone and promises of his preface are free from offence; and an unnecessary quotation from Balzac is pardonable in an essay-writer who, for the very reason that his work is on a subject of unfamiliar learning, is anxious to give it a stamp of literary form. The appendix of notes and references, which in bulk exceeds the text by many pages, makes a goodly show of citations from original authorities. In short, the book is got up with a look of solid work. But, assuming for a moment that Mr. Denman Ross is our first introducer to the subject (a misfortune that we trust may never befall any innocent reader), we shall soon find suspicious tokens. The author's object is nothing less than to overturn the received opinion as to the history of property. One would expect a young author setting about such an enterprise to observe a certain measure of gravity and modesty. The manner in which he does speak is this:—

> There is no evidence of community of land in the statements of Cæsar.... There is no evidence of community of land in the statements of Tacitus.

And thus in the notes:—

> We hear a good deal of talk about a tribal system which existed among the Germans up to the time of Cæsar and Tacitus. It may be that a tribal system did exist up to that time; but what do we know about it? Nothing, of course. Why talk about it, then?

We should, for our own poor part, submit that we know at least what Cæsar and Tacitus tell us. But Mr. Denman Ross has his short ways with Cæsar and Tacitus and their language, as we shall see anon. Meanwhile, there are yet braver words to be noted. Mr. Ross, having described the received doctrine as "a theory of primitive communism" (a description to which we might take exception if it were worth the pains), proceeds thus to state his own:—

> We hold a theory which is quite the reverse of this. We believe that private property existed first; that common property came into existence afterwards, in consequence of an entanglement of individual rights and gradual annihilation of them; and this theory is, we believe, supported by the concurrent testimony of the early records. From these it is evident that the principle of individual property was dominant everywhere. Those who hold to the theory of primitive communism cannot have read these records with sufficient care, if, indeed, they have read them at all.

This is no light thing to say, and said of no obscure men. Mr. Ross names no names. But there can be no doubt what and whom he means. To read historical records without sufficient care is incompetence. To profess to give an account of their contents, and offer general conclusions purporting to be based thereon, without having read them at all, is bad faith. Von Maurer, and all who agree with him, stand therefore charged with bad faith, or incompetence, or both, by Mr. Denman Ross. When such a charge is made by a qualified person and on probable cause, it is a very grave matter. When it is made by a person not qualified, and without reasonable or probable cause, it is a gross and unpardonable impertinence. It becomes needful to see what are Mr. Denman Ross's qualifications as exhibited by himself. And what we find is this: Mr. Ross's Latin will not bear examination, and his state of mind as to the most elementary legal notions can be described only as ludicrous ignorance. First, as to the Latin. Tacitus says of the German occupation of land as he knew it, "Facilitatem partiendi camporum spatia præstant"; that is, to give the sense roughly, there is no trouble in setting out allotments when there is plenty of open ground to choose from. Mr. Denman Ross interprets thus:—"The land upon which the lots had been marked off was, therefore, divided into sections—what Tacitus calls spatia camporum." And he adds in a note, "This interpretation will perhaps surprise the reader." Before he has taken the measure of Mr. Denman Ross's general capacity, yes; afterwards, no. "The words used by Tacitus bear the interpretation." They do not. Whatever Mr. Denman Ross may think, the Latin language will not suffer it, and no tolerable Latin scholar could have produced such a rendering. Our surprise is less when Mr. Ross also maintains that Cæsar's words, "privati ac separati agri apud eos nihil est," do not exclude the existence, and indeed prevalence, of private estates. Mr. Ross triumphantly observes in another note that the Germans of Cæsar's time "had possessions, as Cæsar himself tells us." Yes; the word is possessionibus, a word which Cæsar, knowing his own language and his own law, doubtless used for the very purpose of distinguishing possession from full ownership or dominium, with which Mr. Ross confounds it himself, and wants to make Cæsar confound it too.

This brings us to Mr. Ross's law. His conception of dominium, or ownership in the full meaning, is extensive. It includes not only possession but servitude; in plainer terms, Mr. Denman Ross does not know the difference between ownership and an easement, between property and jura in re aliena. This, in a writer who undertakes to reconstruct the history of property, may seem incredible. But here are the proofs:—

> We read, in the Burgundian law, that the possession or ownership of the roads in which wagons and carts were wont to pass could be lost or acquired by occupation during two years.
> We read in the Burgundian law that the ownership of a running stream could be acquired by an exclusive enjoyment during two years, so that the previous owner could have no further right in it.

The passages cited as authority are these:—

> Viam in actum, hoc est, ubi carpenta vel carra ducuntur, similiter biennio amitti et adquiri posse.
> Aquæ cursum et adquiri et amitti biennio constat.

It is almost insulting our reader's intelligence to remind him that via and aquæ cursus have nothing to do with ownership of the road and the stream. They are respectively the right of way and the right of leading water over a neighbour's land—rights available against the owner of the soil of the road or the adjacent land through and over which the stream is led. Mr. Ross evidently imagines, moreover, that the words amitti et adquiri refer to one and the same process; but we cannot go on exposing blunders patent to any student who has ever been grounded in the Institutes. As if to clinch his blunder, Mr. Ross in another note mixes up the formula "cum aquis aquarumve decursibus," a conveyance of the easement of watercourses in "general words" as English lawyers call them, with such a phrase as "potestative manu possidere usque ad medium Hrenum," which does refer to ownership—namely, the ownership of the bed of the river vested in the riparian owner usque ad medium filum, as we commonly say.

And this is the author who goes about to look down on his predecessors as bunglers who could not or would not read their documents. Truly, it may well be that the work of such as Von Maurer needs revision and adjustment, more or less; but at the hands of such as are worthy to touch it, who are at least passable Latinists, and know so much of law as to have heard of a servitude. Whence the next fruitful impulse may come we know not. It is enough to be assured that it will not be from Mr. Denman Ross, or after his fashion:—

> οὐκ οἶδα μὰ Δί' ἔγωγε· τῆδε μὲν γὰρ οὔ.

Mr. Ross tells us he has spent seven years in study of the original authorities. If so, he has spent them very ill. His want of previous elementary training has made his labour worse than idleness. He is like a man who, not knowing the rudiments of mechanics or construction, should spend seven years in a builder's yard, and then come out of it with a new theory of architecture. But, as a modern poet says,

> Und baute der Spatz ein Adlernest,
> Er legt' nur Spatzeneier hinein.

The samples of Mr. Ross's work above given are enough to show that it is not worth criticizing in detail. If we undertook that task, it would be embarrassing by superabundance of material. We shall only point out in brief the general line of his errors. He starts with a radical misconception of the nature of the problem, which he treats as if the question were between communal and individual property; whereas the position of the doctrine attacked by Mr. Denman Ross is not that land was the property of tribes or communities, but rather that the modern conception of property in land was of slow growth, and that the term, as we use it, is not applicable to the state of things revealed or hinted by the authorities. So much Mr. Ross might have learnt from an English writer who figures among his pretentious list of references—a writer of works which did not profess to confute all predecessors, and did contain much good sense and excellent learning (neither was he ashamed to learn to the last); we mean the late Mr. Joshua Williams. The same thing holds good to this day in an undivided Hindu family. Again, Mr. Ross, having thoroughly mixed up the notions of dominion, possession, enjoyment, and servitude, is unable to discriminate the bearings of his authorities. Of these a certain number show, no doubt, that some private property did exist from very early times in land, especially land reclaimed by a man's own labour—a thing which nobody denies that we know of. Assuredly Von Maurer does not. Another class of authorities may charitably be deemed ambiguous. A third, and these are the critical ones, are in flat opposition to Mr. Denman Ross's fancies. His general method has the merit of simplicity. Being incapable of conceiving that a legal right which is something different from absolute property should be an object of inheritance, partition, or the like, whenever he meets with evidence of any right whatever being so dealt with he sets it down as a clear instance of separate ownership of the land itself. Mr. Joshua Williams has a useful chapter on incorporeal hereditaments. When Mr. Ross comes to an obviously refractory document like the Edict of Chilperic, or the title "De Migrantibus" of the Salic Law, his attempts to wrest it to his own sense are merely pitiable. Whether his airy rashness disports itself in superficial assertions about Hindu villages, or the Russian mir, or modern authors who are alleged to support Mr. Ross's contention and do no such thing, the like levity and fundamental ignorance appear throughout. And with this let enough be said of one of the worst attempts to pass off impertinence for scholarship that we have seen this many a day.

We hope hereafter to return to this subject, unencumbered by the need of exposing absurdities, but to the English side of it rather than the German. Each nation will have plenty to do for some time to come in attending to its own matters of this kind—not excluding, of course, the use of others for comparison, but still putting its own first.

BOOKS which have a definite ambition to rank as literature are somewhat rare nowadays—a statement which is by no means identical with the much more contestable statement that writers who would like to rank as men of letters are rare. Among these books The New Lucian certainly has a place, and it is a place in a particular department of literature which has never been very full, though it contains some of the best work anywhere to be found. If Mr. Traill can win his spurs he must win them in a tournament with Plato, with Lucian himself, with Erasmus, with St. Evremond, with Berkeley, with Landor, while, despite the difference of outward form, Pascal and Courier and Swift are likely to be present to the minds of the judges if not in the actual lists. This is a mighty "concurrence," and a blank shield which enters therefor is much more likely to go home with its owner upon it than in any other fashion. To the general spectator Mr. Traill's shield is very likely to be blank, for with the exception of his remarkable Recaptured Rhymes and his monograph on Sterne, most of his work has been done under the coat of darkness of the anonymous journalist. There are, however, no coats whose darkness is absolutely impenetrable, and Mr. Traill is sufficiently well known to those who do know as one of the most accomplished among those English journalists—never a very large body—who combine literary knowledge with political aptitude, and both with a faculty of writing. He is, before all things, a politician, and, as happens to almost all politicians whose politics are a matter of choice rather than of accident, his creed is not exactly identical with any that is commonly received. The nearest formula that we can find for Mr. Traill is the formula of unorthodox Toryism. Yet even under this formula he is a kind of species by himself. Mr. Traill differs from the two great unorthodox Tories of the past in England—Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Bolingbroke—in so much as he is entirely anti-Democratic. He agrees with Bolingbroke at least in that he seems to be, if he is not, anti-ecclesiastical, not to say anti-religious. And he has a further differentia in that, to judge by this no less than by former published utterances of his, he dislikes Lord Beaconsfield's foreign policy. With one exception to be noted later, the severest criticism in the book which can be fairly taken as expressing the author's sentiments is the criticism put in the mouth of Sir Robert Peel on Lord Beaconsfield's second Premiership. Thus Mr. Traill is doubly unorthodox. He is a kind of "Desdichado Doblado" as far as the direct intellectual succession of Toryism goes. A Church dominant at home and a State dominant abroad may be said to be the shibboleth of modern Toryism which is not mere Conservatism. We do not think that Mr. Traill can shape his mouth to pronounce it. He certainly does not here attempt so to shape the mouth of any of his characters.

There are fourteen dialogues of the dead in the present volume, and all of them are timed so as to be actually or nearly contemporary in subject. In passing we may note that though this arrangement might give the separate papers more "bite" as magazine articles, and may even for a short time render the book itself more attractive, it has induced Mr. Traill to be lavish of allusions in a fashion rather perilous to the chance of his book living. Personally we should not dare to edit it for the use of the twenty-first century, let alone a remoter posterity, without, on an average, a page of footnotes to each page of text, and it is not the experience of students that work of this sort is in the particular kind lasting work. This, however, is by the bye. The first interlocutors are Lord Westbury and the late Bishop of Oxford. In this dialogue, whether owing to the above-noted anti-theological prejudice or not, Mr. Traill has scarcely given swords of the very equal length which students of their debates in life would assign to the two disputants. Save for a smart capping in the citation of an Article and one or two other things, Bishop Wilberforce's repartees are scarcely those of the Samuel whom we know. On the other hand, Lord Westbury is well provided, and his jokes help out the apparent drift of the dialogue (which is in the direction of Erastianism) a good deal more than his arguments. The next, "Morny, Gambetta, and Blanqui," is on the whole the very best in the book—indeed it is a piece of work which deserves to live. The affectation of horror for the minion of a corrupt tyranny which the Dictator, rather from habitual bombast than Pharisaism, makes when he is introduced to the Duc de Morny, the unfaltering cynicism of the latter, and the adroit fashion in which he turns the tables on his censor by calling the great Intransigent into the discussion, are rendered with a very great deal of skill and with hardly a fault in dialectic. M. de Morny wins hands down—a result which will make some good people shake their heads over Mr. Traill. After this we drop politics, and in "Plato and Landor" come to literature. Here we do not think Mr Traill quite so happy, though he has caught Landor's own manner with considerable skill, and makes not a few points against "neo-Hellenists" in English. Even this piece turns to politics; and, little space as we have for quotation, we must give (without agreeing with all its sentiments) a really fine passage with which it concludes:—

> Wheresoever in the world a people has passed under the sway of England, their lives, in becoming more abundant, have ceased to satisfy their ideals. We have broken in upon the secular calm of ancient and outworn civilisations, and over minds which once reposed in a passive and incurious contentment we have cast the spell of our own unsatisfied longings. The savage whom we tame unlearns his simple delight in Nature, and gains access only to our coarser and viler pleasures in its stead. We have peopled one whole continent with our lank-jawed kinsmen, and fringed another with the careworn faces of our sons. A full half of the globe's surface is given over to the melancholy Englishman—with his sombre attire, his repellent manners, his gloomy worship, his mechanic habitudes of toil. The human instinct of self-preservation will not long tolerate such a dominion as this; the human yearning after gladness will rise up in rebellion against it, and we are bound therefore in common prudence to seek the Hellenic spirit and ensue it, reverently striving, if haply it may admit us to its inspiring visions of the beautiful, and yield up to us the secret of its immortal joy.

The fourth, "Lord Beaconsfield and Sir Robert Peel," is short but clever. It has been hinted that Mr. Traill is apparently not very favourably disposed towards the late leader of the Conservative party, though his actual dialogue is by no means badly hit off; and there is a severe passage on the failure of Peel himself to leave any durable mark on English politics except the one great fiscal change, the merit of which has practically been claimed and appropriated by his political adversaries. With "Lucian, and Pascal" we should imagine that Mr. Traill has taken particular pains, and here again there seems to be reflected a certain echo of his own opinions in the words of the Samosatene. Theologically speaking, the dialogue may be said to turn on the well-known and often-noted differentia between pre- and post-Christian thinkers, the absence in the one and the presence in the other of the sense of sin and other riddles of the earth. After a good deal of fencing, Lucian frankly avows his complete ignorance of and indifference to these problems, and more than hints that whoever has brought the sense and the discussion of them into the world has conferred a very doubtful benefit upon it. In the next piece, O'Connell, to the horror of Mr. Butt, takes the Parnellites under his protection, hails them as his successors and children, and expresses his delight in seeing England bothered. The piece is spiritedly written, but O'Connell was probably less of a cynic, and Mr. Butt was certainly less of a prig, than Mr. Traill here represents them.

Finding the next dialogue unworthy, we for the present pass it by; and luckily its follower is excellent. The point of it lies in a most lively portrait of Mr. Gladstone and character of his eloquence given by Mr. Horsman to Burke. This partly springs from and partly leads to a discussion of English Democracy, in which Mr. Traill's pessimism is more apparent than his hold of any definite political creed. "Richardson and Fielding" is a little weak, the subject being a hackneyed one, and nothing very new or brilliant contributed to it; while in "Peter the Great and Alexander II." it does not need great affection for Russia or her late sovereign to make the reader think Mr. Traill rather hard on Alexander. Neither is "Sterne and Thackeray" satisfactory. Mr. Traill is a sworn champion of Sterne, and does right to make him fight his own battles with vigour and address, for he was very well able to do so. And it is ingenious, no doubt, to put the case between this century and the last as between hypocrites of cynicism and hypocrites of sensibility. But Thackeray is made to argue his own case very weakly. "Lord Palmerston and Richard Cobden" is short and not remarkable; and the last dialogue in the book, "Lucretius, Paley, and Darwin," good in parts, is marred by the almost complete silence of Lucretius. The reader feels that he must have been very much bored. Now, nobody who ever lived had a right to bore the author of the De Rerum Natura, and if they did, so much the worse for them. Between these two comes an interesting discussion partly of Mr. Irving's acting and partly of Diderot's paradox between Garrick and G. H. Lewes. Here Mr. Traill—constant to sensibility—makes the author of the Life of Goethe argue strongly against Diderot, and Garrick somewhat weakly defend him.

We must apologize if, in noticing the contents of a book which is from its nature not easy to review as a whole, we have attributed to Mr. Traill any opinions to which he wished to give merely dramatic expression. It is the misfortune of the dialogue-writer that he can rarely avoid taking a side; and, when he does take it, can hardly ever avoid letting it be seen. Mr. Traill—and this is one of the merits of his book—has not, as almost all writers in this class nowadays do, merely set up certain ninepins to be bowled down. But he has, no doubt unconsciously, put much more force and a much cunninger bias on those bowls which are delivered as he would like to deliver them himself. And in so doing he has, as it seems to us, displayed occasionally some prejudice and some misconception. This, however, does not prevent his book, on the whole, from being excellently written and full of a remarkable cleverness—a cleverness almost impossible to illustrate except by very copious extract. Now a review which is stuffed with quotations is an easy review to write, and sometimes a satisfactory one both to author and reader; but it is a review of but a low class as criticism. We therefore simply refer readers to the book for an abundance of epigram which has not recently been excelled either in form or matter. Compared with the quires of flimsiness which for the most part issue from the press, The New Lucian is reading of a very delightful sort to any one who has an interest in literature, and ought to be very profitable reading to all who have any interest in politics. On one point only have we to speak of Mr. Traill's work with positive reprobation. Many men may regret the Count of Chambord's refusal to take the field in 1873. But to represent the refusal as having been the effect of fear (and in his dialogue Mr. Traill not merely makes Egalité advance the charge—that is sufficiently in character—but Henri Cinq accept it, so that it must be taken as the author's view) is worthy neither of a student of history nor of a political philosopher, nor—we say it with regret—even of a chivalrous political partisan. This same dialogue is altogether so one-sided that we must suppose Mr. Traill to have been prejudiced to the point of forgetting his facts by the Count's notorious religiosity—a failing towards which neither the Old nor the New Lucian seems to have been entirely just. The world at large has judged and will judge better the last of the Bourbons, who, if he had less than the somewhat moderate share of brains which his family have possessed, had at least a moral record as stainless as his flag. Had Mr. Traill confined the slander to the lips of the man who skulked from Keppel's guns, it would have been fair dramatic game. But by making the interlocutor admit the appeal to his conscience, he has made himself art and part in an unworthy scandal. The dialogue is in more ways than one the weakest in the book, and if Mr. Traill drops it in a future edition he will do well. In others, as we have said, there are points suggesting difference, but only difference of an amicable kind.

THREE NOVELS.*

THE first novel of every writer of fiction is easily accounted for. It is written for gain or for fame; the author seeks credit in the world of letters, or hopes to make an income by producing something that will sell. But second and third novels require a more elaborate apology, when they require any apology at all. Many, if not most, of them are entirely without justification for their existence, because the first experiments have shown that neither gain nor fame is likely to reward perseverance in an ill-chosen career. This, however, is a stricture which can scarcely be applied, or only in a modified sense, to the three novels now under notice. Their authors have reached a certain degree of acceptance with the public, they are asked for at the libraries, one of them is a veteran in the art of fiction, whilst another is apparently bent on earning the same title with the shortest possible delay. All are probably warranted in producing fresh stories by the amiability of their critics and the reports of their publishers; but when a man or woman of letters has been fortunate to this extent, and can contemplate a new book as a fairly good speculation, other questions arise, and other hesitations suggest themselves, which not even the most successful novelist can afford to despise. We are entitled to demand a good reason for every work that is added to the vast accumulations of fiction. A novel which has no good reason for existence is an offence against a much-tried and long-suffering world; and an author who goes on writing from the mere momentum of former successes, without a special effort to give us what is new, true, and worthy, deserves less consideration than that which was accorded to his first attempt. Judged by this standard, it is to be feared that a large proportion of what are called the best novels of every publishing season ought to be condemned as worthless.

Mr. Crawford has had the great misfortune to be seized upon early in life by the more enthusiastic order of reviewers, who, having discovered in him transcendent qualities not previously suspected even by himself, did their best to check the gradual and painful development without which the best conceivable talent can never be matured into excellence. It is barely a year since Mr. Isaacs introduced its author to English readers as one capable of good and entertaining work, and now we have a fourth novel from Mr. Crawford's too industrious pen. As an almost necessary consequence, To Leeward shows that his faults have been exaggerated, whilst his virtues are less conspicuous; he has treated an unpleasant subject in an objectionable manner, and his style is both pretentious and slipshod. The story which he has thought it worth his while to tell in these two volumes is that of a cool and treacherous seduction, or, rather, of the cold-blooded connivance of a man and woman to deceive the husband of the latter without a shadow of excuse or probability. The heroine is depicted in the first chapters as a pure and refined English girl, a visitor in Rome, who has muddled her brains with "philosophy," but who does not exhibit anything like an immoral tendency. It is true that she is "full of a certain fierce courage and impatience of restraint, chafing under the moral flat-iron of a hopelessly proper father, whose mind is of the great levelling type, and his prejudices as mountains of stone in the midst, reared to Heaven like pyramids to impose a personal moral geography on the human landscape." Such a portentous flat-iron as this would be enough to account for anything whatever, in or out of the range of intelligible things. But Mr. Crawford does not prepare us, as an artist might easily have done, for the hideous picture which he means to draw. Leonora marries a young Italian nobleman, the soul of honour and courtesy, who is entirely devoted to her; yet immediately after their honeymoon she allows a comparative stranger to begin a course of flattery and flirtation which a couple of months suffice to ripen into a breach of her marriage vows. No doubt Mr. Crawford will say that such things are, and that he only professes to tell things as they are. But that is not the question; though, if it were, we should be inclined to answer that deliberate seduction is too vulgar and commonplace to be made the subject of an artistic work of fiction. All that it may contain of genuine romance, if any romance is compatible with deliberation on both sides, has been squeezed out of it long ago; and Mr. Crawford is surely not reduced to picking up the squeezed oranges of those who have gone before him. But our present concern is with his lack of art rather than with his lack of judgment. Having failed to prepare us beforehand for the woeful corruption of his heroine, and having dwelt on her crime with something like unctuous relish, it seems to occur to him that no one could suddenly become so very disgraceful as he has made Leonora, and he proceeds to deface his portrait, and to daub over the finer lines of his original picture. The effect is at times a little comical. Leonora has eloped with her lover—a vapid, middle-aged philanderer, who tries hard to talk epigrammatically, and makes "daring comments on the conduct of nations and individuals"—and they steal off together by night in the philanderer's boat. She has provided herself with a bag of hairpins, pockethandkerchiefs, and Cologne water. After a refreshing sleep in her lover's arms, she wakes up and asks for her bag.

Leonora took a handkerchief and wet it from the bottle of Cologne water. Then she began to dab it on her face.

"I dreamed that you"—dab—"picked me up in your arms and"—dab, dab—"carried me down the stairs"—dab, dab, dab—"and just as you were putting me into the"—dab—"into the boat, you dropped me into the sea." A furious succession of dabs, then more Cologne water, and another handkerchief.

This may be amusing, but it is not art. It is brought in towards the end of the story in order to depreciate the character of a heroine whose evil actions have become incongruous with her previous description. In fact, the Leonora of Rome and the Leonora of Sorrento have extremely little in common. They are different types; and it looks very much as though Mr. Crawford had originally intended that his Marchesa should overcome the temptations of the philanderer, and had changed his mind in the course of the second volume.

Hasty production will account for some, though not for all, of the blemishes which abound in Mr. Crawford's story. What does he mean by "airy furniture"? How could one man "wring" another's "cowardly neck to death"? Is it possible for a woman to "fire off the shots of her brimming affection"? Why is Leonora's sister-in-law, an Italian married to a French comte, perpetually spoken of as "Donna Diana"? Why should a spy exulting in the discovery of a clandestine meeting between the lovers be compared to "some dark evil genius of a low order, waiting for Mr. Darwin to evolve him into the advanced condition of complete devildom"—unless it be that Mr. Darwin's name is ornamental, whether appropriate or not? What is the meaning of this?—

> Who will tell us that love is less a real thing because it is evil instead of being good? Bah! Devils are quite as real as angels, as I have no doubt many of us will find in due time.

Or of this?—

> Out of nothing, nothing can come. Out of confusion and vanity and pure selfishness . . . out of the shell of an imaginary self wrought fine and gilded . . . what can come that is good? or can anything come of them which is truly evil, seeing that, one with another, they are all but so many empty nothings, melted together and lost in the great void?

"You should not say those sort of things," Leonora tells her philanderer on one occasion; and Mr. Crawford's readers will be disposed to apply the same reproach to himself. Next to his scraps of vague philosophy, perhaps the most objectionable of "those sort of things" are the scraps of unnecessary French which Mr. Crawford's Italians are constantly exchanging. One would think that the Marchese and his sister would have preferred their native tongue, and we are told in so many words that Leonora liked Italian better than French. This is a comparative trifle; but it illustrates the slipshod manner in which the author has dashed off the fourth and worst of his novels.

Holme Lee is an author who has passed the stage when one might have looked to her for the justification of a new story, and she has not reached the melancholy second stage when it may be necessary, judging by other instances, to look for it again. Loving and Serving is one of the best examples of a style which fulfils most of the conditions that one would naturally impose on "homely" novels. It is warmed throughout with a glow of domestic felicity, charity, dutifulness, and repose. The heroine is a prepossessing young orphan, whose name, Mary Martha, suggests or is suggested by the title of her story. More of loving than of serving falls to her lot, and her vicissitudes are mainly steps from one degree of fortune and happiness to another. The tale, indeed, is written by an optimist for optimists, and there is scarcely enough of excitement in it to flutter the heart of the gentlest reader. No crime, no abiding enmity, no aching hearts are admitted into the paradise which Holme Lee creates and peoples. She knows the limits of her power too well to attempt anything beyond the simple drama of an uneventful life; and even in the story before us her hand begins to show its lack of cunning whenever her characters approach some loftier height of passion or heroism. The art required for work of this kind is not much; a moderate ambition enables the author to satisfy moderate expectations. But the absence of all pretence, and false glitter, and vague assumption of knowledge, is a legitimate claim to the gratitude of a generation overdone with all these things. The reader will be inclined to think of this story, as the writer says of one of her characters, "when a girl loves the best things, her foibles are likely to wither away and die in that purer light"; and to its unexciting and somewhat monotonous record the words applied to another character will not be inappropriate:—"She seemed lighter, gayer, better contented—but, Lord, when one is young, the mere sense of living and being innocent is enough for all that!"

After a novel which is, in its way, only too interesting, and a novel of which the interest is circumscribed within narrow bounds, the insatiate lover of fiction may turn with relief to the sprightly story of childhood which the author of The Young Idea commends particularly to the notice of "old boys." The publisher has prefixed to this volume a string of extracts from our contemporaries which certainly warrant the author of Culmshire Folk and John Orlebar in presenting himself once more, after a reasonable interval, as a delineator of human character. We have had of late years perhaps a little too much of the mischievous juvenile, but there will always be room for bright sketches of childhood, cleverly and genially drawn. The "young idea" in this story is the son of a London poulterer, "lent" for a Christmas holiday to a childless farmer and his wife, who have their hands full with him, to their great delight. His boundless curiosity and his sage comments on all that he sees and hears are sufficiently diverting, though the effect is somewhat marred by the author's unequal rendering of the language of his hero. The poulterer's boy appears to vary between the ages of four and eight; but this does not prevent the story from being racy and characteristic in many of its incidents.

MENTAL EVOLUTION IN ANIMALS.*

"THERE is, without question, some enormous distinction between the psychology of man and that of the lower animals, and hereafter I shall have to consider at much length what that distinction is." So writes Mr. Romanes at the end of the chapter on "Reason" in his Mental Evolution in Animals. The remark proves, of course, that we are only to regard this very interesting volume as a step in a series, a chapter of what is to be "continued in our next." Mr. Romanes, as he remarks in his preface, had intended to "devote the present essay to mental evolution in man, as well as in the animals." But he found that his materials were too abundant for a single volume, and he wisely avoided producing one of those dropsical and swollen "bookseller's books" which make modern literature a weariness and require a solid scaffolding for their accommodation.

Mr. Romanes's subject is already quite sufficiently ample. Within the space of a review it is impossible to follow closely and minutely an argument which reposes on the general hypothesis of evolution, and which traces the increasing development of consciousness and mental faculty as exhibited in correspondence with increasing complexity of physical structure. Mr. Romanes has provided the student with an elaborate map or chart, or genealogical tree, displaying the territories or illustrating the pedigree of Mind. Without this tree, and without constant comparison between the tree and the text, it is practically impossible to do justice to Mr. Romanes's system. We shall endeavour, however, by aid of the sketch, to give a general notion of what Mr. Romanes believes; while the rest of this review must be devoted to a more popular topic—examples of instinct and reason among the animals. Mr. Romanes's mental tree, then, grows out of a soil of Excitability in the brain and nervous system. Two stout branches, or rather roots, "discrimination" and "conductility," meet in a straight stem, of which the lower part is named "neurility," and soars into "reflex action" and "volition." This stem, with all its branches, is crossed by straight lines, which lead the eye to the organisms, or animals, that are on a level with this or that stage of mental development. For example, on a level with the basis or roots of all, excitability, are protoplasmic movements. On a level with "neurility" are "unknown animals, perhaps extinct"—a very interesting theme to the speculative mind; there is so much room for pleasing conjecture in the conception of animals which probably do not exist, and certainly are not known. Immediately above "neurility," the stem of potential mind sends out a short sturdy bough, "sensation." On a level with "sensation," in an ascending scale, are cœlenterata, echinodermata, and molluscs, all of which are conscious. But from sensation spring two branches, which expand into a number of twigs. The first is "perception," and the animals which, in an ascending scale, possess perception are molluscs, insects and spiders, fish and frogs, higher crustacea, reptiles, birds, carnivora, monkeys and elephants, lastly, anthropoid apes and dogs. These creatures gradually swarm up to the branches of the mental tree; so that insects and spiders have a share of imagination, the higher crustacea are not without reason, reptiles recognize persons, birds are capable of dreaming (a parrot is rightly reported to have talked in his sleep, and a canary was a martyr to nightmare), while monkeys and elephants understand the use of tools, and anthropoid apes and dogs represent creatures with "indefinite morality." While these are examples of the climbing processes of intellect, the opposite side of the chart illustrates the evolution of the emotions. These ascend gradually, from surprise and fear in very simple and lowly organisms, to shame, remorse, deceitfulness, and a sense of the ludicrous in the highest animals. On what may be called the political side, the tree throws out the branch of "the preservation of species," which again produces a "social" branch, and above the line where apes and dogs are found "in airy climb," becomes "partly human, human, savage, civilized." Corresponding to these topmost twigs are the faculties which man possesses and the beasts lack, "Reflection" and "Self-conscious Thought."

The skeleton of an arrangement or argument thus provided is clothed, as it were, and animated by the early chapters on "Nerve-tissue," the physical basis of Mind, the working of nervous centres, and so forth. Consciousness, sensation, perception, are then examined, and we reach the chapter on Imagination, with its curious examples of dreaming in birds and of delusions in animals. Here the popular interest in the book may be said to begin; after this anecdotes are frequent. Here we may pause for a moment to say Happy physical science! Mr. Romanes is allowed to bring evidence from all quarters, and from observers of every age, as to the manners and habits of birds, beasts, and fishes that swim in the sea. But when the anthropologist brings the same sort of evidence to illustrate the manners and habits of men, then outlaughs the stern "scholar," and says, "Arrest me that agency," as in Martin Chuzzlewit. According to the "scholar," no evidence about the manners of men in different stages of civilization is admissible unless it is the evidence of trained philologists and etymologists. The student of natural history knows no such limitations, and may quote the "journals and books of travel" so much disdained by the scholar.

Mr. Romanes, illustrating "imagination" in the animals, quotes various cases of delusion in beasts. Mad dogs have "the horrors," and appear to suffer from hallucinations like those of delirium tremens. An instance is given of a perfectly sane Scotch terrier, whose hair stood up on end in dread of some visionary foe. The spirited proprietor of this animal does not appear to have belonged to the Psychical Society, or he would merely have observed, about the terrier, "She sees a ghost I cannot see." The toothless mastiff bitch of Sir Leoline (the baron rich) is a case in point. When she gave sixteen howls, not over loud, "some say she saw my lady's shroud." It is rather curious that, when dealing with the delusion of animals, Mr. Romanes did not allude to the widespread belief that dogs can see supernatural visions sometimes denied to men. In Homer the dogs see Athene when her presence is hidden from Telemachus, and, instead of barking, they sneak away with low whines. We happen to have met lately with a case of a superstitious dog, a very beautiful collie. This animal was sleeping in the room of his mistress, in a house popularly held to be haunted. A tremendous noise, as of a dozen Poltergeists bear-fighting, broke out in the room beneath that in which the dog was lying. He displayed the most abject terror, and next day refused to enter the room whence the clamour had arisen. The cause of the riot was never discovered, but its cause is neither here nor there. The fact remains that the noise filled the dog with a superstitious dread from which it took him some time to recover. The belief in the howling of dogs before a death occurs in a non-Aryan race in India, where it is explained by a curious myth about the creation of man. From delusions in dogs Mr. Romanes passes, by a natural transition, to the germs of religion in animals. Mr. Herbert Spencer says, in a curiously dubious way, "I believe M. Comte expressed the opinion that fetichistic conceptions are formed by the higher animals." Surely it is not so difficult to find out for certain whether or not Comte expressed this opinion. The topic is confused by the irritating abundance of false senses which are given to the word fetich. Originally Portuguese, fetich means no more than a charm, amulet, or other object to which a magical quality is attached. Stones, feathers, birds' claws, shells, and bits of trash in general, are hoarded by the fetichistic savage, just as French gambiers keep their cochons d'or and their bit of rope wherewith a man has been hanged, and (of late) their little golden owls. This fetichism, pure and simple, is not practised by the animals. Comte probably meant that animals, like savages, invest many inanimate objects with a fancied life. On this topic a very curious and rather absurd book (Myth and Science) by M. Vignoli may be consulted. M. Vignoli derives the "personalism," "animism," or whatever we are to call it, of the savage from the instinctive animism of the lower creation. But Mr. Romanes's own experiments prove that beasts do not seriously fancy inanimate things to be endowed with life, unless the objects are made to behave in such a manner that the hypothesis of their animation is forced upon the four-footed observer. Before leaving the religion of animals, may we refer Mr. Romanes to a curious old work which proves that animals are orthodox Christians? The English translation, from the Lille edition of 1672, is called "The School of the Eucharist. Established upon the Miraculous Respects and Acknowledgements, which Beasts, Birds, and Insects upon several occasions have rendered," &c. Then we read, "A Spider avenges an affront done to the H. Sacrament." "Hinds come to Mass on a H. Martyr's day, and make an Offering of a young Cheverel." "Ducks are present at Mass on S. Nicholas Day." The author of this singular compilation from a vast variety of sources was F. Toussaint Bridoul, of the Society of Jesus.

Mr. Romanes for his chapters on Instinct has been fortunate enough to use Mr. Darwin's notes, and an old essay of Mr. Darwin's, hitherto unpublished, is printed at the end of the volume. Mr. Romanes's definition of Instinct may be quoted from his previous work, Animal Intelligence:—

> Instinct is reflex action into which there is imported the element of consciousness. The term is therefore a generic one, comprising all those faculties of mind which are concerned in conscious and adaptive action, antecedent to individual experience, without necessary knowledge of the relation between means employed and ends attained, but similarly performed under similar and frequently recurring circumstances by all the individuals of the same species.

Mr. Romanes examines perfect and imperfect instincts. The former sort exactly meets the circumstances in the life of an animal which it exists to meet; the latter induces lemmings to venture on maritime enterprise which they are wholly unfitted to accomplish successfully. In imperfect instincts the animals make errors. The flesh fly deposits its eggs on the flowers of the carrion plant. Honey-seeking insects attempt to derive nutriment from the gaudy salmon-flies on Professor Moseley's hat. Swallows have often been caught with the trout-fly when the angler was making his cast. Trout (occasionally) have also paid this tribute to an imperfect instinct. But in these cases they may be excused, for false flies are offered to them, and the same with intent to deceive. Bees attempt to suck honey from the blossoms of wall-papers; we are sure they would not make the experiment on any flowers of Mr. Morris's patterns. A change of instinct in animals may be caused, and "Aristotle tells us of a cock that performed all the duties of a hen." Mr. Gilbert tells us of an "accomplished hen" that performed the crowing duties expected of a cock. But the oddest of all perversions of instinct is quoted (apparently as an example of erotomania) by Mr. Romanes from an anonymous lady:—

"A white fantail pigeon lived with his family in a pigeon-house in our stable-yard. He and his wife had been brought originally from Sussex, and had lived, respected and admired, to see their children of the third generation, when he suddenly became the victim of the infatuation I am about to describe. . . .

No eccentricity whatever was remarked in his conduct until one day I chanced to pick up somewhere in the garden a ginger-beer bottle of the ordinary brown stone description. I flung it into the yard, where it fell immediately below the pigeon-house. That instant down flew pater-familias, and to my no small astonishment commenced a series of genuflexions, evidently doing homage to the bottle. He strutted round and round it, bowing and scraping and cooing and performing the most ludicrous antics I ever beheld on the part of an enamoured pigeon. . . . Nor did he cease these performances until we removed the bottle; and, which proved that this singular aberration of instinct had become a fixed delusion, whenever the bottle was thrown or placed in the yard—no matter whether it lay horizontally or was placed upright—the same ridiculous scene was enacted; at that moment the pigeon came flying down with quite as great alacrity as when his peas were thrown out for his dinner, to continue his antics as long as the bottle remained there. Sometimes this would go on for hours, the other members of his family treating his movements with the most contemptuous indifference, and taking no notice whatever of the bottle. At last it became the regular amusement with which we entertained our visitors to see this erratic pigeon making love to the interesting object of his affections, and it was an entertainment which never failed, throughout that summer at least. Before next summer came round he was no more.

This pigeon really behaved more or less like a fetichist, and many a savage would worship a stone bottle from which the spirit had departed.

Mr. Romanes next elucidates the origin of instinct in "survival of the fittest," and in "the lapsing of intelligence." The animals which kept on doing useful things unintelligently survived. Again, useful actions originally done with intelligence become hereditary and automatic. It would be interesting to see how either origin accounts for the extraordinary dodge by which the mason wasps provide fresh food for their unborn offspring. On the point of the supposed inverse ratio of instinct and reason in man, and of intelligence and instinct in ants and bees, Mr. Romanes breaks a lance with Mr. Mivart, and unseats, we think, that champion of orthodoxy. Mr. Romanes concludes that the animals have their share of reason. Who can deny it to an ape which steadily persevered with a bunch of keys till he found the key that opened the door?

Mr. Romanes's book is remarkable for its clearness of method, its cogency of arguments, for abundance of interesting evidence, and for exactness and lucidity of definition. That the metaphysicians will find many points on which to combat him we need scarcely say. Interesting as his book is, we look forward with still greater interest to the promised sequel, over which we expect a metaphysical, theological, and general battle of Armageddon.

REGENERATION OF INDIA.*

IN one sense this little work may be termed an indigenous product. The author is a Mahratta Brahman. The book is printed at a native press, the Dhyan Mittra, which means "the friend of religious meditation." It can be bought in Bombay for the sum of eight annas or a shilling. And if the writer looks on his countrymen as the Dewan or Prime Minister of a little native State may be supposed to look on them, he has also imbibed English ideas through his experience as a Vakil or pleader, of the High Court of Bombay. A pleader, we may state, is a native advocate who is qualified to appear, act, and argue on behalf of his client on the civil and criminal sides of the High Court in its appellate jurisdiction. He can also go on special retainer to any of the subordinate courts in the interior. But he differs from a barrister in his inability to appear and address a judge or jury of the High Court in its original jurisdiction, whether civil or criminal. How long this "anomaly" will be tolerated by some enlightened member of Council, or how soon some impassioned friend of humanity will ask whether these degrading class distinctions are to be maintained, we cannot say. But there is nothing to prevent any native gentleman, Parsi, Mahratta, or Bengali, from coming to England and passing examinations at Lincoln's Inn or the Temple. Indeed, more young natives now study in England for the Bar than compete for the Civil Service. And we must do the author the justice to say that, without crossing the dark water, he has become a proficient in English, and if his style is occasionally ambitious and high-flown, we happily miss that lofty air of patronage and condescension with which orators and writers from the other side of India are wont to lecture Englishmen and Englishwomen on their imperfect or incipient civilization.

Those who wish to gain a clear idea of the articles of faith of a Hindu Theist will find them stated in an appendix of five pages. The Theist is at war with Pantheism, idolatry, and ascetic practices, thus getting rid at once of Shiva and Kali, with all their synonyms, and all the tribes of Gossins, Faquirs, and devotees. He has faith in man's moral nature as originally constituted, and believes it capable of spiritual intercourse with the Divine Being as well as of eternal happiness. The certainty of punishment for evil done and the necessity of repentance, are distinctly recognized. Surrender of selfish passions to the Divine will is one of the highest duties; and that will, acting on human reason, produces wisdom; on the conscience, virtue; and on the affections that kind of love which seeks the good of others. Caste is ignored or pronounced reprehensible or impious. In short, though this confession of faith denies original sin, disbelieves in any one revealed book, whether the Shastra, the Bible, or the Koran, looks on all religion as progressive, and on the world itself as capable of apparently indefinite perfection, there is little that the rigid moralist would disapprove, and much that the Indian statesman might welcome as immeasurably superior to the worship of Durga and the restrictions of caste. But the purpose of the author is not merely to put Theism in a succinct form, or to show that man's regeneration may be accomplished by prayer and intercourse with the Divine Being. He wishes to do something towards the regeneration of India, and here we descend from what the first Lord Ellenborough called the "high sentimental latitudes" to the low ground of practical life. To some of the recommendations any Anglo-Indian will assent. That native houses should be pure; that the Hindu woman should play the part, not of a serf or a chattel, but of a matron and a wife; that natives of position, independence, and high culture should hand down the torch of education to the lower social strata, and should set themselves steadily to counteract the evils of Pantheism and idolatry; is of course all we could desire. It is when we come to the part to be played by Government in regenerating his countrymen that the exhortations of the writer will provoke criticism and discussion amongst the various Anglo-Indian schools of reform. On religious instruction in colleges this Mahratta Brahman evinces a tolerant spirit which might shock advanced members on any English School Board. He would have no doctrine or dogma inculcated by the teacher. But he would allow him to teach natural religion and morality, and he would like to hear scholars singing hymns composed by the Theists of India in the vernacular languages to the praise and glory of God. We fear this gentleman under-estimates the difficulty of reducing natural religion to a precise form of words acceptable to all parties, as well as the danger of rousing intolerance and sectarianism under the guise of religion. We can understand an allotment of an hour to the Bible in the case of Christian scholars, and of the Koran in that of Mahommedans. But who is to make the right selection out of the Hindu Shastras? How are the claims of a Vedic hymn to be reconciled with those of a passage from the Sankhya Sara or the Bhagavat Purana? Who can be certain that an elegant translation of Pope's "Universal Prayer," or the morning hymn of our first parents in Milton, would disarm hostility? Or how is the most accomplished member of Mr. Hunter's Commission on Education to compose "Family Prayers," as suggested, which will not offend the missionary, the Brahman, or the Sudra? For the mode in which elementary education and our duty to the masses are to be reconciled with the maintenance of English schools and colleges, we must wait for the Report of Mr. Hunter and his colleagues; but meanwhile it is satisfactory to find that the author upholds fees and scholarships, and even thinks that the rulers of native States might contribute to the educational funds by founding technical schools or agricultural colleges, and sending promising young men to the "seminaries of Western learning." But whether this vague expression means that they are to take degrees at the Bombay University, or are to go to England, we shall not undertake to say. When we come to the well-worn topic of the development of natural resources, the author expatiates on the rich mines, the fertile soil, the large forests, and the splendid navigable rivers of India. Now we have heard a good deal of this sort of thing before, and for the last quarter of a century English capital and industry have been attracted to India as they certainly were not before the Mutiny. The coal industry has flourished, sunk, and is reviving. Portions of jungle, small in comparison of what remains to be cleared, have been turned into tea-gardens and dotted with bungalows. Cotton has spread, and jute is now a large export. Factories and mills at the Presidencies actually need the restraining and guiding hand of the Legislature. But somehow there are certain projects which English capitalists cannot and ought not to touch, and others which they only handle to burn their fingers. In the power of any English Chamber of Agriculture materially to improve the native methods of cultivation, to change the ryots' ploughs, or to supplant by machinery the ox that treads out the corn, we have a complete disbelief. The State may do something by the establishment of a model farm, and by importations of new seeds and varieties of produce. But minerals have been snares to Companies, and for the last thirty years we are constantly hearing of iron that does not "smelt"; of stone quarries that have to be abandoned; or of some gold Company that must be wound up. When we are reminded that there is British capital which is lying idle or seeking good investment, we are tempted to remark that British capital can be left to find out its best investment, and that those who supplant lumbering country boats by flats and steamers, reclaim the jungle, and people the waste, are not, after all, so very illogical when they insist on certain judicial safeguards and privileges in a country where there are other enemies besides the white-ant and the mosquito, the autumnal fever and the deadly snake. In his proposal to "set free" "a considerable portion of the Government money now absorbed in railways, harbours, and canals," and to devote the same to agricultural banks, well-irrigation, and the diminution of the National Debt, he is chimerical and vague. It is only necessary to remark that a very large portion of the railway system has been constructed by private capital, under a guarantee of interest from the State; that digging wells, though often aided by advances from the Treasury, is an operation essentially part of the business of a Talukdar, or a tenant-proprietor, or a village community; and that a beginning has been made in the establishment of agricultural banks. And when it is contended that the chiefs and native merchants of India ought to have the first option of buying any bank, railway, or canal hitherto constructed and supervised by Government, the simple answer is that the Rajas, Nawabs, and Mahajans have only to combine at this moment, raise the capital, and make the offer. There is no hindrance, legislative or executive, to the formation of any Company or Society in India for the purpose of carrying out any philanthropic, commercial, or social project whatever.

We prefer our reformer when he lectures his countrymen about premature marriages, polygamy, and the long dreary widowhood to which, in spite of the beneficent Acts of the Legislature, a little girl who marries an octogenarian Brahman is inevitably condemned. The tone of the author is here manifestly so earnest that he rises far above the level of the professional spouter who talks and does nothing. But it is for the educated natives themselves to alter the age of marriage and to introduce light and culture into the Zenana, if they cannot entirely break down its partitions. Government is here powerless.

The value of this kind of brochure is obviously, not that it shows a short cut to reform, or propounds capital schemes which it would never have occurred to the Financial or the Legal member of the Viceroy's Council to suggest, but that it shows English education to be teaching natives to think for themselves. Perhaps the improvement has not been as rapid as Macaulay anticipated when he pointed out the absurdity of paying natives to learn their own classical languages of Sanskrit or Arabic. But it is gratifying to see a native lawyer giving no encouragement to what Macaulay denounced as "absurd history, absurd metaphysics, absurd physics, absurd theology"; admitting the solid advantages conferred on India by foreign rule, and not always calling on Commissioners and magistrates or to the Hindu Jupiter to help the ancestral bullock cart out of the mud in which it has long stuck. The Regeneration of India—it is characteristic of native style that the article is omitted in the title—may not come for all this gentleman's calling, but there is more subject for thought and congratulation in his eighty pages than in many other bulky and more portentous publications.

THREE NOVELS.*

MRS. OLIPHANT is a novelist for whom we have so much respect that we hope she will forgive our saying that she writes too much to be always very readable. She can hardly draw breath between her books, and she seems often to dash into the regulation three volumes, trusting to the fates and good fortune for a sufficiency of satisfactory matter. We admire the facility with which she can spin gossamer web out of slight and flimsy materials; but at the same time we not unfrequently have cause to regret it. Her Hester is a case in point. The story would have made a capital novelette; but we are bound to say that it is a rather wearisome novel. It is a story of trade, with commonplace incidents, with characters that have little novelty or originality; but with one or two very strong situations. Hester herself is the most striking figure in the book, and she would have stood out still more effectively had the interest been concentrated around her. We said that the main idea of the novel is commonplace. We have the familiar private bank which is to be involved in financial troubles, and may probably come to signal grief. "Vernon's" is represented, with some pardonable exaggeration, as the leading house in the home counties, and second only to the Bank of England in local consideration. Nevertheless, "Vernon's" has no branches; and its business, for artistic and dramatic purposes, is conducted entirely in the second-rate town of Redborough. The dominating and directing spirit is a certain Miss Catherine Vernon, who came to the rescue of the family concern in a critical moment. Since then Miss Catherine had kept the reins in her hands till she confided them to a couple of nephews whom she adopted as acting partners. At first sight she seems to be more vigorously drawn than she really is. She is one of those strong-minded women whom we ought to know so well by this time. She is quick and shrewd; she loves to domineer and to do kindnesses; she takes a world that has sadly disappointed her as she has found it, and scarcely looks for gratitude. Yet she has a softer side to her nature, which makes her generously ready to be imposed upon, for she never gives her confidence by halves. But not being in the habit of being crossed, she can be petty in her prejudices and resentments. She delights in being the Lady Bountiful of the gentility of Redborough, and she subsidizes half of her poor relations, establishing them by whole families in something like aristocratic almshouses—a state of things which introduces us to a society of sycophants; for she has succeeded in surrounding herself with knaves and fools and backbiting toadies. For once Mrs. Oliphant is disagreeably cynical in the pictures she presents of the petty meannesses of humanity. Yet she may urge that she takes these unpleasant views of human nature in order to point a moral and adorn her tale. For the heroine is brought in by way of contrast, and nobody can call Hester a time-server. The girl is introduced to us with a happy touch, which shows her a restless, short-frocked maiden of fourteen, rushing about the curious old house which is to become her home, "with eyes like two notes of interrogation, brilliant, flaming, inquiring into everything." On the very first occasion of their meeting she has the misfortune to excite the inveterate antipathy of Mrs. Catherine, in circumstances that should rather have propitiated that lady. Hester stands guardian in the gateway over her sleeping mother, and repulses Miss Catherine from the comfortable house which they owe to the lady's liberality. In developing the story of their mutual relations, from a state of armed aggressiveness to a perfect reconciliation, Mrs. Oliphant has shown much of her accustomed skill. Hester has always been honest, independent, and frankly outspoken; she has more fire and spirit than softness in her disposition; but of course, being clever and handsome, she is to be the victim of love in the end. She has been drawn into something like a sincere attachment to the favourite nephew of Miss Catherine. The elderly lady has implicitly trusted the young man, who, having been a heartless hypocrite all along, has turned out an actual criminal. There is something touching in the affectionate readiness of the stern and suspicious Miss Catherine to be gulled. She loves her adopted son more and more, though she cannot help watching him with growing uneasiness. She fears to be disillusioned and shrinks from it; but the shock she has dreaded comes at last in the shape of a scandal that is conclusive as to his character. He has brought her cherished bank to the verge of ruin, and fled from the consequences of his criminal conduct. Then comes one of the most striking of those scenes to which we have alluded, where Hester and Miss Catherine are brought into the closest contact. Slowly the prepossessions of the older woman yield, as she acknowledges that the girl she disliked is worthy of her warmest affection. And when they come to explanations, the unappreciated Hester confesses, very suggestively, that she had always both loved and hated Miss Catherine. So far, that supplies the key to a character which is chiefly made up of contradictions. As to the dénouement of the novel, it strikes us as unsatisfactory in the extreme; and we imagine that Mrs. Oliphant, being weary of the work she had prolonged, brought it abruptly to an end at the last in a burst of natural impatience.

We know not how it is, but we find that North-country novels, from those of the Brontes and Mrs. Gaskell downwards, are generally fresh and invigorating. Possibly the reason may partly be that the writers must be exceptionally well acquainted with what they describe, otherwise they dare not venture on the difficulties of the Northern dialects. But in Robert Reid there is decidedly something more than mere familiar acquaintance with people and things. The author holds her characters well in hand throughout, and has the knack of going straight to her points. She has the gift, too, of conceiving dramatic circumstances and contrasts which give so hopeful a promise of exciting scenes that interest is awakened from the first. We may add that the promise is fairly redeemed; but the mere pleasures of anticipation in themselves are much. The dramatic contrasts begin in the very first pages of the opening chapter; and, as we might have expected from a title so blunt as Robert Reid, there is very little beating about the bush. Mr. Robert Reid is seen walking up the ill-kept approach which leads to a stately but dilapidated country mansion. Within doors he presents himself to a couple of pretty nieces, who have been left orphans by the death of a disreputable parent. The elder daughter of the dead baronet is beggared, the second happens to have a moderate fortune; but both are in want of a guardian and a home. They give Robert Reid a doubtful welcome. It is true he is their mother's brother; but he has made himself, and raised himself from being a small shopkeeper to the position of a wealthy cotton-spinner. But Robert is one of nature's genuine gentlemen, as the elder of his nieces is quick to discover. As for the second girl, we see at once that she is selfish and volatile, and predestined to trouble. Their new life under the roof of the rich manufacturer's in the Northern town is very cleverly drawn. It is enlivened besides by sketches of characters which are eccentric, perhaps even exaggerated, but by no means incredible. In fact, we may describe the novel as made up of melodramatic comedies and tragedies in the routine of every-day life. Thus the girls, coming home through their uncle's beautiful grounds, see an old man sitting on a garden-bench. They take him very naturally for an intrusive beggar; but, forgiving his freedoms in consideration of his years, the younger Miss Wynter presents him with a sixpence. He chuckles, introduces himself, but insists upon pocketing the coin. In reality, the venerable man is Mr. Reid's father and a notorious miser; and although his morals as well as his manners leave much to desire, and shock his daughter's sense of propriety, he sits down to the well-spread dinner-table with the Baronet's long-descended daughters. Old Mr. Slater dies, worth nearly one hundred thousand pounds, and never has he shown his eccentricities more decidedly than in the will, which scatters a little shower of bombshells among the company assembled to listen to

it. While the venerable gentleman in his life and death is put forward as a type of rather grim comedy, there is much tragedy in the fate of his favourite grandson, who involves the younger Miss Wynter in his shameful crimes and their retribution. That ingenuous young man, "beautiful as the Sun-god," runs the gauntlet of a series of hairbreadth escapes from being arraigned at the bars of criminal tribunals for offences ranging from petty larceny to murder. He incidentally pushes a companion into the clutches of the revolving mill machinery; and his victim, though saved at the moment, ultimately dies of the shock. And yet each offence, with the combination of accidents that spare him its consequences, is credible enough in itself, and sometimes even probable. Old Slater and young Mr. Clifford Lang supply much of the fun, with most of the sensation. But we should give a very unfair impression of Robert Reid if we said nothing of the many virtuous characters. Robert himself is an admirable representative of the best class of self-made business men whose sympathies with the poor make them practical philanthropists; his warm-hearted little wife, who was always in the humble dwellings of the mill-hands, is in all respects the opposite of her miserly father; and, by way of make-weight to the base and unscrupulous Clifford Lang, we have a doctor who is the heroic embodiment of simple and straightforward manhood.

We praised the author of Robert Reid for going straight to her points; she simplifies the plot and concentrates the action. We are at once predisposed in favour of a novel of the kind, because it saves us all unnecessary trouble. We are in the full swing of the story at once; we may go on with it if we like it, or we may leave it alone. Winifred Power, on the other hand, is one of the books which repel by pretensions or assumptions which may perhaps be unconscious. But the anonymous writer seems to take it for granted that we are ready to give any amount of thought to his lucubrations. He exacts our closest attention, and lays an unconscionable strain on the memory. Winifred Power begins with a prologue, in which we are presented to a brother and sister with a poor relative and protégée, to when they behave abominably. Twenty-five years are supposed to elapse, when we meet Miss Winifred, who is their niece, as a marriageable young woman. The brother and sister have been married themselves once or twice, and many other marriages have been made in the family in the meantime. Husbands have died; widows have sought consolation in second nuptials; and all these good people have been increasing and multiplying. Consequently the ramifications of their intricate relationships are become endless; and all these ramifications we are expected to master if we are to follow the story with a fair understanding. So our readers may probably be curious to know whether we consider the game to be worth the candle; and we are afraid we must answer the question in the negative. Winifred is a pretty girl and a sweet girl, and that is nearly all we can say in her favour. She is united ultimately to an honest and unattractive man; nor need any one expect much sentiment in their love-making, as they are cousins who are kept a good deal apart and very generally have the English Channel between them; while almost all the other people are contradictory incarnations of vices, frailties, and follies, except one worthy but weak old woman who has gone mad under the aggravation of a terrible wrong. The most prominent among the men is a solemn impostor, whose smooth hypocrisy is singularly nauseous; the most entertaining character is a cynical scamp, who never troubles himself to be hypocritical or to carry a mask unless it chances to serve some immediate purpose. And, though we are very indifferent as to what may happen to any one of them, we are rather sorry that some do not get their deserts.

SOME LEGAL LITERATURE.*

IT is recorded that the present Lord Chief Justice once said of an eminent person, a crisis in whose career had given his admirers an opportunity for lavish, though not unmerited, eulogy, "I think —— has been praised enough." In reading Mr. Peter's preface to his Analysis and Digest of the Decisions of Sir George Jessel we feel tempted to exclaim that the late Master of the Rolls has been praised enough. We do not say too much, but enough. Mr. Peter being (quite properly) of opinion that the act of publishing this book is one for which excuses ought, if possible, to be made, excuses it, firstly, by enumerating nine transcendent merits in Sir George Jessel which render him a peculiarly fit subject for the analysis and digestion of Mr. Peter. Secondly, by quoting the testimony of four distinguished lawyers, and generally of "the writer of any modern legal treatise," to Sir George's unquestioned judicial eminence. Having thus excused the production of his book, Mr. Peter apologizes for its imperfections. "The writer has had to prepare the work amidst his other professional duties; entirely unaided, even in the revising; in a remote part of the country, and with only his own law library." He modestly adds, "Attention to the Addenda, &c., will be desirable," and in this he is quite right. There are twenty-five Addenda, &c., or rather over five per cent. of the number of pages in the book, and there might have been more with advantage. We propose to give our reasons for thinking that Mr. Peter's preface does not err on the side of false modesty.

We are somewhat at a loss to decide whether the book is intended as a manual for the use of practitioners, or as a treatise for the edification of students, or simply as a literary monument to the memory of the great judge whose name it bears. "Analysis and Digest" seems to indicate practical usefulness; but this is neither an analysis nor a digest. If it were an analysis, the decisions would be analysed—that is, the principles from which they were deduced, and the rules which they established, would be pointed out, and some estimate of their effects or value would be suggested. If it were a digest, some kind of arrangement would be attempted, cognate matters would be collated, and the body of law owing its existence to Sir George Jessel would be presented in a shape more or less convenient for purposes of reference or instruction. Here there is nothing of the sort. Mr. Peter has adopted the straightforward method of going steadily through his Law Journal Reports with his scissors, paste, and pen, stopping whenever he saw "Jessel M.R." at the head of a reported judgment, and transferring to his own pages either the marginal note or a bit of it, except when, as has pretty often been the case, he has seen fit to paraphrase it in his own very much less satisfactory language. The unimportant judgments are recorded in a manner of which we shall presently give a specimen or two; the important ones have in a few cases as much as two pages of loosely written matter allotted to them. As the notices of a number of cases which may be roughly estimated at about 750 have to be got into 497 pages, one could hardly expect more. It is obvious that for all purposes of use in practice the book contains nothing which cannot be found much more readily, and, we may add, much better stated, in the ordinary digests of reports, arranged according to subject-matter, and properly indexed. The practising lawyer may therefore rest assured that Mr. Peter's book will be of little use to him, and we have next to consider the matter from the point of view of the student. With all possible respect to the late Master of the Rolls, it can hardly be contended that his judgments were so directly inspired as to form a class quite by themselves, of greater authority than those of any other judges. Setting this aside, however, Mr. Peter's record is so destitute of anything in the nature of commentary or exposition of legal principles that the only use to which the laborious student could put it would be to learn it by heart; and, while he was about it, he would do much better to go straight to Mr. Peter's sources, and learn the marginal notes in the Law Journal Reports. By the exhaustive process it seems to follow that the book is merely a testimony, or monument, to its hero's greatness, and in that light we will attempt to estimate its value.

About three-quarters of the cases recorded are so trivial in themselves, or mentioned in so succinct a manner, as not to convey to the reader the smallest trace of Sir George Jessel's personality, if indeed they still contain any of his words. Here, for instance, are two, which we give in full, just as Mr. Peter points them:—

A plaintiff suing in Chancery (or Chancery Division) for a sum within the County Court limit of jurisdiction in equity, will have his full costs as allowed in such Chancery Division. [This was also decided in Richards v. Wicks, Register of Judgments "(1868) R. 123;" in Grandin v. Haines L. R. Weekly Notes, 1873, p. 12; and before Lords Justices, Weekly Notes, 1873, p. 92.

STEWARD v. NURSE.

[43 L. J. R., Ch. 384.]

In order to ascertain whether the costs of an administration suit are to be taxed on the higher or lower scale, the value of the estate at the time of the testator's death is the test.

These facts are useful to know at appropriate times and places, but the fact that Mr. Peter has abridged in these words the very brief notes which the Law Journal reporter wrote for purposes of indexing and reference at the head of his reports confers no fresh lustre on the name of Jessel. Triviality is not the only fault we have to find with these inelegant extracts; they are also obscure. To how many lawyers, unacquainted with the case of Hoskins v. Holland, will the following record, which is all that Mr. Peter thinks it worth while to print on the subject, convey any meaning whatever?

The fact that a person is only an assignee in equity of a legal demand is no ground for saying that the forum should be a Court of Equity [or now the Chancery Division].

Yet, upon reading in the Reports the marginal note of which the above is a clumsy abbreviation, we find that it is not only intelligible, but moderately clear. Another point, which seems to establish the literary-monument view of the book, is that three or four decisions are given which are stated to have been reversed on appeal. In one instance the author states the reversal to have "only been by L. JJ. James and Cotton"; but he is not justly open to the same reproach as that Sir Ingoldsby Bray who "said he was ONLY (!!!) a barefooted friar"; for it turns out that the word is meant to refer to the dissent of Lord Justice Lush. In another instance (Fowkes v. Pascoe, p. 57) Mr. Peter manages to leave the reader in doubt whether the judgment of which he gives the substance (or professes to give it) is the judgment which was reversed, or, as in fact it is, the judgment reversing it. Occasional excursions are made into the perilous paths of the oratio directa; but, as the author disdains the aid of inverted commas or other tokens of what he is doing, confusion of persons sometimes ensues. We abstain from specifying a grave fault in the Table of Cases only because we wish to save Mr. Peter the trouble of improving what no one is likely ever to use; but we will make him a present of a suggestion. If, when he publishes another edition, he omits all the letterpress except the preface, the names of the cases, and the references to the reports, he will save a good deal of expense in printing, and the monument to the Master of the Rolls will occupy just as much space on the shelf. The preface, too, can hardly keep its opening sentence:—"No eulogy which has been assigned to the late Sir George Jessel is undeserved." This was probably true when it was written; but, if the publication of this work is such a eulogy, we will never believe that Sir George Jessel did anything to deserve it.

The unusual legislative fertility, in and out of Parliament, of the present year, supplies us with a little heap of new text-books, of all shapes, sizes, and colours. Four of these expound statutes of great importance passed during the recent Session—two treating of the Bankruptcy Act, one of the Agricultural Holdings Act, and one of the Patents and Designs Act.

Mr. A. B. Bence-Jones prints the Bankruptcy Act, with an introduction, and occasional notes to many of its sections, in which he gives references to other enactments, and makes comments and suggestions, some of them founded on the debates in the Grand Committee, which ought to prove serviceable. He is not sanguine about the prospects of the Act, being of opinion that "State interference, even on the ground of purifying national morality, is not likely to be popular in England; and a law which is not popular is not likely to be long unrepealed." Elsewhere in the introduction he insists with some emphasis that the Act is the first great example of the new Radical method of State control over everything. He seems disposed to forget that the whole law of bankruptcy is a piece of State interference, and consists in taking away from creditors what would otherwise be their legal rights. His book is cheap, portable, and pretty. Mr. G. G. Gray's work on the same subject is of a more sternly legal aspect, and though he gives the history of the law and the principles of the present Act in his introduction, in the manner customary in such works, he does not venture further afield into political generalities than to pay Mr. Chamberlain a compliment upon the "able and conciliatory manner" in which he conducted the Bill through the Grand Committee, and to say that all depends upon the way in which the official receivers are appointed, and do their work. He swells his volume to a respectable size by adding to the text of the Act an Analysis, which appears to us to be ingeniously constructed, though it is nearly as long as the Act itself, and requires, or at least has, an "Explication of Analysis," on a separate page. Both these books are necessarily incomplete, pending the publication of the New Bankruptcy Rules. Mr. Bence-Jones's book also contains the text of the Debtor's Act, 1869.

Mr. Russell Griffiths, after introducing his reader to his subject by a disquisition mostly about drainage, dung, and the other joys of the farm, gives a brief and well-arranged summary of the Agricultural Holdings Act, followed by the text of the Act itself, and a number of forms of notices, agreements, and the like, under the Act, which ought to prove useful. The book is very free from legal obscurity, and the distinction between those improvements which introduce greater fertility into the land, and are therefore compensated on the basis of value to the incoming tenant, and those which only stimulate existing fertility, and are therefore compensated on the basis of outlay, is well brought out.

Mr. James Johnson and Mr. J. Henry Johnson, the distinguished authors of The Patentees' Manual, a work whose excellence should commend their present publication to the public, have published an edition of the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, without waiting for the New Rules which the Board of Trade are empowered to make, and without which an account of the working of the law is necessarily incomplete. They promise another edition when the Rules are published. The alterations in the law are compendiously stated in the introduction, and as the rest of the book consists entirely of the text of the Act, its merits or otherwise are purely physical. On this head we have nothing but praise for it. It is most convenient in size and shape, and the printing is excellent.

The enactment of the New Rules of Procedure necessitates a second edition of Mr. Parker's ingenious arrangement of them in the form of an index. The index is preceded by three carefully constructed tables, showing respectively what are the sources from which the New Rules are taken, how each of the preceding set of Rules has been dealt with, and which of the present Rules are wholly new. The whole make up a volume of considerable size, but one which ought to prove highly convenient in practice.

To the same event we owe a third edition of Mr. Sidney Peel's book on Chancery Practice. The procedure in actions in the Chancery Division is traced in forty-nine brief and sufficiently clear chapters, with copious marginal references, and a few of the forms of indorsement of writs, pleadings, and notices, appropriate to the Chancery Division, are reproduced from the New Rules. While Mr. Peel was about it he would have increased the utility of his book by giving more of these.

Mr. Emden's book on Winding-up Companies seems likely to be useful. The subject is a special one, and the bulk of the book shows how large a body of law has been produced by the modern development of this class of enterprise. The book contains a large collection of forms, and the text of the Companies' Acts. On the whole, it gives an exhaustive account of the law in a convenient and available form.

None but a most exigent solicitor would require an almanac to convey a vaster mass of heterogeneous information upon all subjects connected with his profession than is supplied by that published, now for the fortieth time, by Messrs. Waterlow. It is a good deal larger than the one annually furnished by Mr. Whittaker to the general public. It contains a calendar, a diary, a monthly cash account, and 608 pages of valuable lists and statistics, beginning with the Post Office Regulations, including a summary of the proceedings in Parliament during the last Session, a digest of the principal Acts passed, full lists of counsel and solicitors, and an infinity of other matter, and ending with the names of the bank at Ystalyfera, its manager, and London agents.

AMOS AND FERARD ON FIXTURES.*

THE index to this work is a curious monument to the industry of its editors. It would be difficult to name any article of ornament or use—from the collar of office of a Chief Justice to the gibbet on which a murderer is hanged, from the elaborate machine in a great manufactory to the water-tub by a cottage door—which does not find a place in it. It does not, indeed, allude to the swaddling clothes or marriage garments which a man has used in his life; but it gives every information about his shroud and coffin and the vault in which he is laid, and even about his ashes if he is cremated, which, it appears, belong to his widow and not to his heir. It is not, however, the fault of the editors that the index contains such a heterogeneous mass; and it is no small credit to them that they have carefully considered the law as applicable to all these different articles. Knowing what new editions of law books usually are, we expected to find all the old errors, obvious misprints, and wrong references retained with religious care, and the new matter introduced with a disregard of arrangement which would be quaint if it were not irritating. It was a pleasant surprise to find that the editors had taken as much pains with the original matter as they would have taken had they been the authors; and that the new matter had been introduced in its right place. We commend their example to some of their profession whose ideas of the duties of an editor are very far to seek. The result of their industry and skill will be to add to the practical value and reputation of a work that has always been regarded as the standard authority upon a most important, though somewhat complicated, branch of the law of landlord and tenant. To the student of the law, or of the history of the law, the work will be especially valuable, since the editors have given accurate references, not merely to the old authorities, but to the laws of France, Scotland, Prussia, Holland, and Italy. One effect, however, of the thoroughness with which the work has been done is not quite so satisfactory, though the fault is on the right side. For practical purposes, the notes are occasionally overburdened with authorities, and the busy practitioner would have been grateful if he had been referred to one or two salient cases in support of the editors' views, instead of having every case bearing on the particular subject noted for him to hunt up.

The practical value of a work that is not a scientific treatise, but rather a species of guide-book to the maze of case and statute law which governs the subject, is but little affected by erroneous theories. Hence this edition will not prove the less useful to the profession because its editors have adopted Mr. Amos's views of the principle underlying the law. It was, perhaps, inevitable that they should adopt them; yet the work is so good in other respects that we regret they did not feel themselves at liberty to reject a theory which we think as erroneous as it is inequitable, and which seems at times to have hampered the editors themselves.

The subject is of sufficient interest to laymen, all of whom are probably landlords or tenants, heirs or devisees, to warrant a passing notice. More especially is it of interest now when denunciation of landlords is passing into open warfare. The first point of attack will be the landlord's rights to fixtures, and it will be the easier if Mr. Amos's theory is taken to be the correct one. The view which he held, and which his editors have adopted somewhat dubiously, is that fixtures—i.e. personal chattels affixed to the freehold by a tenant—become by their very annexation a part of the freehold, and therefore the property of the landlord. This transfer of property depends on the maxim quidquid plantatur solo, solo cedit, which Mr. Amos described as a relic of feudalism, "inequitable in its principle, and injurious in its effects to the spirit of improvement." It is, perhaps, strange that Mr. Amos did not see how untenable his theory was, since even he was forced to admit that the exceptions were "of so extensive a nature as almost to have subverted the general rule." The whole current of authority, with one exception, had been in favour of the tenant's right to remove what he had put up; his right at common law was clear, for it was only by the Statute of Gloucester that the landlord had any remedy; his property in them while annexed remained—they could be seized by the sheriff in execution. With the one exception of Lord Ellenborough's celebrated decision in Elwes v. Maw, everything pointed to the rule being that the fixtures were the tenant's, subject to an occasional exception in favour of the landlord in certain cases. The authority of Elwes v. Maw has been effectually disposed of in a learned note in the appendix, which shows that Lord Ellenborough's view was opposed to that of all his predecessors, and to the Year-books which he mistranslated. Erroneous as the judgment was, it weighed upon judges for half a century, and it is only in late times that the Courts have been gradually returning to the true theory. For this we are chiefly indebted to the profound learning of Lord Blackburn, to whose judgments English law owes as much as it does to those of Lord Mansfield. In future the current of authority will no doubt be in accord with the cases before Lord Ellenborough's unfortunate decision, and the true principle will be acknowledged to be that fixtures are the landlord's when the object of their annexation was the benefit of the property, but the tenant's when he has put them up "pour occuper son occupation," or "pour son plaisure." This rule will get rid of the difficulty of the degree of annexation, which will be put again in its proper place of being evidence, cogent no doubt, but still merely evidence of the tenant's object. If this be, as we think, the true theory, many seeming anomalies will be removed, and English law redeemed from a charge of being grossly unjust. We believe the editors, had they not felt themselves bound by their author's views, would have adopted it as reasonably explaining why the law holds that a man may remove an ornamental mantelpiece firmly fixed to the wall, though he cannot unscrew a window-fastening. Their not having adopted it has not, however, affected the practical value of their work, as they have provided their readers with all the materials for forming a judgment independent of any theories they put forward. The care they have shown in examining the earlier authorities has been equally given to their examination of the more modern cases, and their references appear to be most accurate. We are not sure that the American cases they quote will prove of much assistance, and we must dissent from the view which they seem to have adopted from America as to the effect of a lease being renewed. The references to the civil law are of more value, and the honest endeavour to understand the meaning of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act and the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, is praiseworthy. The summaries they have given in the body of the work of these extraordinary specimens of legislation seem correct; and, on the whole, we agree with their view of the new Agricultural Holdings Act, though perhaps some of their doubts are a little overstrained. A very valuable addition to the book is a summary of the rules relating to various kinds of fixtures. The profession may be congratulated that the task of re-editing a work of great authority has fallen into the hands of such painstaking editors. They have produced an accurate and well-written work on the law of what is, in Mr. Amos's words, "a species of property which in many instances is of very great value, and involves questions of daily occurrence which affect the rights as well of landlord and tenant as of many other classes of individuals in the ordinary relations of society." We hope, when this edition is exhausted, its editors will give us a work of their own on the subject, and will have the courage to adopt the opinion they suggest to the reader—"that the decision in Elwes v. Maw drew, for the first time, an unnecessary distinction" between trade and other fixtures.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

PROFESSOR S. M. DEUTSCH examines the character of Abelard's theology (1), and the influence exerted by it. The former he considers semi-rationalistic in effect, but not in Abelard's conscious intention, the latter as small. The fact is accounted for partly by Abelard's want of system, partly by the pains taken to suppress his works, attested by the paucity of MSS. The work consists of a general introduction treating of the general state of dogmatic theology at the beginning of the twelfth century, of a review of Abelard's life and writings, of a general introduction to his philosophical system, and of the application of his principles to theology, under the heads of the Trinity, Christology, the Doctrine of Sin, and the Doctrine of Redemption.

Dr. Schliemann's new work on his Trojan discoveries (2) has already received so much notice in various quarters that we need here only chronicle the appearance of the German edition, with the remark that Dr. Schliemann and the more candid among his critics seem to have at length arrived at a satisfactory modus vivendi.

A word of recognition must also be accorded to a new and greatly improved edition of a standard work, Overbeck's Pompeii (3), with illustrations by Mau. The course of discovery has been attentively followed, and text and plates together offer a living and breathing representation of the familiar life of the ancients.

Friedrich Kluge's etymological dictionary of the German language (4) is a highly meritorious work, distinguished by the clearness and conciseness of its definitions and the copiousness of its illustrations from allied languages and dialects, especially of the Germanic family. English and Anglo-Saxon are especially drawn upon. Scientific compounds and recent importations from the classical languages are very properly omitted; but almost all really important words in common use are to be found. The work is calculated to be most useful to the English as well as to the German student. One rare quality of the author is his sobriety of judgment; he is continually discarding the most tempting etymologies, and refusing to trace the history of words beyond the point up to which it is reasonably certain.

Herr Ehrlich's treatise on the art of living with restraint and decorum (5) is a sensible, well-written book, somewhat too solid for an English taste, but well adapted to the demands of a public that loves to exhaust a question. The subject itself, indeed, is hardly one on which much difference is likely to prevail among cultivated men, and the interest of the book consists less in the author's ethics than in the undesigned illustration of national characteristics. It is pleasing to note the substantial identity of the rules of civilization everywhere, and Germans, English, French, and Americans arriving by different paths at substantially the same result. English writers are quoted with much respect, and justice is done to the strong points of our social and educational systems.

The shores of the Gulf of Genoa are certainly one of the most delightful regions of Europe, and in Count Adelmann (6) they have found one of the most easily pleased and exuberantly happy of Continental tourists. It might be easy to find more observant, graphic, or instructive travellers; not so easy to meet with a companion so agreeable from the mere contagiousness of genial enjoyment. In truth, the writer's appreciation of the beauties of the Riviera is so cordial that the reality might almost prove disappointing; and his book is therefore less to be recommended to intending visitors than to returned tourists wishful to revive pleasant recollections.

August Trefort (7) is a Hungarian savant and statesman who publishes a small volume of miscellanies as a memorial to his deceased son. They are therefore hardly objects of criticism. It may truly be said, however, that if but slight in treatment they do credit to the writer's good feeling and good sense. As a member of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences, it has sometimes fallen to his lot to pronounce eulogiums on deceased foreign members. The elaborate oration on Tocqueville and the slighter one on Macaulay are interesting illustrations of the influence exerted by these great writers in Hungary; while that on Fallmerayer is a real contribution to our knowledge of a remarkable man, one of the chief promoters of the political and intellectual movement of Eastern Europe.

Herr Leopold Katscher (8) has selected as subjects for his biographico-critical essays nine persons, foreign to Germany, as characteristic types of the intellectual currents of the nineteenth century. Four are women and five men; five English, three French, and one a Dane. The studies of the four ladies—George Sand, George Eliot, Currer Bell, and Harriet Martineau—are the fullest and most satisfactory. They show an intelligent and conscientious use of all accessible biographical material, and will contribute to make the English author as well known on the Continent as the world-famous Frenchwoman. The more interesting of the other essays is the one on Buckle, whose biography Herr Katscher has already given to the German public in a compendious form.

It is fifteen years since Dr. Landau first published his essay on the sources of the Decameron (9). The present edition is so much enlarged that it is entitled to be accounted a new work. It is a treasury of information, not so much, however, about the Decameron as about the Panchatantra, the Seven Wise Masters, Dolopathos, the story of the three rings, every celebrated legend of which any trace, however small, is to be discovered in Boccaccio. In fact Boccaccio himself is frequently almost invisible amid the opulence of illustration. This luxuriance of detail, however, renders the work very amusing; and it might almost serve as a guide to the intricate ramifications of those popular fictions which have obtained universal currency.

It would be well for France if all "contributions towards the history of her genius and manners" were as pure and innocent as that which Dr. Scheffler is enabled to offer by his study of French popular poetry. The wealth of France in this department is very great, and no literature of the kind can possess greater sweetness and more arch simplicity. It seems surprising that it should be so little known, even with full allowance for the extent to which the literature of the cultivated classes has been formed upon classical models. In Germany, as Dr. Scheffler remarks (10), popular and cultured literature have united to form a national literature. In France their estrangement is almost total, although some great writers like George Sand have occasionally condescended to derive a portion of their inspiration from the manners and ideas of the peasantry. Popular literature is moreover rapidly dying out, and the capacity for either producing or enjoying it seems to have all but departed. MM. Luzel, Villemarqué, Champfleury, Theuriet, and other collectors have done much to rescue what is still extant, and even to retrieve what has been lost; but their exertions have produced no effect on French literature remotely comparable to that achieved by the Percy Ballads in England or "Des Knaben Wunderhorn" in Germany. A well-intended endeavour of Louis Napoleon's Government to form a complete collection of French popular poetry came to nothing; and it is to be feared that Dr. Scheffler, writing in so unpopular a language, will not be able to convince the French what treasures they have at home. Although he is seldom able to present any piece in its entirety, there is enough in his excerpts of fancy, tenderness, pathos, gaiety, and solid good sense to convey a most favourable impression of the people from whom they have emanated. They are not generally distinguished by the highest poetical qualities; their charm consists rather in their perfect fidelity to the facts of nature and of human existence. Thus, for example, the blending in the wedding songs of admonitions on the cares which the bride is about to assume with the felicitations becoming the occasion is touching in its truth and feeling. Dr. Scheffler's first volume is devoted to the songs of common life under the six divisions of happy love, unfortunate love, betrothal and bridal, married life, children and household, and festivals. The second volume will contain military songs, ballads, tales, and proverbs. The writer's method is to take the particular idea or custom illustrated by the poems belonging to its cycle, and further elucidate it by quotations exhibiting the various versions current in different parts of France, in themselves only too brief, but accompanied by a glossary of even superfluous fulness. Two introductory chapters respectively institute a comparison between German and French popular poetry, and discuss the history of the latter and of the principal endeavours to preserve it and make it known.

The history of the Royal Theatre at Hanover (11) presents some curious features. As early as 1581 Henry Julius, Duke of Brunswick, appears as a dramatic poet with the "comedy of Vincentius Ladislaus, Satrap of Mantua." A hundred years later, Ernest Augustus, father of George I., causes Italian operas to be represented in a very grandiose style, the mechanist being apparently at least as important as the musician. Among the stage properties is recorded "a griffin's nest." A little later we find Handel the presiding genius, until he forsakes Hanover for England. Later still Lessing's Emilia Galotti is performed, and nearly at the same time the theatre is closed altogether, and the Hanoverian public has to make a shift with puppet plays. So it goes on until, in 1866, the King of Prussia is necessitated by political events to take the theatre under his august protection, and the company, after a decent tribute to their old patron, turn dutifully towards the rising sun.

The degree to which the German public is engrossed by material interests is certainly to be lamented, and should any real poets appear in the country, it is probable that they would long experience a disheartening neglect. At the same time the public cannot be reasonably blamed for declining to be worked up into a merely factitious enthusiasm. When Dr. Rogge (12) reproachfully reminds it that fifteen thousand copies of a poem of Victor Hugo's have been sold in one day, he omits to remark that there is some little difference between the poems of Victor Hugo and those of his client Count von Schack. Schack is not to be despised, he has essayed several styles of poetry with credit; but the very specimens selected by his admirer must convince any reader that in original verse he is merely an elegant dilettante, whose best point is his mastery of metrical form. The appreciation of this kind of excellence is rightly left to amateurs. Platen is incomparably superior to Schack as a master of form, but the experience of half a century has shown that he never can be popular. In his zeal to prove Count von Schack a distinguished poet, Dr. Rogge passes lightly over his really valuable performances, his excellent history of the Spanish drama, his work on Arab literature in Sicily, and his translation of Firdusi.

"My Repose" (13) seems at first sight a strange title for poems at once so impassioned and so mournful as the majority of those published under this designation by the Queen of Roumania. It appears, however, that the title is derived from her Majesty's country seat, a view of which is prefixed. "Carmen Sylva" possesses abundance of genuine poetical talent; her misfortune is a fatal fluency, evinced in the mere undertaking to write a poem for every day in the year. Could these have been condensed into a poem for every day in the month, the poetical result would not have been inconsiderable. It is surprising that an authoress who has shown herself capable of such point and terseness in her admirable aphorisms should be so little on her guard against diffuseness in lyrical poetry. As a rule, the poems want healthy objectivity even more than concentration; but some are excellent both in form and feeling, as, for instance, the lines on Schopenhauer's misogyny, and the little pieces entitled "Die Sternschnuppe" and "Wenn Frauen scherzen."

The four first published, and the four best, of Tennyson's Idylls of the King (14) have been admirably rendered by Dr. Carl Weiser, already favourably known as a translator of Shelley. Dr. Weisers' rendering is most accurate, and he deserves especial praise for his skill in reproducing the metrical structure of his original. German lyrical poetry is almost always melodious, German blank verse very seldom; but Dr. Weiser has shown that it is quite possible to make it so.

Spielhagen's last novel (15) is not one of his most important, but is a fairly interesting and attractive story, compounded out of old materials with the dexterity of a practised artist. There is a virtuous hero, somewhat too faultless, who is involved in trouble by the villany of a Greek and an old German—miscreants of too conventional a type—and at last succumbs as a mortal to live as a model. The main action is diversified by a number of minor incidents and personages, most of whom we seem to know already; but the bright style and animated narrative convey an impression of power, and make the book generally entertaining.

"Spring Storms" (16), a tale for young ladies, chiefly told in letters, is prettily sentimental, sound and wholesome at the same time, and well adapted for its public.

The Deutsche Rundschau (17) has another of its anonymous and probably officially inspired articles upon German foreign policy, evincing profound satisfaction at the isolation of Russia and France. Austria, it is laid down, must be the protection of the Slavonian nationalities in the Balkan peninsula, a view incompatible with any Russian alliance. It is strangely asserted that the Salisbury-Schouvaloff agreement was brought about by the arrival of a Russian envoy at Cabul, which did not take place for several months afterwards. Julius Rodenberg's pictures of Berlin life are entertaining, and include sketches of Rahel, Chamisso, and other notabilities. Turgeneff's reminiscences, on the other hand, this month fail to interest, as the persons described are little known out of Russia, and the novelist has not depicted them in the lively colours with which he was wont to invest his fictitious personages. C. F. Meyer's novelette of "The Monk's Wedding" is concluded with a powerful, if somewhat fantastic, scene; and Dr. Hirschfeld's narrative of his travels in Asia Minor is also terminated.

The November and December numbers of Auf der Höhe (18) contain nothing remarkable except the continuation of Fritz Lemmermeyer's "Alchemist," an historical romance of real power, although the speeches are frequently much too long and savour more of the style of the nineteenth than of the fifteenth century.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE latest work of the author of Monsieur, Madame et Bébé has disturbed the minds of Parisian critics. It has been called a bid for the Academy, and has been reviled and wept over as a sad example of the "Lost Leader" kind. That any one should ever have honestly deemed it possible that M. Droz should partake of "la stupidité égalitaire" is only a proof of what the said stupidity can bring itself to. Tristesses et Sourires (1), supposed to be the work, in a kind of diary, of an old lady of quality in the country, is for the most part a severe satire on modern politics, modern manners, modern thoughts on religion, and modern ways generally in France. The accusation which has been brought against the author, that in some of his earlier work he was far from tender to follies and weaknesses of a different kind, is obviously absurd. The satirist shoots folly as it flies, and it is not his fault that the folly which flies to-day is not the same with that which flew yesterday. The glaring drawbacks of the present régime in France could hardly fail to provoke a satirist who, like M. Droz, has always, even in his most skittish moments, been free from the peculiar canaille smirch which marks the manners, the literature, the politics of the Third Republic. At the same time, it is fair to remark that the volume is perhaps rather too uniformly didactic, and that the form hardly admits of sufficient excursions into the personal and dramatic. M. Gustave Droz gives personal and dramatic touches with such felicity that one cannot help regretting the comparative paucity of them here. Still, the book is excellently French, and admirably witty in parts; and, when it is compared with the work of younger writers, the proverb about old wine and new is certainly not falsified.

It is a thesis which might be supported by some argument that the French are, on the whole, the youngest people in the world, though in part they are probably the oldest. Coming from this large proposition to a smaller one, it is certain that they are much younger than the English. French caricature and extravaganza, when they are healthy and honest (as they are much more often than superficial readers suppose), have a genuine childishness about them for which in England we must go well behind the nineteenth century. In France here is M. Robida (2) with another book which, whether its readers like it as well as La tour enchantée or not, is a very capital book of its kind. The story is, of course, next to nothing. How M. Dumollet (bourgeois de Paris) resolved to go to St. Malo some sixty years ago to carry off his bride; how he borrowed a donkey to ride, fearing the dangerous diligence; what manifold troubles this animal got him into, so that at last he was driven to appear with a troop of strollers as "Mokodingo, the Great Cannibal of Africa"; how even after this disaster he tumbled out of the frying-pan into the fire—all this is told amusingly enough, but it is little more than the vehicle of M. Robida's abundant, fantastically coloured, but carefully drawn and very cleverly composed, designs. Both text and illustrations are really laughable, but the critic, if not the general reader, cannot help noticing the character of their laughableness. There is not one iota of satire properly so called, whether political or literary, or social or any other. The extravaganza is a pure extravaganza, without the remotest purpose beyond muscle-moving.

Two volumes on philosophical subjects (3 and 4), neither of which requires a long notice, may here be mentioned to their probable readers. The first, M. Fouillée's ethical critique, is one of those careful and industrious surveys of other men's thoughts which are commoner in all European languages nowadays in the literature of philosophy than contributions of original thought. M. Ferrière's title explains his standpoint, which is that of the extremest materialism; but his book also is rather a compilation and an anthology than a substantive work.

We noticed recently one of the oldest of European periodicals; we may now notice the absolutely youngest, in the shape of the Revue internationale (5), which Signor Angelo de Gubernatis has started at Florence in French, with contributors and correspondents everywhere, from Tobolsk to Tangier. M. de Gubernatis made a very fair start at Christmas, with a list of articles including the full text of Mr. Max Muller's Bristol lecture on Rammohun Roy: a paper on Belgian parties, from M. de Laveleye; and a fair collection of miscellaneous papers, not forgetting fiction. His second number, dated the 10th of this month, has a pendant to the Rammohun Roy lecture in the shape of a lecture on Grotius by M. Opzoomer, President of the Amsterdam Academy of Science, and both contain interesting articles on the Italian theatre. We are not quite certain that the inclusion in such a Review of a chronique politique is wise. As a bare record of events, it is superfluous; and the moment it attempts to be anything else the international character of it is pretty sure to suffer. Thus early, too, M. de Gubernatis has had a little theological difficulty, which he has explained, but of which he will probably be wise to avoid a repetition.

The appearances of M. Octave Feuillet in print are not very numerous now; so that while we are expecting La Veuve it is worth directing readers to some pleasant scènes dialoguées of his in the Revue des deux mondes (6) for the new year.

We do not know that Le boul' Mich' (7) can be recommended Virginibusque puerisque, or, to speak less hypocritically, we do know that it cannot. But fortunately it is written in a lingo which remarkably few pueri and fewer virgines are likely to understand. How many English readers could answer the question "What is a vadrouilleur?" Le boul' Mich', however, is an ambitious book: and, as it is not in the least amusing, it may pretend to be really a "document" in the style of the master—M. de Goncourt—to whom M. Caraguel dedicates it. What it pretends to do is to show what the life led in the successors of the Café Momus of thirty, and the Brasserie des Martyrs of twenty, years ago is like. These resorts lie chiefly in or about the Boulevard St.-Michel—whence the slang title. If anybody chooses to follow the fortunes of Tralala, the "modern" strong man, and Tatave, the "modern" weak one, he will see pass before him an unsavoury, and doubtless an exaggerated, dioramas. But there are reasons for thinking that M. Caraguel is not writing quite out of his own head, and the result certainly "gives to think" as to the advantages of a century of open questions in politics, morals, and religion. Only M. Caraguel has a word of comfort which is rather a double-edged word. "N'est pas Michelin qui veut" it would appear, and the average provincial in his years of student life rarely attains to the full dignity of a vadrouilleur. This, all things considered, as here represented by the historian of vadrouillerie, a noun which we venture to coin, is perhaps just as well for France, if not for Paris. La faute de la comtesse (8) is a much more ordinary sort of book, telling the old story of a middle-aged man who marries a young wife, and without any unkind intention makes her unhappy. The falls of Schaffhausen finish the story with a perhaps unnecessary tragedy.

DEAR SIR,—My Partner, CHARLES S. JERRAM, who has been here so many years, is, I am happy to say, still working with me. The CHARLES S. JERRAM, of Godalming, whose Advertisement you have seen, is my Partner's cousin, an old Pupil and very good friend of ours.
Yours truly,

ANNUAL SALE,
TEN MILLIONS.

(Incorporated 43 and 44 Vic. cap. 199, August 26, 1880.)

Four per Cent. Perpetual Preference Stock, 1884.

Price of Issue, £85 for every £100 of Stock.

Dividend contingent on the profits of each year, and to commence to accrue on January 1, 1887.

Authorized by the Special General Meetings of the Proprietors, held on February 24, 1883, and on August 25, 1883, in accordance with the provisions of the Hull, Barnsley, and West Riding Junction Railway and Dock (New Works) Act, 1882, and the Hull, Barnsley, and West Riding Junction Railway and Dock (Various Powers) Act, 1883.

Subscriptions are invited for the balance unallotted of the above Stock, on the following terms and conditions:—

1. The price is £85 for every £100 of stock, and no sum less than £10, or that is not a multiple of £10, will be allotted.

2. The deposit on allotment is £20 per £100, and must be paid to the Bankers named on the Allotment Letter on or before the 31st January, 1884. If not so paid, the allotment will thereupon become cancelled.

3. The balance is payable in the instalments, and on the dates of payment subjoined, viz.:—

£15	per £100 on the	1st July, 1884.
£15	" "	1st January, 1885.
£15	" "	1st July, 1885.
£20	" "	1st January, 1886.

4. Subscribers will have the option of paying the above-named instalments in advance on the day fixed for the payment of the deposit, or any one of the days fixed for the payment of the first or any subsequent instalment; and interest at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum will be allowed by way of rebate for the time the payment in advance is made.

5. If an instalment remains unpaid after the due date, interest at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum will be charged upon the arrears.

6. In the event of any instalment and the interest due thereon remaining unpaid for more than thirty days after the due date, the Directors reserve to themselves the right to declare all previous payments forfeited, and to dispose of the Stock at their discretion for the benefit of the Company.

7. No sum less than £10, or that is not a multiple of £10, will be transferred, and Stock transferred is to be held by the transferee subject to the conditions of the original Allotment; and no Stock will be transferred until any instalment, of which notice has been given, is paid.

8. Twenty-one days' notice of the first and subsequent instalments will be sent by post to the Registered Proprietors of the Stock.

The rapidly approaching completion of the Company's works, authorized by their Act of 1880, renders it very desirable that the extension of the Company's system to Huddersfield and Halifax, the construction of the new Fish Dock, and the completion of the Central Passenger Station in Hull, as authorized by the Company's Acts of 1882 and 1883 respectively, should be proceeded with without delay.

It has been resolved to enter upon a contract with Messrs. Lucas and Aird for the construction of the entire works, on arbitration terms and prices, with a view to the strictest economy. This arrangement has been accepted by that firm, and it is believed the works can be completed in three years from their commencement.

The trade of Hull, upon which the prosperity of the Company's undertaking must always largely depend, continues steadily to increase. The tonnage upon which dock dues were paid in 1882 was 2,426,412 tons, against 2,317,759 tons in the previous year, showing an increase of 108,653 tons. The estimated tonnage to the close of this year is 2,525,000, showing a further increase of about 100,000 tons over 1882, and a total increase over 1881 of more than 200,000 tons.

The extension of the Company's system to Huddersfield and Halifax will be of incalculable advantage in preserving and fostering the trade of the port with the West Riding and the Midland districts.

The construction of the Fish Dock, urgently called for by a large section of the trade, will largely increase the volume of that trade, and put a highly remunerative traffic on the railway.

The Company's Act of 1882, authorizing the extension of their system to Huddersfield and Halifax, was promoted at the request of a deputation, composed of members of the Corporations and Chambers of Commerce of Huddersfield and Halifax, and the merchants and manufacturers of those towns and the surrounding districts.

It is no exaggeration to say that the deputation, in seeking to obtain further railway facilities, truthfully represented the views not only of the respective corporations to which they belonged, but those also of a manufacturing and industrial population approaching 400,000 in number.

The Corporations of Huddersfield and Halifax were desirous of contributing each the sum of £50,000 to the Capital required, and their desire in this respect (although not acceded to by Parliament) was in each case unanimously supported by the Ratepayers at public meeting assembled.

The objects sought to be obtained by the Company's Act of 1882 were:—

1. The establishment of good local connexion between Halifax and Huddersfield.
2. To obtain improved communication between those towns and the Midland districts, the West of England, and the Port of Hull.
3. To open up new sources of Coal supply, for household and manufacturing purposes, to the towns of Huddersfield and Halifax, and the surrounding districts.

That portion of the line which lies between Cudworth and Huddersfield passes through an important section of the Flockton coal field, and, in addition, will open out the South Yorkshire coal held to the Huddersfield merchants and manufacturers, who are in a great measure forced to seek their supplies by means of carting at a heavy cost. The railway facilities hitherto given to the towns of Huddersfield and Halifax have been lamentable in the extreme, not only as regards local traffic with each other, but with regard also to their connexion with the Midland districts, and with London.

This state of affairs will be entirely remedied by the construction of the proposed line, together with the Joint Midland and Hull and Barnsley Station at Cudworth.

The HULL AND BARNSLEY RAILWAY COMPANY have made an agreement with the Midland Railway Company, by the use of the Line is accorded to the latter Company on equitable terms, and the HULL AND BARNSLEY COMPANY have received an intimation, in writing, that the Midland Railway Company, in entering into that agreement in lieu for running powers over this line, did so with the full intention, which they still retain, of exercising those running powers between Cudworth, Huddersfield, and Halifax, upon completion of the railway.

The relations between the HULL AND BARNSLEY RAILWAY COMPANY and the Midland Railway Company continue to be of a friendly character, and hold out the strongest assurance that the traffic of both Companies between Cudworth, Huddersfield, and Halifax will be worked harmoniously and economically, and that the whole trade of the district will be thoroughly developed.

It is impossible to conceive any announcement of greater importance than the above, to all who have the welfare at heart of the commercial and industrial classes in the West Riding of Yorkshire, or who are interested in the continued and increasing prosperity of the Midland Railway Company.

There can be little doubt that the co-operation of the two Companies working over this line will alone secure the payment of the reasonable dividend of 4½ per cent.; but it should be borne in mind that when the dividend on this Stock commences to accrue it will be secured as a first charge (after payment of Debenture interest) upon the profits of the entire property of the HULL AND BARNSLEY RAILWAY COMPANY, which will consist, when their authorized works are completed, of 97 miles of railway and a Dock Estate of about 400 acres in extent, supplied with two docks of 46 acres and 14 acres of water space respectively.

The price of £85 per £100, at which this Stock is issued, renders it a very desirable investment, having regard to the prospect of its ultimate value, and the present value of English Railway Preference Stocks.

A Bill has been deposited in Parliament by the merchants and others of Halifax for the construction of the necessary short connecting link between that town and Holmfield, on the Great Northern Railway, and it is hoped that arrangements will be made whereby, if this proposed line be also sanctioned, the HULL AND BARNSLEY COMPANY (and through them the Midland Railway Company) will have the use of it on terms to be agreed, thus securing the long-needed route to Scotland and the North through Huddersfield and Halifax.

An epitome of some of the principal evidence given before the Committees of Parliament, together with explanatory maps, and forms of application, may be obtained from the Bankers of the Company, Messrs. Smith, Payne, and Smiths, London; Messrs. Samuel Smith Bros. & Co., Hull; also from the following Brokers:—Messrs. Capel & Co., 5 Throgmorton Street, London; Messrs. Mullens, Marshall, & Co., Lombard Street, London; Messrs. Moore & Son, Huddersfield; Mr. J. H. Thackrah, Halifax; and from the SECRETARY at the Offices of the Company in Hull.

A NEW BOOK BY THE LATE JOHN RICHARD GREEN.

THE CONQUEST of ENGLAND. By JOHN RICHARD GREEN, M.A., LL.D., Author of "The Making of England" &c. With Portrait and Maps. Demy 8vo. 18s.

"We have no hesitation in saying that the opening chapter of this volume—which, as Mrs Green tells us, was the last piece of work he did—is a thought, sympathy, and comprehensive grasp of the subject not surpassed by any other passage in his writings. ... In these and many other passages we recognise not only the genius of Mr. Green's mind, but an advance upon his earlier work. ... The sincere impartiality and independence of these remarks intensify the regret which not only every reader of English history, but every Englishman, must feel that the author should, in the very infancy of his knowledge and his powers, have been snatched away from a task for which no one now alive possesses his peculiar qualifications."
The Athenæum.

NEW NOVEL BY MRS. OLIPHANT.

HESTER: a Story of Contemporary Life. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "The Curate in Charge," "Young Musgrave," &c. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

SIXTH AND CHEAPER EDITION, IN ONE VOLUME,

ALTIORA PETO.

By LAURENCE OLIPHANT.

New Edition, crown 8vo. with Illustrations, 6s.

SOME OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Brilliant and delightful.....The book is one which everybody will greedily read and greatly admire. It is the outcome of singular originality and independence. ....It contains enough to equip a score of ordinary novelists for the production of a score of extraordinary novels."—Athenæum.

"May be classed as a novel of a thousand, if only for the fact that it may be read through consecutively twice, or even thrice, with augmented pleasure to the reader with every fresh perusal.....It is not as a story that 'Altiora Peto' challenges warm admiration, but as a brilliant picture of life and manners."—Spectator.

"To say that the book is one of the most entertained and brilliantly written that has seen the light of many a long day is to accord to it no greater praise than it deserves.....Every page sparkles with crystallized observations."—Morning Advertiser.

"It is impossible to exaggerate the sense of infinite refreshment inspired by this work of genuine wit, of strong good sense, of sharp insight, and of scholarly style."—Graphic.

"The book is full of humour and drollery."—Saturday Review.

SECOND EDITION.

By LOUIS J. JENNINGS,

Author of "Field Paths and Green Lanes," "Rambles among the Hills," &c.

"The Millionaire is the romantic figure par excellence of the nineteenth century. Mr. Dexter Fyle, the American millionaire of the story before us, is a decided success. We follow his doings with unflagging interest. To the story we have little but praise to give."
Pall Mall Gazette.

"'The Millionaire' shows much ability. It is never dull. No just idea of its merits could be given without saying that it is a novel of a high order, and a piece of excellent workmanship."—Athenæum.

"Where the author breaks new ground is in America, with the railroad beings of New York and the lobbyists of Washington; the character of Dexter Fyle, the millionaire, is wholly fresh and wonderfully interesting. The book throughout is smart and racy."—World.

THIRD EDITION.

ARMINIUS VAMBÉRY: his Life and Adventures. Written by HIMSELF. With Woodbury Portrait and 14 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. cloth extra, 16s.

"Never, perhaps, has the ethos of the traveller proper, who is not strictly a geographer, or a political agent, or a missionary, or a glorified bagman, or a filibuster, been better exemplified."—Saturday Review.

"We must leave the reader to accompany Professor Vambéry in person on his adventurous tour, but we must give him the pleasing assurance that the learned author has lost none of the verve and fluency which made his former works such pleasant reading."—Times.

"The reader who, desirous to know more of the man, may take up these lively biographical reminiscences, will assuredly not be disappointed. The character and temperament of the writer come out well in his quaint and vigorous style."—Athenæum.

"This autobiography is a most fascinating work, full of interesting and curious experiences in the most varied countries and conditions of life."—Contemporary Review.

"Written in a most captivating manner and illustrates the qualities that should be possessed by the explorer."—Novoe Vremya, St. Petersburg.

SECOND EDITION.

GLADYS FANE: the Story of Two Lives. By the Author of "Charlotte Brontë: a Monograph" &c. 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth extra, 12s.

"A story as beautiful as life and as sad as death ....We could not wear in our heart's core the man who could read aloud with unfaltering voice and undimmed eye the last pages of this prose story, which is almost a poem."—Standard.

"The beautiful and terse descriptions of scenery which we find in this story themselves suggest a genuine poetic element in Mr. Reid.... We heartily welcome his success in this new field.....His pleasant and fascinating story. We may well hope that this promising novel may be succeeded by others of still higher general power and still more vivid execution."—Spectator.

THE HANDBOOK OF THE FARM SERIES.

THE EQUIPMENT of the FARM. By WM. BURNESS, J. C. MORTON, and G. MURRAY.

The aim of the Series is to display the means best calculated to secure an intelligent development of the resources of our soil, and, with the assistance which advanced chemical investigation provides, to direct those engaged in Agricultural Industry towards the most successful results. The series will be helpful equally to the Teacher and the Student in Agriculture no less than to the Farmer, dealing in its courses with the Chemistry of the Farm; the Live Stock and the Crops; the Soil and its Tillage; and the Equipment of the Farm or the Estate. Each book will be complete in itself, and the short series of seven volumes, by various writers, who have been specially selected, will form a complete HANDBOOK OF THE FARM, which will be abreast of the intelligent man's every-day requirements, and enable him economically to utilize the advantages which an ever-widening science places within his reach.

The preceding volumes, also 2s. 6d. each, are—

MEN OF THE TIME:

A Dictionary of Contemporaries, containing Biographical Notices of Eminent Characters of both Sexes.

Seventh Edition, Revised and brought down to the Present Time.

By THOMPSON COOPER, F.S.A.

From the Times, January 11, 1884:—"We are glad to draw attention to the Eleventh edition of this valuable and well-known book of reference, published by Messrs. Routledge & Sons. It is four years since the last edition was published, and the editor, Mr. Thompson Cooper, F.S.A., informs us in his preface that in the intervening period 434 persons who were noticed in its pages have died, and consequently disappear from the body of the book, and take their places as the 'necrology' at the end. Among the most recent and important of these is the late Lord Overstone. The bulk of the volume, however, has not diminished. But is increased by nearly 100 pages, owing in part to the numerous fresh memoirs of persons who have recently come prominently before the public, and in part to the careful revision of most of the existing notices and the additions that have been made to them. It is not difficult to believe that the present edition is, as the editor assures us, 'to all intents and purposes a new book.' It is hardly necessary to recommend a work which is well-nigh indispensable to all who wish to know something of contemporary biography."

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, BROADWAY, LUDGATE HILL.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE'S NEW NOVEL.

From the TIMES.

"In 'The Brandreths' we have a sequel to Mr. Beresford Hope's clever novel of 'Strictly Tied Up,' and we may add that it is a decided improvement on his maiden effort. He has not only laid a firmer grasp on some of those characters which in his earlier work were rather wanting in outline and individuality, but he has secured the interest of his readers by simplifying his story. 'The Brandreths,' although it abounds in the study of personal character, in vestigating the innermost life and analysing the feelings of the hero, is nevertheless in great measure a political novel. Mr. Hope writes of political life and the vicissitudes of parties with the knowledge and experience of a veteran politician. Not a few of the casual pictures of society are exceedingly faithful and lively. We repeat, in conclusion, that the novel is one which will repay careful reading."

MR. GEORGE AND HIS BOOKS.

SEVERAL hard things might be said of the present day, but probably none of them would be juster than the accusation that modern man has to a great extent lost the sense of perspective, and appears to confuse altogether the relative bigness of things. To illustrate this proposition at length, it would be necessary to adopt what has been oppro briously called the Queen of Sheba style of writing; but one particular illustration happens to be pat to the purpose. If Mr. HENRY GEORGE happened to be that one man in a million who can correctly take his own measure, he would certainly enjoy a vast amount of laughter in his sleeve at the fuss which a certain portion of the British public is making about him. Persons distinguished or persons notorious take the chair at his meetings, and, gravely disavowing agreement with his opinions, plead at the same time that those opinions are such very important opinions, and Mr. GEORGE himself such a very important man, that they cannot refuse the opportunity of introducing, &c. Members of the Government elaborately discuss him, and supporters of the Government anxiously endeavour to prove that nothing that the Government has done has anything like a connexion with anything that Mr. GEORGE proposes. And, lastly, reviewers who have to tackle his books approach him with as many apologies and as elaborate propitiations as they can devise to soften their demonstrations that his theories are naught and his argumentative power a minus quantity. He is told that he is a "poet," an "enthusiast of humanity," a "fascinating writer"; that his presentation of his case is "admirable," if only the case were a better one; his rhetoric "excellent"; his chapters and passages "brilliant," "piquant," "pungent," "vigorous," "incisive"; his illustrations ingenious, his style lucid and eloquent.

Now, however we may agree with the proposition that it is stupid as well as wrong to depreciate form because you dislike matter, it is impossible for any one who has been disciplined to the taking of literary, political, and philosophical altitudes to admit even this excellence in Mr. GEORGE. He is fluent enough, no doubt. He has the quality, which seems to be more and more supplanting all other qualities in its effect on public opinion, of believing, or apparently believing, what he says; and he says it in a loud and positive manner, which may possibly be mistaken for vigour by persons who would think the Provinciales feeble. His American breeding has given him a certain freedom from English convention, and has especially encouraged him to appeal to the Deity and use religious dialect after a manner now much rarer in England than it once was, and proportionately more striking to the general. He uses big brushes and very bright or very dark colours. But that any competent critic reading the book called Social Problems which Messrs. KEGAN PAUL & TRENCH have just published for him as a sequel to Progress and Poverty, should really consider him an effective writer, not to say an effective reasoner, would be a very surprising thing. The book is essentially an appeal to ignorance in its method and style no less than in its arguments, and in what do duty in it for facts. A harrowing picture of the sack of London and New York by the proletariat is not an argument for refusing to recognize property in land or in anything; it is the strongest argument for rigidly maintaining the sacredness of property. A quotation from the Declaration of Independence, whatever it may be in New York, is certainly not in London a valid or final establishment of Mr. GEORGE's favourite proposition that man is born to be a landowner (or at least a landholder) as certainly as, according to older and better authorities, he is born to trouble. You do not gain anything either in rhetoric or in logic by calling the English people "stupid" because they decline to rob the Duke of WESTMINSTER. When Mr. GEORGE says that "the first "ASTOR made an arrangement with certain persons living "in his time by virtue of which his children are now allowed "to tax other people's children," he says something nearly as absurd as a panegyrist of the ASTOR family would say who should describe the original ASTOR as having made a beneficent arrangement whereby the children of those with whom he made it are housed instead of being houseless. If, as has been abundantly shown already, Mr. GEORGE's history is fiction, his economy moonshine, his proposal to make the State directly dependent on the changing seasons and the varying skill of agriculturists a piece of political madness; if his ethics are limited to the assertion of the divine right of robbery, and his theology an assumption that the divine thoughts are necessarily identical with Mr. GEORGE's crotchets, the connexion of his theories with the supposed facts which prove his enthusiasm for humanity deserves epithets no more complimentary than these. In neither of his books is there the slightest attempt to show in what way the expropriation he proposes would benefit any living soul, or a single recognition of the fact that, as all his scheme could do would be to relieve taxpayers of taxation, the paupers and the prostitutes, the outcast children and the starved labourers whom he pities, and not one of whom pays a penny of taxes except on excisable liquors and a few other commodities, would be in no way relieved. Nowhere is it possible to find the least consciousness that if the scheme could ever be got to work at all—if mankind at large could be seized of the estates with which Mr. GEORGE would invest it, and, further, could be got to retain possession thereof, the only result would be a condition of permanent stagnation in which all men would live like negro squatters. The "natural, equal, and inalienable "rights of men," which Mr. GEORGE recognizes, mean simply the natural and unalterable level of savagery. To put it briefly, Mr. GEORGE's past is a fiction, and his future, if it could be brought about, would be a pigstye.

With a preacher of this kind, the best way is neither to lift the hands at him in pious horror, nor to waste the breath in arguments, nor, least of all, to assure him that he is a most eloquent man (which he is not) and a philanthropic (which in any true sense he is still less), and that if he would only be a little more orthodox and a little less ignorant, he would be a welcome ally to social reformers. Every now and then, in order that his mischievous nonsense may not do the harm which mischievous nonsense let entirely alone sometimes does, it may be well to repeat the demonstration of its nonsensical mischief. But for the most part he may be left to his own devices. He is understood to be going to the Highlands to talk to the crofters. If he finds the crofters very much enlivened by the prospect of having to pay their rents to the Government instead of to the lairds, it will be a little surprising. If he says anything inciting to a breach of the peace or encouraging to any illegal act, the Procurator-Fiscal of the district will have to see whether in the tolerably intricate net of Scotch law there is not a mesh that will fit Mr. GEORGE. But, on the whole, the more his gospel is expounded the better, for the more evident its exceeding poverty in good things will become. Judging from some remarks made the other night at Birmingham, Mr. George is persuaded on the subject of capital, and may some day discover that every infant comes into the world with a cheque-book tied to him to balance the mysterious title-deeds to a very indefinite landed estate which he has already invented. In that case he will cease to be suspect to Mr. Hyndman, but will also lose the advantage, such as it is, which a state of one-sidedness confers on the one-idead. Meanwhile there can be no possible antidote to Mr. George in the case of any reasonable person better than the reading of Mr. George's books. They both consist of infinite changes rung on three propositions:—That there is a great deal of misery in the world; that this misery comes from private property in land; and that the abolition of private property in land would suffice to do away with it. Of the first proposition, which nobody disputes, a large amount of evidence is stored in the manner which Mr. George's compliment extols as brilliant, pungent, vigorous, and so forth—that is to say, there are many good round adjectives and nouns substantive connected with it. Of the other two propositions there is absolutely no evidence whatever produced, and the reader is asked to accept them partly on the authority of the Declaration of Independence, partly on another for which we have to take Mr. George's voucher. The minor characteristics of this system of social and political economy have been sufficiently described and need not be repeated. Its premisses are to a large extent historically false, and between its premisses and its conclusion a gulf is fixed which logic, no less than morality, absolutely refuses to bridge.

THE AUSTRALIAN CONVENTION.

IT is not to be regretted that the Conference of Ministers of the Australian colonies at Sydney should be likely to separate without proposing any formal scheme of confederation. The difficulty of reconciling the strict and selfish exclusionism of Victoria with the comparatively liberal policy of New South Wales, would have been sufficient to prevent an immediate union; but a more general and more conclusive reason for delay or inaction was to be found in the conditions of inception and hurried conversation of the Conference. The delegates, although they possessed the authority of official position, could have no sufficient mandate to consider and determine the whole future condition of the Colonies. The Legislatures which they represented had not had an opportunity of consulting their constituents on the important question of confederation. Colonial opinion on the necessity or desirableness of such a measure seems to have been practically unanimous; but there is no essential connection between a federal system and such enterprises as the annexation of New Guinea. The scheme of gradual union, to be attained by the formation of a permanent congress or council, was a mere afterthought, suggested by a passage in one of Lord Derby's despatches. Politicians who hastily concluded that agreement on a single point implied permanent co-operation may have by this time discovered that they were unduly sanguine. It is not improbable that the project of a Federal Council may be carried into effect in some form. Any more ambitious scheme is only likely to succeed when the fear of external complications prevails over local prejudices and inter-colonial jealousies.

When Lord Derby, in his answer to the Government of Queensland, indicated union as a condition precedent of annexation, it is doubtful whether he wished to promote a general federation or to point out the difficulty of attaching new dependencies to single colonies. It is true that the Queensland Ministry had proposed to occupy New Guinea in the name of the Crown, but in hoisting the English flag without authority from home they had, through their agent, usurped sovereign functions. It was evident that, even if the small community of Queensland had been legally competent to establish an external settlement, it would be unable to bear the cost of administering or protecting its new possession. Lord Derby probably wished to remind not only Queensland, but the Australian Colonies in general, that if their wishes were granted they must be prepared to undertake the whole or the greater part of the cost of a new sub-colonial Empire. The settlements which fringe the coast of the Southern continent are, even with the addition of New Zealand and Tasmania, less populous than Scotland or than London; and some of them are separated from the rest by enormous distances. A combination of all their resources for the government of territories still more remote, inhabited by alien races, might perhaps not be impossible, but it would be a hazardous experiment. The colonists probably assumed that the annexation would be undertaken, if at all, by the mother country. In principle they might not think it unreasonable that they should contribute to the expense; but differences would arise when it became necessary to determine the quota to be paid by each several community. The dangers and inconveniences which might result from the neighbourhood of foreign settlements would affect the different Colonies unequally. Neither South Australia nor New Zealand would apprehend an immigration of released French criminals, though all the Colonies would be liable to the risk of war. It would evidently be in some respects more convenient to the Imperial Government to deal with a body which should represent all the Colonies.

On the other hand, when it seemed that Lord Derby had been taken at his word, the supposed readiness of all the Colonial Governments to take the first steps towards the formation of a confederacy was not regarded with unqualified complacency. The party which once anticipated with open satisfaction the disintegration of the Colonial Empire, though it is not extinct, finds it for the present convenient to restrain or conceal its aspirations. The obvious tendency of federal union to ripen into independence suggested doubts as to the expediency of convening even a Conference of Ministers. The establishment of some kind of protectorate in New Guinea, and the discouragement of foreign settlements in the South Pacific, would not be unpopular in England; but a Standing Committee charged with the care of common colonial interests would always be liable to disagree with the Imperial Government on questions of external policy. The rigid abstention of the Colonial Office and its representatives from all reference with doubtful politics could not in the first instance extend to projects of annexation or to negotiations with Foreign Powers. The privileges extended to large colonial confederacies naturally expand with the growth which may perhaps prepare them for actual or nominal independence. According to constitutional theory, the foreign relations of Canada are strictly controlled by the Cabinet of Downing Street or Windsor; but the Dominion, having absolute control of its own tariff, and of the laws which regulate its merchant navy, exercises without dispute the function of negotiating with its powerful neighbour. Disputed questions affecting fisheries are indeed often dealt with by the Imperial Government; but they become the Canadians voluntarily invoke the protection or advocacy of which they have a right.

The appeal to which it has lately given rise to the Australian Colonies can scarcely be allayed by any action of their own. It is impossible that New Zealand or New South Wales should approach with remonstrances or diplomatic representations the Governments of France or Germany. Any foreign Power which engaged in communications with the British Colonies would be guilty of discourtesy and intrusion. Even if all the Colonies were to combine for the purpose, their power and resources would be wholly inadequate to the maintenance against the encroachments of a European Power of any pretensions which they might advance. In extreme cases they must depend on the protection of the English navy, although they might contribute by their efforts to the defence of their own coasts and harbours. It, therefore, happened that the same pressure which seemed at one time likely to promote federal union tended to counteract any tendency to separate from the Empire which might otherwise have resulted from a policy of federation. The inherent incapacity of the several Colonies to take independent action was illustrated by Lord Derby's judicious disavowal of the annexation of New Guinea by Queensland. The measure seemed more absurd on the part of a petty colonial community than if it had been undertaken by Victoria or New South Wales; but in any case it would have been proper to repudiate the extension by the action of a mere dependency of English dominion. The Legislature of Queensland was certainly not prepared to defend the flag which a colonial police magistrate had planted, either against natives who might perhaps resent invasion, or against foreign adventurers who might probably dispute a questionable title. The subsequent adhesion of the other Colonies to the Queensland enterprise gave respectability and substance to schemes of annexation. The Imperial Government, though it could no longer refuse to notice the unanimous demand for countenance and aid, retained the right and the duty of limiting its sphere of action, and of imposing conditions on its support. It was evidently proper that the Colonies should bear the whole or the larger part of any expense which might be incurred. If due contributions could be secured, there was little objection in principle to an increase at the cost of the Colonies to the strength of the English navy.

It now appears that the Sydney Conference, which had itself only power to deliberate, will not recommend to the Colonial Governments any definite system of contribution to the expense of annexing and governing that portion of New Guinea which is not occupied or claimed by the Dutch; but the possible establishment of foreign settlements on the island will not cease to cause uneasiness or alarm. The evil of occasional immigration by escaped or liberated criminals has perhaps been exaggerated. The former refusal of the Australian Colonies to receive from England convicts sentenced to transportation was founded on a more practical danger. Colonial society was liable to be contaminated by the influx of a degraded class which was indistinguishable in language and habits from the rest of the community. A few French fugitives would be instantly recognized, and local laws which might be enacted for the purpose of preventing any mischief which might ensue could be easily enforced. It is indeed rather in New Guinea and other islands than in Australia or New Zealand that French convicts are likely to become troublesome or formidable. The settlement of new European colonies might be a still more serious evil. The English and French wars of former times in the East and West Indies were the natural consequence of the occupation of neighbouring colonial territories by rival Powers. French forts and naval stations in the Southern Pacific would involve the necessity of maintaining burdensome armaments to protect the English settlements. Some of the plans suggested by the colonists might be effective, but they are unfortunately altogether impracticable. Great Powers would decline to acquiesce in a prohibition of foreign settlements within thousands of miles of the Australian coasts. It is by a happy accident that the whole continent is subject to English sovereignty. A claim to the exclusive possession of the Pacific islands would be more difficult to assert. It will probably be desirable to annex the greater part of New Guinea before any foreign Government can interfere.

EGYPT.

GENERAL GORDON has by this time reached Cairo and may even have left it for Khartoum. The Ministry through the mouth of Sir CHARLES DILKE has informed the world that the reason why he was not sent before was opposition to that step, not merely on the part of the Egyptian Government, but on that of Sir EVELYN BARING. This candour will undoubtedly strengthen General GORDON'S hands. Sir EVELYN BARING was reluctant that General GORDON should go; but General GORDON has gone, and though his orders are as complete a mystery as his appointment was a week ago, there is no doubt whatever that he is the right man in the right place, or that his dispatch as an English Commissioner, whether with full powers or not, is another nail in the coffin of the fiction of Egyptian independence. To whatever quarter it may be proper to look for an explanation of the views with which he goes out, it is obviously unnecessary to take account of the real or imaginary conversations which an English newspaper (following the worst of those practices of foreign journalism which English newspapers of the higher class have generally disdained) has recently published. Interviewing never has resulted, and is never likely to result, in satisfaction to any one but gobemouches, for the simple reason that no one in a position of trust is likely to take the JEAMES of any newspaper into his confidence. In the present instance, moreover, it is not so much what General GORDON would like to do, or what he thinks ought to be done, as what he can do and what the English Government will let him do. It would appear that, whatever the precise terms of his commission may be, Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues have sent him to Egypt to perform the locally appropriate feat of making bricks without straw. He is to charge the tribes of the Soudan to drop their daggers, and the tribes of the Soudan are to be good enough to obey him. But what is to be done if they will not drop their daggers, or even what is to be done in the rather improbable case of their consenting to drop them, neither Sir CHARLES DILKE nor any other spokesman of the Ministry tells us. And yet it is not a matter on which in either case there is much difficulty in making up any well-informed mind, and it is one in which the announcement of a definite intention on the part of a Power like England would go a long way towards carrying the intention announced into effect.

One part of Sir CHARLES DILKE'S speech, and some of the comments on that part, are peculiarly characteristic. Sir CHARLES DILKE says that General GORDON is "not against, "but in favour of, the evacuation of Darfur, Kordofan, and "the interior of the Soudan by Egypt." If the now historic Note which Sir EVELYN BARING presented some weeks ago, which overthrew the CHERIF Ministry and which has led, at what most people think a very long interval, to the mission of General GORDON, only recommended the evacuation of Darfur, Kordofan, and the interior of the Soudan, it was officially allowed to be the subject of a most cruel misrepresentation to the public. It may be that, as Sir CHARLES DILKE says, there never was any purpose of abandoning Soudkim and the Red Sea coast, though it is certain that it took more than a week's interval and some strong protests in the English press before the disclaimer of this purpose was made with any authority. But Sir CHARLES DILKE does not say (he is far too clever a man to make statements which could be shown to be categorically false) that there was no intention of abandoning Khartoum, or the Nile from Khartoum to the second cataract, or Sennaar and its neighbourhood, or the country between the Nile and the sea. Now it is pretty certain that General GORDON is not in favour of evacuating these places, and it is against the evacuation of these places that almost every one acquainted with the country has been ceaselessly protesting ever since the evacuation of Khartoum and the rest was announced as decided on. Sir CHARLES DILKE was eloquent on the inexpediency of trying to retain Darfur; it would have been more interesting if he had mentioned any one who is particularly anxious that Darfur should be retained. It seems to have held out fairly against the MAHDI. But it came into Egyptian hands quite recently (barely ten years ago) in consequence of the acts of some enterprising filibusters; it is extremely difficult to reach, and at any moment it might be exposed to attacks from the powerful independent Sultans to the westward, which Egypt, at any rate for the present, could only guard against at a quite disproportionate expense. Some day no doubt it will with the rest of the Central Soudan come into the power of whatever European nation is not "afraid of growing great," and has made good use of the hold it has or may obtain on the Nile, the Niger, or the Congo. But that will not be to-morrow or the next day. Sir CHARLES DILKE may comfort himself about Darfur, which seems to have suddenly aroused such a remarkable interest in his breast. Not even the wildest Jingo will "fash himself" for the shadowy Sultanate whose capital (how many members of the Chelsea Liberal Association could tell it without book?) is El Fasher. It is not quite the same with Kordofan, which has been an Egyptian possession for two generations, and which may be said to border on the Nile. Nor is it without reluctance that the still remoter provinces of Bahr-el-Ghazal and Gondokoro, which are in direct water communication with the Mediterranean and command the way to the interior, could be abandoned to anarchy. But even for these few Englishmen would greatly weep, provided Khartoum, the key of them all, which can be used at any moment to reopen the way to them, be not given up. It is for the retention of Khartoum and a general hold, if only by patrols and a garrison or two here or there, of the Nile, together with the maintenance of the routes from Soudkim and Massowah inland, that knowledge is now contending with ignorance in England. It would be a little surprising if Sir CHARLES DILKE had assured his hearers (as a matter of fact he carefully abstained from doing so) that General GORDON is on the side of ignorance. Many wonderful arguments have been used in favour of scuttling, one learned person having recollected that the Roman boundary of Egypt coincided almost exactly with that fixed by Mr. GLADSTONE. It is not reported whether the arguer proceeded to suggest the substitution of ballista for breech-loading artillery among the troops of BAKER PASHA.

Thus the speech of Sir CHARLES DILKE is little more instructive than the silence of his colleagues. It does not in the least satisfy the legitimate demand of the country for an intelligible sketch of policy, and it still less excuses the inexcusable delay, not merely in sending General GORDON, but in getting anything whatever done about the outlying provinces and garrisons. Few Governments have presented a more pitiful picture than the present Government as drawn by this able, and certainly not hostile, artist. The Government thought the sending of General Gordon the best thing for the Soudan, and apparently (since they did nothing else) the only thing. But the Egyptian Government wouldn't, and Sir Evelyn Baring wouldn't, and General Gordon wouldn't, and what was a poor Government to do? With regard to General Gordon, it is perfectly certain that, if it had been properly represented to him that it was his duty to go months ago, he would have gone then as he has gone now. The Egyptian Government, as the English Government has at last discovered, simply waited to see that the English Government was in earnest, and if Sir Evelyn Baring had remained recalcitrant, the way out of that difficulty is not very hard to perceive. Yet apparently because the Egyptian Government and Sir Evelyn Baring demurred, Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues have delayed till the rescue of some garrisons has become all but impossible, and the chances of a terrible catastrophe at Khartoum have increased enormously. It is possible, of course, that they have spent the time in telegraphing to Sir Evelyn Baring, imploring him to relent—in "getting "Sir Evelyn Baring's concurrence," as this transaction between a Government and that Government's servant has been quaintly put. This will doubtless be a sufficient explanation to Tewfik Bey and the garrison of Sinkat, an answer in full of all demands to the inhabitants of Khartoum, who were shilly-shallied with for two full months before the evacuation was proclaimed, and are now being shilly-shallied with for an indifferent time longer, before—if Providence, the Mahdi, and General Gordon permit—the evacuation is counter-ordered. This shilly-shallying is the charge against the Government, and it is a charge made worse, not better, by Sir Charles Dilke's apology. "Que faire? Sir Evelyn Baring won't let "General Gordon go," the members of the Ministry, according to this Minister, said to themselves, and they agreed that nothing could be done. And nothing was done accordingly. That this scandalous inaction will be thoroughly discussed in Parliament Sir Stafford Northcote's language at Barnstaple on Thursday seems to promise, and any concession on this point to the bluster of the Caucuses about obstruction would be a no less scandalous failure of duty on the part of the Opposition.

OPTIMISM AT BRADFORD.

If the guests at the annual soirée of the Bradford Chamber of Commerce expected to hear anything new or striking on the really interesting political questions of the day last Monday, they were very properly disappointed. Mr. Forster and Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice judiciously confined themselves to safe demonstrations of the obvious truth that Great Britain has been wonderfully prosperous during the last fifty years; and what little they said about politics was devoted to minor matters, which may be handled without danger. They carefully abstained from touching on matters of real importance. This course can be better justified in them than in other Ministerial speakers. When we are so near the opening of a Session which may well bring with it a day of reckoning, a candid friend who, unlike most persons of that class, is really anxious not to do mischief, may well keep a guard on his tongue. Mr. Forster is such a friend; and, having honourably washed his hands of responsibility for the doings of the Ministry, he can afford to help his party, which is still under the leadership of his late colleagues. So he spoke of national prosperity, and quoted pleasant statistics, with a well-founded confidence that all good Liberals will consider both as affording satisfactory proof of the advantages of being governed by a Cabinet formed out of the men of their own side. Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice played the part of the ingenuous Parliamentary youth who believes in the wisdom of his chiefs. By dint of overlooking much and forgetting a great deal, the people of Bradford may easily have allowed themselves to be persuaded by their member and his official friend that the country has advanced, is advancing, and will continue to advance towards unheard-of prosperity under the guidance of a united Liberal Ministry.

Mr. Forster might have been a little puzzled if he had been called upon to prove the truth of his assertion that the Foreign Office has treated commerce with more attention of late years than it had ever done before. Our unenlightened fathers were of opinion that the mercantile interest had not a little to do with English politics long before Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, or Sir Charles Dilke, or even Mr. Bourke had come to have anything to do with the department of Foreign Affairs. Proof, however, is not, by a well-established and convenient custom, required from public men who are guests at soirées, and it cannot be denied that the Foreign Office does busy itself a good deal with matters of commerce. It would be interesting to learn whether the member for Bradford includes the Ministerial arrangement with M. de Lesseps among the good deeds of our Foreign Office to commerce, but on that subject he maintained a cautious silence. A large part of his speech was devoted to proving that the people of England are better off than our grandfathers were. He quoted his friend Sir Jacob Behrens, and proved by statistics exceedingly well that we are richer than they were, that we have fewer paupers and also fewer criminals than they had. Then we enjoy all these good things longer than they could have done, because we die less easily. Finally Mr. Forster showed that, however rapidly our general wealth has increased, our shipping has grown even faster. He reminded his hearers of the undoubted fact that in 1850 the shipping of Great Britain did not amount to more than nine and a half million tons, whereas it had reached forty-three and a half millions in 1882. Merchant shipping led Mr. Forster to make the only approach to saying anything about the coming Session to be found in his speech. After insisting very properly on the duty of providing as well as we can for the safety of the men who man our ships, he promised his hearers that they should have a Bill from Mr. Chamberlain. As to the measure itself Mr. Forster had nothing to say beyond the familiar commonplaces, but he said them with commendable moderation. He allowed that bad weather had probably quite as much to do with causing wrecks as the villany of owners. It was not Mr. Forster's business to show how shipowners can be made to feel any greater interest than they do at present in choosing good captains, nor how reckless speculators can be kept from doing after their kind without at the same time hampering all trade. As a matter of course, Mr. Forster prophesied that the Merchant Shipping Bill will afford another proof of the value of the Grand Committees, or rather of one of them. He wisely avoided any reference to the Grand Committee of Law, of futile memory. His hearers, if they drew upon their memories, must have been a little puzzled when he spoke about the many measures of commercial legislation which came before Parliament during the last Session. Except the Bankruptcy and Patent Bill, which were the work of one much bepraised Grand Committee, it is not among the recollections of anybody that either House was greatly troubled about matters of commerce. In his character of candid public friend, Mr. Forster gave his audience the benefit of not a little quiet good sense on some miscellaneous subjects. He justly insisted that the President of the Board of Trade would not do his work any the better if he were to be rechristened the Minister of Commerce. The fair trade delusion of a few months ago was the legitimate object of his mild derision. It was not necessary, and would hardly have been polite, that he should have shown how much it proves as to the probable motives of the manufacturers who supported the Anti-Corn Law League. If men of business now, who find themselves suffering from foreign competition, learn to lose belief in Free-trade, that is only one more proof that their predecessors would have shown it little favour if they had not been already completely masters of the home market. Such reflections, however, are out of place at soirées given by Chambers of Commerce. We have every reason to be satisfied that the last generation of business men acted with a strict regard to their own interests, which happened to coincide with the national good. Fortunately Free-trade is now defended by the mutual jealousy of two great industries, either of which would probably be glad enough of Protection if it could be confined to one of them. On the subject of technical education, which has been the text of much loose talk, Mr. Forster made some some sensible observations. He pointed out that, although theoretic teaching may be good, the best possible training for a workman is to be got in a shop which has kept up good traditions.

Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice confined himself to saying ditto to Mr. Forster. On one point he said this with perhaps undue emphasis, for he not only praised the Grand Committees at large, which is the obvious duty of a right-minded Liberal, but he advanced the assertion that the Law Committee was nowise to blame for having done nothing. How this came about he does not appear to have condescended to explain; but the suppressed explanation would probably be that Codification and Criminal Appeal were too much for its energies. The obvious deduction, that a Grand Committee is of no use except when it has to deal with a very simple Bill, was naturally not drawn by Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE. It is too manifestly the duty of a Liberal, particularly of an official Liberal, on his promotion to sing the praises of the only one of the new Procedure Rules which has not been a mere dead letter. For the rest, the UNDER-SECRETARY for FOREIGN AFFAIRS confined himself to saying that our relations with our neighbours were highly satisfactory. Something has been done on the Danube—though what it exactly is there are probably not ten men in England who know, and certainly not many more who greatly care. Then we have made some sort of compromise with the SULTAN which will secure better treatment for traders until a definitive arrangement is come to. Something else of a satisfactory kind is going to be done on the Congo. That the treaty with Spain is too obviously coming to nothing Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE could not deny; but he asked his hearers not to despair, and to remember that things are better in Japan and the Corea. He also found subject for gratification in the fact that a great number of ships are to be hired for extraordinarily low freights. If many littles make a mickle, in the sense that, because we are not in hot water all the world over, therefore we need not feel disturbed at serious trouble on three or four points of vital importance, why then things are in a very satisfactory state. That is what the speeches at Bradford come to when interpreted into plain English, and it does not sound very well. It is a kind of Ministerial defence which is rather more damaging than the most serious attack; but the speakers had good reasons for not running the risk of trying to say more.

IRELAND.

THE death of the unfortunate boy GIFFEN, who was sacrificed at Dromore to the clamour of English Radicals and the desire of certain members of the Cabinet to hold an even keel between sedition and loyalty, has had at least one good effect. It has prevented, for some time at least, the repetition of the singular experiment which occasioned it. The prohibition of the Black Lion and Park meetings (followed in the former case by a display of separatist disobedience which, as at Cootehill, was treated by the authorities in a fashion very different from that which GIFFEN had to suffer) testifies to a return on the part of the Irish Administration to the good sense which has recently distinguished it. The remarkable meeting of Thursday night, which showed a unity and resolution of feeling unknown among the better class of Irishmen for some years past, ought to warn the Government against relapse. The Parnellite leaders, deprived of the opportunity of invading Ulster with a Government escort, and talking sedition under the protection of the bayonets of the QUEEN'S soldiers, have for the most part confined themselves to their familiar haunts. The Cork Town Hall and the National League rooms in Dublin have heard Mr. HEALY'S opinion of the various English parties, and Mr. SEXTON'S wishes to share the grave of SARSFIELD and HUGH O'NEILL. The long nights of winter have brought about the natural accompaniment of outrage, though in no very great degree. For the present, indeed, the eternal Irish question is quiet except as to two of its sides—the possibility of stirring up a new agitation for the landlord's property, and the question of the effect of Mr. GLADSTONE'S proposals for enfranchisement and redistribution in Ireland.

The extreme vexation of English Radicals at the revival of national feeling in Ulster, and its identification with the Tory party, has taken form in a proposal for a crusade against leases. Many Ulster farmers, it is said, hold under lease, and if the bait of lease-breaking, with a reduction all round, could be held out to them, there is no knowing that they might not turn against their landlords. Those who put forward this argument merely give another proof of the remarkably slight knowledge of the facts of Irish life usual with English Radicalism. It is not the fact that, as a rule, Irish leaseholders pay rents higher than tenants at will or even rents as high. The acquisition of a tenant who having something to lose was likely to be a punctual tenant has always been regarded in Ireland as a gain to the landlord, and in many cases the leaseholder has sat at a lower rather than a higher rent in consequence. It is true that after such a shameless proceeding as the recent lowering of rents by the Sub-Commissioners on a part of Lord LANSDOWNE'S estate, where it was admitted by the lowerers that the landlord had gone to great expense, it may be contended that any tenant going into Court is certain of reduction; and that leaseholders going into Court are as certain of it as any one else. It would, however, be difficult to take this line of argument openly, and it is quite certain that if it were taken the present Government would not for the present dare to adopt it. Indeed, it is by this time pretty evident that Mr. GLADSTONE is disinclined to alterations of the Land Act. The fortunate complacency with which he is wont to regard his own works has many drawbacks from the point of view of national interests. But to everything there is a good side, and it has one advantage. Until the novelty at least has worn off, he is generally unwilling to admit that these works can be susceptible of improvement. It is not certain that, if the last Reform Bill had been Mr. GLADSTONE'S work instead of his rival's, we should have heard anything of a Reform Bill now. Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues have so often explicitly or implicitly extolled the Land Act of 1881 as a monument aere perennius of legislative justice and wisdom, that on one side it is unreasonable to expect, and on the other somewhat superfluous to fear, any spontaneous act of theirs tending to show that, instead of being perennial, it can scarcely stand the strain of a couple of years. It is true, however, that these things lie rather in the lap of Mr. PARNELL than in that of Mr. GLADSTONE.

It is, moreover, evident that the current variety of concession to Ireland takes a different form in the Ministerial mind. It is valiantly protested that the coming Franchise Bill is to include Ireland at all hazards. If Sir CHARLES DILKE has been rightly understood, the redistribution scheme which is withheld so coyly involves a concession to Ireland of a nature perhaps less imprudent, but certainly more surprising. Sir CHARLES tells his constituents that his own belief is that Ireland will, under the new constitution of things, be entitled to about the present number of members. Sir CHARLES DILKE is one of the most difficult of living statesmen to interpret safely, no doubt owing to his extreme and scrupulous desire for accuracy. He is so extremely careful to say exactly what he himself means, that he unwittingly, and no doubt to his great sorrow, sometimes deceives listeners who do not know what he means, and can only suppose that he means what they themselves would mean if they used his words. But here there certainly seems to be no possibility of mistaking him, and his statement has naturally staggered some readers who are by no means opposed to his political views. Ireland at present, disregarding the suspended constituencies of Cashel and Sligo, and disregarding likewise the suspended constituencies of the rest of the kingdom, has 105 members out of 658, or as nearly as possible five out of thirty-one. Her population in 1881 was as nearly as possible as five to thirty-four. It will require some rather ingenious gerrymandering to reconcile these figures to the retention of about the present number of members for Ireland, even if the concurrent proportion of taxation be not brought in; if this is brought in, it is sufficiently well known that the proportion of members due to Ireland would be further and very materially reduced. But, unless Sir CHARLES DILKE spoke on this occasion as he spoke on a certain other famous one, and interprets the intentions of the Ministry as he interpreted the intentions of the CZAR, it must be supposed that Ireland is to lose none of her members, or at most to put up with the permanent loss of those who represented Sligo and Cashel. A bribe of this kind would, no doubt, be more or less welcome to the so-called Irish party, and might secure their votes. But, on the other hand, it will hardly please Scotland or the populous English districts. Incidentally this little remark of Sir CHARLES DILKE'S both illustrates the reasons of the Ministerial reticence as to redistribution and justifies the Opposition in resorting to every possible means of defeating the Franchise Bill until this reticence is overcome. So long as it is permitted, Ministers, especially according to the singular theory of Ministerial solidarity which has grown up under Mr. GLADSTONE'S Premiership, can play on the great scale, and with perfect impunity, the game so pleasingly described in the Bedford Row Conspiracy, of promising the same thing to many different persons. Ireland, Scotland, and the unrepresented urban districts of England, the craving suburbs of London, the small boroughs, whose only chance is to be lumped in with patches of country, can all be comforted by some Cabinet Minister whose "own belief" is that they will either lose nothing or gain something. And Cabinet Ministers, being mortal, cannot be severely blamed for having sincerely indulged in an honest belief. When the new registers have been made "out," as Sir CHARLES says, it will be too late to object; and it is quite possible that the new registers may show Sir CHARLES DILKE and any one else who may have beliefs that they have been unfortunately mistaken. With a fair and square Reform Bill, showing redistribution as well as enfranchisement, this game would, of course, be impossible. In regard to Ireland, indeed, there is considerable reason for doubting whether it can be successfully played—reason independent of the general considerations which Mr. W. H. SMITH urged very forcibly on Thursday. It is easy to hoodwink English boroughs with the aid of the Caucuses and the general and convenient principle that Mr. GLADSTONE can never do wrong. But Mr. SMITH-AMHURST'S writ does not run in Ireland, and there is there by no means a universal belief that Mr. GLADSTONE can do no wrong. The Parnellite members will have lost much of their cunning if they vote for Mr. GLADSTONE'S Bill without an understanding much more binding than Sir CHARLES DILKE'S private beliefs. On the other hand, the populous districts of England which are, if we are to believe Ministers, pining for more members, will have to consider whether Ireland, which, roughly speaking, and even putting taxation out of the question, is entitled to one member in seven, shall continue to have, roughly speaking, one member in six.

THE TRANSVAAL DELEGATES.

THE answer of the Transvaal delegates to Lord DERBY'S statement of the intentions of the Government is moderate and conciliatory in its tone. It is not known whether their demands of absolute independence and of a remission of the debt have been fully or partially conceded. The published correspondence refers almost exclusively to the frontier line: and on this point also there seems to be little difference of principle. The proposal of the delegates that the native chiefs shall decide whether their territory is to be included within the limits of the Transvaal would be more satisfactory if it were possible to ascertain the real wishes of the parties who are interested. It is certainly not advisable that the possessions of any chief should be intersected by the frontier, especially as the Boers would inevitably seek to extend their jurisdiction over both sections of such a territory. Lord DERBY judiciously insisted on the exclusion from the Transvaal of the trade route from the Cape Colony to the interior of the continent. The delegates contend that there are several such roads, and they offer to guarantee the neutrality of the route if it is allowed to pass through their dominions; but Lord DERBY has probably access to correct local information, and it is certain that mere promises of non-interference are an insufficient substitute for absolute independence. In various parts of the world, and especially in South Africa, international compacts have of late become less trustworthy than in former times. It was formerly understood that a treaty expressing the conditions on which wars were ended remained binding on both parties, although its terms were almost always onerous to the defeated or weaker belligerent. The denunciation of the Russian Treaty of 1856 furnished a precedent which has been followed by the Boers of the Transvaal. Possession affords better security than written covenants. As to the determination of the boundary between the Transvaal and the Bechuana country, the delegates seem not unduly exacting. It would seem that they are prepared to accept by anticipation the award of an English Commissioner, on condition that his instructions are consistent with their proposal of consulting the wishes of the chiefs.

There is some reason to hope that in several parts of South Africa the complicated difficulties which have arisen during several years are drawing to a close. There is at present no dispute of any kind between the Imperial Government and the Cape; and it is with the consent, and indeed at the request, of the colonists that Basutoland is once more to be placed under English authority. When it was expected that the South African colonies, if not the two independent Republics, were likely to form a confederacy, it seemed reasonable, and almost necessary, to entrust the control of native affairs to the local authorities. Although the project of federation is now indefinitely postponed, the English Government would have been well content to leave to the chief colony the privilege and the burden of dealing with the Basutos. In some parts of the world European settlers have been harsh and unjust in their treatment of indigenous races; but it is fair to admit that the Cape Government and Legislature have been, on the whole, considerate and just. But for the unlucky mistake of the Disarmament Bill, the Basutos would probably never have revolted, nor would the Colonial Government have discovered that it was not strong enough to reconquer their allegiance. The Basuto chiefs have reasonably argued that the transfer of their allegiance without consulting their wishes was an act of usurpation; and they now, with one or two exceptions, profess their readiness to submit to the authority of the Crown. It luckily happens that there is a customary and convenient method of raising the modest revenue which will be required for the exercise of a protectorate. A hut tax has in many places been paid without objection in return for the maintenance of peace and order. One chief, MASUPHA, hitherto stands aloof; but probably some means will be found of overcoming his resistance.

It is to be feared that anarchy still prevails in Zululand, but there have lately been no reports of actual fighting. CETEWAYO appears still to be in the Reserve in a state of suspended royalty. His most formidable enemy, USIBEPU, governs his own dominions without molestation; and reports of his defeat by some of CETEWAYO'S followers or allies have not been confirmed. Of all the native races of South Africa, the Zulus have most reason to complain of English restlessness and caprice. Their territory was invaded and their national army destroyed on insufficient grounds; and when they had partially settled down under a new system devised by their conquerors, war was gratuitously rekindled by an ill-advised restoration. The country, or the greater part of it, would welcome the establishment of an English administration, and the Zulus have, for the reasons which have been assigned, a certain claim on the Power which has destroyed their own system of government. Whether the cost and the risk of nominal or virtual annexation could be prudently undertaken is a question which could only be decided on competent local authority. The population of the neighbouring colony of Natal is, for the most part, identical with that of Zululand in race and language; and, up to the present time, no difficulty has been found in governing a population which outnumbers the white settlers in the proportion of more than twenty to one. During the war with CETEWAYO there was no attempt at insurrection among the coloured inhabitants of Natal. Notwithstanding the objection entertained by recent Colonial Secretaries to the extension of English dominion, it has been found necessary to establish a kind of protectorate in the territory reserved to chiefs who were not disposed to acquiesce in the restoration of CETEWAYO. If Sir HENRY BULWER had not been overruled by Lord KIMBERLEY, the Reserve would have included a much larger portion of Zululand. Outside its limits rival chiefs will probably prosecute their feuds until a more adventurous policy again prevails in English councils. Warlike tribes are, for the most part, less troublesome as subjects than as independent neighbours.

The disputes with the Boers have not affected the internal relations of the English and Dutch population of the colony; and, if Lord DERBY succeeds in finally disposing of the difficulties with the Transvaal, no question will remain which can afford a reasonable pretext for dissension. There is happily no present reason to apprehend the renewal of border wars; but the control of native tribes by the Imperial Government can scarcely be a lasting arrangement. The Colonial Parliament has with judicious liberality provided for the partial admission of resident and comparatively civilized Kaffirs to the electoral franchise; but their ostensible privileges will depend on their inability or unwillingness to meddle with public affairs. Europeans, especially of English blood, will never allow themselves to be governed by a majority belonging to an inferior race. The negroes indeed in the Southern States of America were for a few years after the war enabled under the patronage and direction of Federal adventurers to control the local administration; but, in spite of the Constitutional Amendment which prohibits disqualification on the ground of colour, the natural rulers have recovered their ascendency in almost every part of the South. Representative government is only possible where the majority or the dominant section of the electorate is practically homogeneous. The Austrian Empire was but little disturbed by national jealousies as long as the common Sovereign was, except in Hungary, an absolute ruler. Almost all the perplexities of the last thirty years result from the jealousy of populations which resent the authority of alien Parliaments. The inhabitants of the Cape will never allow themselves to be governed by the nominees of native voters. Natal will probably long continue to prefer the position of a Crown colony to the independence which would involve the alternative of enfranchising the coloured majority or of reducing it to permanent subjection.

Future political observers may perhaps have the opportunity of studying in the two Dutch Republics of South Africa the effects of a policy which makes little pretension to Liberalism. The Boers of the Transvaal openly avow their determination to withhold from their native subjects all share of political power. They are but little disposed to tolerate the interference even of their own Government with private property or commercial transactions. It is creditable to their candour that they refuse to concede fictitious privileges to those whom they have never affected to regard as equals. Like the colonists of Natal, the Boers of the Transvaal are surrounded by many times their own number of natives, whom they have probably no desire to oppress, but they are resolved to keep them in subjection. There is reason to believe that the coloured population would greatly have preferred the continuance of the English occupation to the re-establishment of the Republic. It was for the purpose of protecting their rights and interests that a Resident was appointed under the provisions of the Pretorian Convention; but it is fair to admit that the correspondence discloses no oppressive practices, as far as the natives within the territory are concerned. In any case it would be impossible to maintain a claim of a right to remonstrate or to interfere with a Government which was recognized as independent. In a former and less philanthropic generation it was thought unnecessary to stipulate when the Sand River Convention was concluded for the maintenance of any native rights or privileges. Both parties to the compact probably regarded the Kaffirs as troublesome inmates and possible enemies. Their claim to humane and just treatment is now more fully recognized; but the English Government, when it agreed to retire from the Transvaal, consciously or by necessary consequence remitted its coloured population to the Boers. The disputes which have since arisen principally relate to the treatment of native chiefs and tribes beyond the limits of the Republic as settled at Pretoria. It is for the purpose of avoiding future complications of the same kind, and in some instances of redressing grievances, that Lord DERBY and the delegates have been engaged in the demarcation of a new frontier.

THE COWGILL JUDGMENT.

THERE are no persons who deserve more sincere commiseration upon the judgment just delivered by Baron POLLOCK in the case of Mr. COWGILL than the Episcopal Bench, and in particular the Bishop of MANCHESTER. To the rest of the world it is simply a showy success, or a vexatious rebuff; but to the BISHOP it speaks of multiplied responsibility and increased exposure to the attacks of party papers and seditious associations which are, in the way of discipline, most efficient substitutes for the hair shirt and knotted scourge. We need hardly remind our readers that this judgment is the latest phase of the famous Miles Platting case, and that the parties who appeared before Mr. Baron POLLOCK were, on one side, Sir PERCIVAL HEYWOOD, the patron of that living, and therefore of the incarcerated and deprived Mr. GREEN, and on the other the Bishop of MANCHESTER, who had, after examination, refused institution to Mr. COWGILL, the clergyman whom the patron had presented as Mr. GREEN'S successor. In short, although Mr. COWGILL'S name does not appear in the suit, he was the person most practically interested in the conclusion.

We have nothing to say against Mr. Baron POLLOCK'S judgment, which is calm, straightforward, and laborious, and totally destitute of those flowers of histrionic declamation with which Lord PENZANCE rejoices in adorning his decisions when a Ritualist has to be trounced. We shall even assume that it may not lead to the appeal which long experience leads us to regard as inevitable in ecclesiastical proceedings. We do not imagine that the Church Association will relish the Judge's regrets regarding "a "difference about mere matters of ritual," or agree with him as to "however much it might be thought desirable "that the rules by which the discipline of the Church "in such matters is governed should be wider and more "elastic." Stripped of technicalities, the judgment upholds the right of the BISHOP to put the inquiries which he put to Mr. COWGILL; and, inasmuch as the answers amounted to evidence that the presentee would feel himself conscientiously obliged to adopt practices which might, under existing decisions of the Judicial Committee, make him liable to deprivation, the Bishop of MANCHESTER was in his right when he refused institution. Whether he was discreet in so acting is a point which the Judge took particular pains not to handle. The distinction between moral and ritual offences was, in theory, admitted; but it was held to be matter for the discretion of the Bishop, and not within the competence of a temporal court.

The weight of this judgment falls immediately upon a Ritualist section, but it may next time be efficient in cutting short the career of some disciple of Mr. VOYSEY Still we do not suppose that any one will rise to those passionless heights from which he can contemplate it as anything beyond an incident in the Ritualistic campaign. Its immediate result is to increase the episcopal share in that damnosa hæreditas of rulers, discretion; and the wisest prelates will be those who show the least wish to cultivate familiarity with its details. We do not say that it may not upon rare occasions be a serviceable instrument, but we are convinced that for one case in which a reluctant Bishop will feel himself constrained to take advantage of its powers, a dozen will occur in which love of popularity or dread of censure will whisper to the unstable ordinary to indulge in irritating cross-questioning and tyrannous refusals. The Bishop of MANCHESTER himself betrayed the dangers lurking in the powers to which he has now made his claim good when in effect he called upon Mr. COWGILL to pledge himself to conform his practice to that which exists in Manchester Cathedral. The standard of worship there is, we believe, one which would, not so many years since, have been looked on as very far-going, and embodies the various concessions which have been wrung from successive Judicial Committees between 1857 and 1877.

But another Bishop might use another cathedral for fixing a very different standard. The Episcopate have, as a whole, given manifest indications that they are at last awakening to the existence of a drift among a portion, at all events, of the people, large enough and important enough to claim respectful tolerance, towards an increase of ritual which would have been unintelligible to church-goers of the last generation. We cannot, therefore, believe that they will be tempted from their later and wiser resolves by the accidental advantage which Baron POLLOCK'S judgment places at their disposal, backed by the clamorous insistence of the Church Association. On the whole, then, we are inclined to indulge in the comfortable belief that the "supreme importance" which the Times descries in the judgment will in practice be found to be very considerably discounted.

ITALIAN PARTIES.

THE present week in Italy has been marked by two events — by the reassembling of the Chamber of Deputies, and by the last of the national pilgrimages in honour of VICTOR EMANUEL. It must have struck every reader or spectator, and with truth, that the monarchical feeling must be strong in a country when tens of thousands of persons can flock from every part of it to do honour several years after his death to the memory of a dead King. The strength of this monarchical feeling has been often underrated in England, for the reason that those who may be said to have first interested the English public in Italian affairs, such as MAZZINI and his associates, were themselves fanatical Republicans. It was a fixed idea among them that Italy was Republican by nature, and no perversion of history or ethnology was too gross or too absurd to be used by them as a support for this theory. The actual facts, both of the past and of the present, have never failed to contradict it. The so-called Republics of early days were in truth mostly oligarchies. And when the question came to the proof in our own generation whether Italy should be united and freed by the Republican or the monarchical party, the failure of the former was complete and miserable. Every attempt, in whatever part of Italy, to achieve either national unity or local independence on a Republican basis failed utterly. One State only, the old monarchical State of Piedmont, had the power in itself, and the attraction for the other States of the Peninsula, to carry through to the end the work of freeing and uniting the whole country. At the present moment, among the masses of the people of Italy, for one who knows or cares who is in office in Rome, there are a hundred to whom the House of Savoy and those who represent it are symbols of all the politics that interest them. The present King of ITALY inherits much of the well-earned popularity of his father, and the QUEEN is undoubtedly the most popular person in the kingdom. But in the circumstances of a newly-formed country, personal accidents would have but little effect if the general feeling of the nation were not monarchical.

Parliamentary government in Italy, as in most European countries, has been to a great extent framed on the English model. It has been naturally looked at in England from a similar point of view. The Right and the Left in a foreign Chamber have been supposed to stand for something analogous to the two historic parties which have divided the House of Commons during the last two centuries. So strong has been the influence of this analogy that the Right in the Italian Chamber still passes among half-informed people as a stationary or retrograde party. The truth is that such a party in Italy is only to be found among the Clericals, who, for reasons well known to themselves and others, have thought it wise to hold their hands, and take for the present no active and pronounced part in national politics. But, putting aside this section of Italian politicians, nearly the whole of them are such as would be described in England as Liberals. In England, too, the distinctive names which mark off the two parties have become such that thinking people are accustomed now to use them merely as labels, and are looking out for new names which may correctly describe the real differences which the old names have ceased to express. Among Italians the disintegration of parties has gone much further. There exists now publicly in Italy neither a Liberal nor a Conservative party. Nearly all who sit in the Chamber are what we should call Liberals; nearly all whom we should call Conservatives or reactionaries abstain from politics, at least overtly, almost entirely. The ranks of those who think the political and social movement of the last century a mistake, and who wish to reverse it, are not only growing thinner and thinner, but they are not even represented in Parliamentary life. All in the Italian Chamber are nominally for progress, needful reform, peace, retrenchment, and the like. There is no great question of principle or of public policy which should induce a man to sit on one bench in the Chamber rather than on another. The reason which forms groups and arranges parties is simply a question of persons.

At the head of the present Italian Government is Signor DEPRETIS. He may be said to be the one man of ability and character capable for the moment of leading and uniting the various sections of the party which now governs Italy. His career has been curious. He was in old days a Radical of the Radicals. He has, in his official position, made himself hateful to the ultra-Radicals by the zeal with which he has put down their demonstrations, and contravened their policy. Since March 1876, when the Right, which so long governed Italy, fell from office, the first post in the Cabinet has alternated between him and Signor CAIROLI. The latter, personally honest and respected, has been tried both as leader of his party and as Minister of Foreign Affairs, and in both positions has been found wanting. Indeed he would never have attained to either but for the honour which he and his family justly won in the struggle for Italian independence. It was as the survivor of three brothers who had devoted themselves to the national cause, and not as a man who had shown any statesmanlike qualities, that he was lifted into, rather than attained, the high positions which he has held. Experience has shown his unfitness for them, and he is now in hopeless opposition to his former colleagues. As Minister of Foreign Affairs his ignorance of the political situation of Europe was the theme of general merriment in Rome, and doubtless also in the Ministries of other countries to which his despatches were addressed. The rivalry for leadership between himself and Signor DEPRETIS, and the rivalry between subordinate members of the Left for places in the Cabinets severally presided over by them, have been the keynotes of Italian politics during the last eight years. These mutual jealousies threatened at last to make Parliamentary government impossible in Italy. Cabinet after Cabinet was formed only to crumble to pieces at the end of a few months; Minister after Minister took office only to be supplanted before he had time to learn his duties. The Left, which two general elections had confirmed in office, was split up into discordant factions; the Right was in a minority both in the Chamber and in the country; and the Clericals, whose open participation in politics would at once have cleared the situation, still for the most part abstained from voting. Under these circumstances Signor DEPRETIS took what seems to have been the best course both for himself and for the country. He set forth a programme, moderate in internal and national in foreign politics, by which he hoped to unite the majority of reasonable men on all sides of the Chamber. The members of the Right, to whom a return to office was for the present impossible, and to whom the demoralization of Parliamentary life in Italy had long been a scandal, accepted the overtures of Signor DEPRETIS, and a coalition was thus formed, containing the Right, the Centre, and a large part of the Left. The party in opposition, not included in the new coalition and consisting of about one-fifth of the whole Chamber, was led by Signori CAIROLI, CRISPI, and NICOTERA.

So far all promised well. For a time, at least, it seemed as if a party were established, united by common principles, and not merely by personal interests. Last May, however, dissensions broke out within the Cabinet, and two Ministers, Signori BACCARINI and ZANARDELLI, both members of the Left, resigned their offices. The loss of the latter was especially felt on account both of the number and the respectability of the group of deputies whom he leads. The result is that Signor DEPRETIS, once the leader of the Left, is now dependent for support on members of the Right and Centre. Of the party which once followed him, about fifty only have retained their allegiance. He can himself hardly complain. He passed the first quarter of a century of his Parliamentary life in systematic opposition to whatever Government was in power, opposing even such measures as the Crimean expedition, which won for Piedmont her place among European Powers, and paved the way for the events which transformed Piedmont into Italy. And since 1876, when his party first came into office, he has allied himself turn by turn with each and every group of which it is composed. It is obvious that the majority which he now commands, though still strong in point of numbers, cannot under such circumstances command any great moral authority throughout the country. What moral authority it possesses is due, not to him personally, but to the influence enjoyed by his new allies and old antagonists—the survivors and successors of the party once led by CAVOUR. It is due also in part to the still weaker moral authority of a party in which men such as Signori CRISPI and NICOTERA are among the leaders. More recently the bands which unite the majority which supports Signor DEPRETIS have been subjected to a severe strain, and one which presses with special force on his most patriotic and trustworthy followers. A Bill has been introduced into the Chamber dealing with University education in Italy, which is of such a character that the Clerical organs have welcomed it with enthusiasm. Its author, Signor BACCELLI, the Minister of Public Instruction, who has, from being a supporter of Papal Infallibility, become nominally a Radical, and is still suspected, not without reason, of a secret affection for his first political loves or interests, has engaged the Cabinet to support him. When a vote involving confidence in Signor BACCELLI came before the Chamber last December, the Government indeed obtained a majority; but nearly half of its usual supporters refused to vote. It is under such circumstances that the Italian Parliament meets again after the Christmas recess.

CABS AND CABMEN.

HOW little does civilization know of her most accomplished servants—her cabmen! The cabman of London, the cocher of Paris, is, like the gondolier of Venice, a mystery. It is universally admitted by poets and novelists that the apparently festive and light-hearted gondolier keeps in his bosom dark secrets of passion and crime. So does the otherwise genial cocher of Paris, at least according to a writer whose novels (in the Petit Journal) seem to be addressed chiefly to the drivers of fiacres. One seldom reads many pages of these realistic annals before coming to a crime committed in a cab, or to a criminal fleeing from justice in one fiacre, while justice (in the person of M. Pédouche) is after him, like a sleuthhound, in another fiacre. Has innocent maidenhood to be kidnapped and reft from her dear ones, the cab and the cabman are once more employed, and the heiress is decoyed into the wrong vehicle. The Parisian cabman's life, it appears, is an exciting and even remunerative one. He is constantly in receipt of pourboires varying from five to five hundred francs, which are showered on him by heroes, villains, detectives, damsels in distress by every one, in fact, who is in a terrible hurry.

London, like Paris, has her mysteries, and the cabman is one of them. One likes to think of him as one of the secret agents of civilization, like the doctor and the lawyer. He knows, or rather one of his class may be surmised to know, what became of that naval officer who once drove away from Jermyn Street in a hansom, and never was heard of again. He knows, or no man knows, what became of the parcel of engravings which disappeared in a cab some years ago. On this romantic view of the cabman, as of one who sees the night-side of London and the seamy side of human nature, it is pleasant to dwell. But this does not, on the whole, appear to be the aspect of the question which the cabman himself best loves to contemplate. He broods (when he does brood) over matters of fares and (in a mathematical humour) on radii, on admission to railway-stations, on the "Amalgamated Association," and on the kindness, fairness, thoughtfulness, and "impartiality" of Sir William Harcourt. While the cabman muses on these qualities his heart burns, and he expresses himself (not at all badly either) in The Hackney Carriage Guardian. The very first number of this monthly periodical lies before us. There is something hopeful and attractive in first numbers. This particular specimen throws a deluge of light on the ways and wants of that familiar figure who guides the wobbling hansom or perches on the box of the dawdling four-wheeler. He, too, is a man and a journalist.

The Hackney Carriage Guardian, No. I., begins with a review of the past year, a view tinged with the pessimism of Schopenhauer and Hartmann. What strikes a cabman most, in the gloomy records of the past, is the "fiendishness "most difficult to understand" of the Fenians. These miscreants, it is true, directed their dynamite, not against cabs, but against the Metropolitan Railway. But the cabman is too magnanimous not to feel for a rival mode of conveyance in distress. Another source of sorrow to the cabman is the reflection that "Republican-"ism is gaining ground among the lower classes," and, along with Republicanism, dissatisfaction. The cabman, though loyal, is himself dissatisfied, especially with the prospects of his own profession. "The cab trade has been in a "terribly depressed condition." This seems strange, as we had a fine summer, a fine autumn, and the town was especially crowded with the multitudes of human beings who thought they could amuse themselves by going to the Fisheries Exhibition. All these things were favourable to the cab-driving industry, "nevertheless the pinch was felt more "severely than in former years." The truth seems to be, according to the organ of cabmen, that we have too many cabs. "Competition has increased to such an enormous "extent lately that not only have the proprietors and drivers "of cabs had great difficulty in obtaining a living," but that the streets are inconveniently crowded with licensed vehicles. The supply of cabs exceeds the demand, though it is almost impossible to get a cab to drive to a station at half-past nine in the morning. If there are far too many cabs, why are the ricketty, useless, old boxes not driven out of the market by competition? And if competition be so eager, why are cabs so hard to find at certain, by no means very early, hours? Why, again, does not a cabman who promises to call for you at a given time and place invariably appear at his tryst? All this does not look as if competition were so excessively fierce. Nor, it must be confessed, do cabmen show any slavish desire to win the custom by elegant flattery, as perhaps they might do if competition were very active and times very bad. Times seem to be made still worse by an "Amalgamated Cab "Drivers' Association," of which our journalist does not approve. "We could no longer stand by and see the "Amalgamated Association, a society comprising but a "small section of the drivers, speaking in the name of the "trade." On the other hand, and by way of consolation, the Home Secretary, under whose gentle sway the cabman dwells, is noted, as we have seen, for his "kindness, fair-"ness, thoughtfulness, and impartiality," and is, in fact, the pillar of the cabman's hopes.

An important problem in connexion with cabs is proposed for solution by a writer in the Hackney Carriage Guardian, "Why do Cab Companies almost invariably fail?" Why do almost all Companies almost invariably fail? is a riddle the saddened shareholder frequently puts to himself. The answer to the wider conundrum could only be found in a general view of man in his cosmic relations. The failure of Cab Companies offers a more limited range to conjecture. There was a Company some years ago which offered improved cabs and civil cabmen. The latter were paid by little cheques or tickets which the Company were prepared to sell to the public. At the end of the day's work the driver gave up his cheques to an official of the Company, received his wages, and was free from care. What could be a wiser arrangement? But the Company did not succeed. "This great stupid public," as Thackeray called it (and Plato used language still less complimentary), would take no interest in the matter. The public hailed the first cab it met, good or bad. The public could not be troubled to buy the little books of cheques. The public paid the Company's drivers in ready money, which the drivers devoted to relieving their own private necessities. So the Hackney Carriage Guardian declares, and then is suddenly smitten with a scruple of conscience. Did all these things really happen, or are they only what would have happened if the Company had tried the experiment? Have we been reading myth, or parable, or history? The Guardian is not sure. Of one thing we may be certain. The system of little cheques would have fared no better than the system of little coloured flags, devised by an ingenious Home Secretary in days gone by. It is the great stupid public that stands in the way of all attempts to help it. We are always in a hurry, we cannot be troubled to stop and understand things; we are maddened by official rules and regulations like the mystic laws governing cabs at Parisian railway stations. The Guardian gives a rather cynical account of the lives and deaths of Cab Companies. It appears that none of the employed believe in their permanence, and, therefore, make (or rather steal) hay, and corn too, while the sun shines. Philanthropy has dabbled in cab-shares, and, as usual, the business has only paid after "the "philanthropic element had been withdrawn." As a rule, it seems, promoters of Cab Companies overestimate the profits and underestimate the expenses. But so do all men everywhere. Probably it is difficult to secure the very strict surveillance needed by a trade so casual and fluctuating as cab-driving.

Socially cabmen appear, as represented in their new journal, to be a genial set of men greatly addicted to comic and sentimental melodies. If their woes are really the result of over-competition, there seems no hope for them till Mr. Hyndman's new Cloud Cuckoo Town comes down from the air, apparelled like a bride, and altogether free from the trammels of human existence and the laws of human society.

THE PRUSSIAN DEBATE ON DIRECT TAXATION.

THE general debate on the fiscal proposals of the Government has not only been the liveliest in which the Prussian Parliament has indulged during its present session; but it has possessed a greater general interest than any other. The details of the Bills have of course only a local importance, but the principles on which they were discussed are far-reaching, and the position adopted by the various parties is worthy of notice, on account of the light it throws on the present condition of public opinion, and the forecast it therefore permits as to the spirit in which Prince Bismarck's larger measures are likely to be received by the Reichstag and the country generally. On the whole, the debate must have been reassuring to the advocates of the Chancellor's policy.

It will be remembered that the object of the Governmental scheme is to readjust direct taxation so as to render it less oppressive to the poor, and its substance, if we omit the details, which can have but a small interest for Englishmen, and the points which gave rise to no serious discussion, may be stated as follows. It is proposed to reduce the tax on all incomes earned by personal exertion which do not amount to 500*l.* a year; those below 60*l.* are to be exempted altogether: the impost will then begin at 1, and gradually rise to 3 per cent., at which point it is to remain stationary. In order to supply the loss thus caused to the revenue a duty is to be imposed on the interest of securities, beginning at ½ per cent. on incomes of 30*l.* derived from this source, and increasing to 2 per cent. on incomes of more than 500*l.* a year. There are several exemptions from this tax, as in the case of widows and orphans of small means, to which we need not refer.

When the intention to impose this new duty was first announced in the speech from the Throne the Liberal papers asserted positively, and almost unanimously, that no such plan could be even considered, unless new burdens were at the same time laid on the great landed proprietors. We pointed out at the time that, in the opinion of the peasants and country gentlemen of Prussia, the new tax was a partial redress of a distinct wrong; their own capital which is invested in their estates has long been made to contribute to the expenses of the State, while that of their neighbours who have bought shares in banking, railway, or mining Companies has been exempt. On this point their arguments have been so strong that no single member of the Opposition ventured to dispute them, and the only allusions made to the "great principle" which was so loudly advanced only a few weeks ago came from the Conservative benches, from which speaker after member challenged the Opposition to discuss the point on which its organs in the press had been so eloquent. In vain, the Liberal leaders simply declared that they were not responsible for the newspapers of their party.

On the other hand, new objections to the proposal of the Ministers have been made which are certainly worthy of attention. The whole system of election to Parliament, as well as to the municipal councils in the complicated Constitution of Prussia, depends on the class system, which is determined by the amount of the direct taxes paid by the members of each class. Are those who are exempted from the Income-tax to be deprived of their votes? According to the theory of the Constitution it should be so; but the debate showed that no party is willing to draw the necessary conclusion from the old constitutional premisses. None desires to disenfranchise the poorer classes of the present electorate; and the Minister went so far as to say that if the Special Committee could discover better guarantees than those contained in the Bill against this danger, the Government would be prepared not only to consider but to accept them. Dr. WINDTHORST was doubtless logically in the right when he argued that this must lead to universal suffrage; but politics are not always logical.

Again, it is generally supposed that the new duty will somewhat more than cover the deficit created by the reduction in the Income-tax. Is the surplus to be left in the hand of the Ministry? The Centre and all the Liberal groups refuse to consent to this. The Liberals desire to follow the English system of determining the rate of the impost from year to year. The Government objects that this would render the establishment either of a State or a family budget far more difficult than it has hitherto been; and, when we remember the complications introduced by the system of graduation, it cannot be denied that there is some force in the objection, in so far, at least, as the State is concerned. The inconvenience might, of course, be overcome; but every inconvenience for a State means an increase of its expenditure, and at present thrift is the fashion in Prussia.

There can be no doubt that the tax has been the source of great suffering to those whose income does not exceed 60*l.* a year. Papers before the House showed, and the Minister called attention to the fact, that it has only been collected by means of 304,000 summonses and 40,000 distraints upon goods. Yet it was repeatedly asserted during the debate that the local rates are still more oppressive. They are estimated on the basis of the Income-tax; but in the smaller towns, where there are few wealthy inhabitants, it is impossible to exempt the poor from them. It was generally admitted by the supporters of the proposed reform that a remedy should be sought to this evil also.

The most remarkable feature in the debate was the position adopted by the Centre. The organization of the Roman Catholic Church affords it an opportunity which no other Parliamentary party possesses of becoming acquainted with the real wants and wishes of the poor, and this lends its opinion on social questions an unusual weight. With the exception of Dr. REICHENSPERGER, its leaders have on the present occasion warmly welcomed the principle of the Ministerial measure; their only complaint is that it has not been more fully carried out. They propose to apply the increasing scale to incomes of more than 500*l.*, and to devote any surplus the new duty may yield to the relief of the local rates. A graduated Income-tax has so often been advocated by Socialists that it is in general regarded with a wholesome fear by more sober politicians, as it might be used with fatal results for the purpose of effecting a redistribution of property. There is, however, but little danger that any Prussian Minister should entertain, or any Prussian Parliament sanction, communistic vagaries; and the present Government would probably find no great difficulty in consoling itself if it were compelled by Parliamentary pressure to adopt this part of the Clerical scheme. It is, however, strongly disinclined to permit a possible surplus to be tied up in any way. Unless it makes some concession on this point, it is not unlikely that the measure may be lost. It will doubtless be considerably modified before it issues from the Committee to which it has been consigned.

In spite of the great energy and pugnacity of Dr. RICHTER's speech, the debate shows that the Liberals are profoundly discouraged. If this arises from a consciousness that the social reforms proposed by the Government are popular in the country it will probably affect their action in the Imperial as well as in the Prussian Parliament, though they still possess a majority in the former body; and in that case Prince BISMARCK will find little difficulty in passing his Insurance Bill. That many details of the measure, on which we commented last week, will be modified before it becomes law is certain; in its present form it professes to be only a draft. But public opinion, in so far as it has hitherto been expressed, is, on the whole, favourable to the principles on which it is founded; and among the speakers who have raised the most serious objections to certain provisions of the Act, both in the Economic Council, which has just been opened, and the Chambers of Commerce which have already taken the Governmental proposal into consideration, there were many who declared that, in spite of their dislike to certain parts of it, they would rather accept than reject the measure before them as it stood if that were the only choice open to them. It is, therefore, not improbable that the CHANCELLOR's social policy may have a fair trial, and that the wish of the EMPEROR may be fulfilled. He is known to have long desired that a serious effort to mitigate the sufferings of the poor might be the crowning labour of his long and glorious career.

PANICS AND FIRES.

LAST week we described the nature of the exits from theatres, and declared that the public knowledge of the scantiness of the exits was the real cause of panic. A week has not passed without justifying our remarks, though happily there was no real danger and the panic caused no mortal harm. A pantomime was being played in the Public Hall at Wrexham, which was thus converted into a theatre for the moment. During the harlequinade the cry of "Fire!" was raised. The exits, according to some reports (the clause is suppressed in others), "were none too "many," and consequently a panic, and a perilous panic, seized the audience. The performers and some men who kept their heads in the confusion prevented the audience from crushing each other to death in the usual fashion. There were "no worse results than serious shocks to "nervous systems, bruised limbs, and destruction of pro-"perty." These are the consequences of a state of alarm, natural, not to say certain, in the circumstances.

MADAGASCAR.

THE latest news from Madagascar more than confirms the suspicions excited by the first telegrams. We have now detailed accounts of the operations of the French squadron on the coast, and they prove beyond all question of a doubt that Admiral GALIBER is carrying out the policy of mere destruction begun by his predecessor

Ships under his command cruise round the coast of the island, and shell towns from which no shot is ever fired at them. As it must be sufficiently obvious that military measures of this kind are not calculated to do much harm to the Hovas, it must be supposed that the French undertake them for some purpose other than the subjection of the native enemies. What that purpose is can be easily discovered. The possession of a part of a Madagascar, or even of the whole, would seem comparatively worthless to Frenchmen unless they had a fairly good chance of being the only people to make money out of it. As a preliminary step to clearing the island of all foreigners, it is a practical measure which can at least do no harm to cause them all possible loss during the course of the war. Firing with shells at unfortified towns containing nothing of any value to be destroyed which is not the property of neutrals, and generally of Englishmen, is a most effectual way of doing this. And the work is not done only on the coast. From the letters of colonists who have been driven out, it appears that the plantations which had been begun to be made by British subjects towards the interior have been destroyed in a wanton fashion. The buildings and machinery have been scattered by gunpowder, and the fields laid waste. It had been foreseen all along that a war undertaken in the spirit of a Stock Exchange speculator of doubtful morality for the avowed purpose of making a good thing out of a colonial exploitation would inflict these misfortunes on neutrals, and it will continue to do so as long as it lasts. There is no evidence that all this mischief is the work of the French alone. Indeed it is more than probable that the greater part of it has been done by the Hovas, but the French are to a great extent indirectly responsible for it. A European Power which undertakes military operations against a barbarous enemy must be prepared to find that he acts according to his nature. The more disorderly part of the Hova forces draw no distinction between one kind of foreigner and another, but simply revenge themselves on all alike. It was the moral duty of France to see that, and to undertake the war with forces enough to protect unarmed neutrals, and bring it to a speedy decision.

There seems no immediate prospect of putting an end to this so-called war. If the news sent to Europe is to be trusted, the negotiations lately undertaken have come to nothing, because the French insist on establishing a protectorate over all Madagascar, and are claiming a right of controlling the foreign relations of the Hovas. The native Government may not unreasonably conclude that the most disastrous war could scarcely go further to deprive them of their independence, and that the present state of things is preferable. The Hovas can afford to continue fighting, or at least standing ready to fight, near the coast for an indefinite period. They are not likely to feel seriously frightened until they are threatened with actual invasion by a force strong enough to force its way to the capital. In all probability the Ambassadors who have lately returned from Europe learnt enough to be able to assure their countrymen that no such invasion is probable for the present. Nobody doubts that a properly organized French expedition, under a vigorous officer, could force its way easily enough to Antananarivo, and the Hovas perhaps least of all. It is, however, very doubtful whether Franco would be inclined to incur the heavy expense. That also the Hovas, no doubt, know well enough, and they are perfectly justified in hoping to tire out their enemy until he is content to accept a round sum of money as an excuse for taking himself off. If the question were wholly between the Hovas and the French, it might be left to drag itself along until it came to a round sum of money, which is always to be met somewhere in the diplomacy of the Third Republic. As far, however, as material interests are concerned we are far more affected by war than either of the principals. A considerable number of British subjects are being ruined by it, and it is certainly not too soon to ask whether something effectual cannot be done for their protection. A neutral is expected to take his chance of loss from the misfortunes of the country in which he is settled in Europe. An Englishman who had been ruined by the war of 1866 would have had no excuse for insisting that his native Government should demand compensation for him from Prussia or Austria. In Europe, however, the risks can be calculated. It is tolerably sure that no harm will be done except for a deliberate military purpose; but in barbarous countries that is not the case. Neutrals who belong to European States are, therefore, entitled to an exceptional degree of protection from their own Government, and to expect that a civilized belligerent should give them some security against mere outrage. In Madagascar the civilized belligerent is acting on the principles of his barbarous enemy. It would, perhaps, produce a wholesome effect, and it would most assuredly not appear any excess of zeal on the part of the English Government, if it were to ask the French to act up to their professions, and to make it clearly understood at the same time that, in case of non compliance, it would itself take measures for the protection of its subjects.

BOXING AND SPARRING.

IT would be vain to pretend that the art of self-defence—to use its old-fashioned name—has suffered no injury by the suppression of prize-fights. A battle with the bare fists between men carefully trained and prepared for the business is no less necessary to determine their relative merits as boxers, than a race is to test the pretensions of two race-horses, or a course after a hare to settle which is the better of two greyhounds. If in either of these latter cases it should become impossible or illegal to apply the natural and obvious test, no doubt various expedients might be devised for arriving at a decision. Speed, strength, and activity may all be exhibited in different ways besides by racing and coursing; and an experienced judge may often be able to pick out the better of two animals without actually pitting them against one another. But in all such trials there is lacking the chief element which lends excitement to competitions, and which makes victory most pleasurable and decisive. The palm is awarded, not by actual manifest superiority in a contest fought out to the end, but by the verdict of man, who by his nature is of fallible judgment. The same thing may be said of modern boxing, which is the mere shadow and semblance of what it was formerly. Fifty years ago sparring with the gloves was regarded chiefly as a means to an end. The teacher of it instructed his pupil, not with a view of enabling him to use the glove prettily, but how to use his fist with most effect. The critic looking on at an encounter in Bendigo's rooms estimated the value of each blow, not at all by the effect it had when delivered with the gloved fist, but by the effect it would have produced if the glove had not been there. Sparring was then the mere science underlying the more practical art of pugilism. It has now usurped both titles, and is considered more often as the end than as the means. Now and then, it is true, we find a man going to learn boxing because he thinks "it may be useful to him in a street row"; but the far greater part of those who now take lessons do so purely with the desire of excelling in competitions with the gloves. Half the men who win most honours and prizes in these competitions have never struck a blow with the bare fist since they were at school, and are little likely to do so till the day of their death. Accordingly the spectators at an assault of arms, which is now the favourite occasion for a display of pugilistic science, no longer try to imagine what each blow would be like if the glove was off when it was delivered. They count the hits, not for what they represent, but for what they are; and thus often a loud-sounding slap with the half-open glove is applauded as a most telling stroke, while the neat "upper-cut," which would tell to the time more heavily in a real battle, passes comparatively unnoticed and possibly unseen except by a few. Thus there are now two wholly different aspects in which the art may be regarded; but whichever of these is chosen, it will appear that boxing, whether as a science or an art, has been severely injured by the extinction of professional fighting. For, in the first place, it is no longer worth a man's while, whatever his station may be, to devote the whole of his time to attaining proficiency in it. In the days of Tom Cribb and Mendoza, or even of Heenan and Tom Sayers, men gifted with the requisite physique and pluck might safely abandon the handicraft for which they had been designed in order to perfect themselves in the knowledge of "upper-cuts" and "cross-counters," and such-like mysteries, in the assurance that while young they would be trained and made much of at other people's expense, and when old would earn at least a fair livelihood by teaching the same tactics to their juniors. In these times there is no reasonable prospect that one man in a hundred, however muscular and courageous, will be able to earn a tolerable livelihood either by distinguishing himself as a scientific performer with the gloves or by becoming a "professor" of the art. Hence, where a dozen men became accomplished pugilists a century ago, not one will now find it worth his while to acquire the powers of nerve, the quickness of eye, and activity of limb which go to make up a complete master of the science. Without those mentors who have themselves done battle in "the ring," and who in earlier days taught all aspirants to amateur and professional honours, it is impossible that the art itself should not deteriorate. To this day the most successful teachers are those who have once been prize-fighters; and, as the numbers of such men rapidly diminish, so does the chance of learning in a good school become more and more rare. It would, of course, be absurd in this enlightened age to express anything like regret that this should be so. If any barbarians still exist who imagine that pugilism had anything to commend it, they keep their opinions to themselves when they are wise. But it will be admitted that for those who merely desire to learn the still lawful art of "sparring,"

there is some vexation in the thought that they can only be taught by counterfeit boxers trained in a new and inferior school. It would be annoying to a soldier to find that his course of instruction was sketched out by the winners in military tournaments for lack of men who had any experience on the field of battle.

Another thing which operates to the discouragement of this amusement, even regarded in that one of its forms to which the humanitarians first object, is the fact that no one knows exactly what sort of pugilism is or is not illegal. To illustrate the difficulty it is necessary to define rather precisely what forms of pugilism exist; and this would be much easier if the three or four words describing them were used each in one particular meaning, instead of being applied indiscriminately, as some of them are, to several different things. Thus, if an engagement with the bare fists were always described simply as "fighting," and never called "boxing," as it sometimes is now, there would be no difficulty as to the name for that sort of pugilism which is most plainly illegal and criminal. Next in order to it comes the species best defined as a "glove fight," which, in its most perfect development, resembles a prize-fight in all respects save only that gloves are used and wrestling and holding are disallowed. It continues, round after round, with specified intervals, until one man or his second cries "Hold, enough"; and this is seldom done till the man has been "punished" almost as much as if he had been engaged on the old-fashioned terms. It is not difficult to see that this species of encounter is as deserving of suppression as the prize-fight properly so called. The objections urged against the one apply with nearly equal force to the other, and, accordingly, the magistrates before whom the participators in such contests have been brought have not had much hesitation in pronouncing them illegal. A much more troublesome question arises when we arrive at the next variety of boxing-match, in which, ostensibly at least, the combatants do not go on till one can go on no longer, but a limit of time is fixed, during which they are to do the best they can, and, if neither is finished off before the specified moment arrives, it rests with the judges or umpire to declare which has acquitted himself the best. It is manifest that this sort of trial may be so arranged as to differ little more than in name from the glove-fight. If the time allowed for it is long, and the breathing time between each round limited to half a minute; if "infighting" is not discouraged, and the blows are estimated merely by the damage they seem to do, there would be some absurdity in pronouncing it lawful while men were being punished for engaging in glove-fights. On the other hand, the contest may be so managed as to resemble much more closely what is usually called "sparring." In this last the men are not allowed to remain at close quarters, but separated whenever they get together and begin infighting. Half-arm blows delivered in a scrimmage are not usually allowed to count; and the clumsy round-armed hit, even though it does more harm to the recipient, is not esteemed so highly as a straight hit made correctly from the shoulder. The attitude and action of each man are taken into account; and, in short, the whole affair is an exhibition of skill and science rather than of brute force.

We have thus four different species of encounter, of which the first two—fighting and glove-fighting—are clearly prohibited; and the last—sparring properly so called—has not yet been tabooed by the most eager magisterial exponent of modern morality. Between the two extremes comes that which we have elected to call "boxing," which has at various times, and according to its various developments, been allowed or disallowed. Here it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to fix the exact limit between what is lawful and what is not. The question must be left to a large extent to the appreciation of those who have to expound the law; and a score of circumstances, which may seem unimportant, must assist them in determining whether the boxers are engaged in sparring or in a disguised fight. It is not possible to draw a hard and fast line between sparring and fighting in the same way as it is between fencing and small-sword play, or between single-stick and the use of the broad-sword, and that chiefly for two reasons. First, the glove does not by any means completely deaden the force of the blow—not nearly so much so as does the substitution of a foil for a rapier or a stick for a broadsword; and secondly, size, and more especially weight, count for far more in sparring than in fencing or single-stick. The result of this is that even in a match conducted under the best rules, a man of weak physique is apt to be "knocked out of time" by a more robust though less skilful adversary. It is, and must always be, a rule that in order to win his heat a man must stand up for a certain time—generally ten minutes with some few intervals—in front of the other. It follows, therefore, that if by a severe blow he is rendered insensible, he cannot fulfil the conditions, and the other man carries off the verdict, not because he has in the opinion of the judges done best, but because his opponent has retired from the field through inability to conform to the rules. This is no doubt a serious objection to the matches in which it is wished to encourage science rather than heavy hitting; but it may be observed that, when a man has devoted any careful attention to his training, and also has that quickness of eye and judgment of distance which is part of the qualifications of a scientific boxer, he is very unlikely to be thus put hors de combat. Accordingly the case is not really much more common amongst the first flight of amateurs than would be the spraining of a foot in fencing or a wrist in broad-sword play: certainly it is much more rare than the disabling of a man in football by some accident arising out of the inevitable roughness of the game.

It has been the object, not only of the magistrates who have to deal with alleged "breaches of the peace" but also of most respectable athletic clubs, to ascertain as far as may be the true boundary between sparring and more doubtful sorts of boxing, and to encourage the one while setting their faces against the other. The amateurs who manage our annual English competitions, and more especially those who preside over the competitions for the Queensberry prizes, have always endeavoured strenuously to discourage anything like rough play. They do not absolutely disqualify a man who is obviously playing to "knock out" his opponent, but they warn him that their verdict will not be earned by mere hard hitting, and, if he persists in his violence, they rather stretch a point in favour of the man who resorts to no such tactics. Here, however, we are brought to that most difficult part of the whole subject—What is the true principle upon which to decide a sparring match? Now in half the contests which take place the candidates are in doubt as to how far their performance is to be judged by the telling force of each blow delivered and how far by the mere frequency with which they hit their opponent. It may perhaps be rash to answer offhand such a question as this, which is variously treated in different schools and at different displays. But we will nevertheless, at the risk of being found fault with by one set of judges or another, venture to lay down a few rules which we believe to be the true ones. At any rate we are assured that they have the approval of many amateurs who have the greatest experience in judging these matches both amongst their own class and amongst professionals. The test of a good man is, then, certainly not to be found in the number of hits he scores. Otherwise a man who kept flipping his adversary with the tips of his glove-fingers might be adjudged a better performer than one who planted every blow full and fair on the spot aimed at. A man who with rounded arm and out-turned elbow ran in upon his antagonist, and, though met with a direct hit in the face, managed to riposte with two half-arm blows, would at that rate be hailed the winner. This is clearly wrong; for the quality of the blow ought to determine its value, and a straight "left-hander" from the shoulder given without a return may fairly count twice as much as one delivered in a bungling way in a hand-to-hand scrimmage. Again, a man who stands his ground and easily stops or eludes each attack is obviously entitled to more credit than one who is always running or jumping about and is "all over the ring." The reason is obvious; one of the two would, if the contest continued, soon wear out his own strength, whereas the other, remaining fresh, would soon be able to "go in and finish off" the fidgety boxer. Another point that should be considered is "leading off." To stand always on the defensive and only rely upon "countering" is not so much to a man's credit as to commence the attack; and if the hits are equal the prize ought to be awarded to the man who is seen to have done the most work in attacking. But perhaps the point which a good judge most carefully observes and a bad one most disregards is that science which is known as "timing." A blow which meets a man as he comes forward has usually more effect than two which strike him as he is standing quite still, or four which overtake him as he is drawing back. Now the art of timing depends partly upon so delivering the blow that it meets an advancing foe, though it also has to do with the quickness of sight which perceives when an enemy is uncovered for a fraction of a second. It is obvious that these matters ought to be regarded by a judge in arriving at his decision.

Enough has been said to show how much more there is to be noted in judging these matches than the vulgar herd suppose. The same reasons which make the office of judge so arduous make it also necessary to the making of a good boxer that he should have had long and careful practice with a variety of opponents. It is for these reasons that boxing never has been and never can be so nearly reduced to the condition of an exact science as fencing or single-stick. It must, however, be admitted that a great advance has been made of late years towards thus "precising" the methods of attack and defence; and it would be unfair to omit mention of the treatise in which this result has been successfully aimed at. "Professor" Donelly, who, if we mistake not, qualified himself in the most orthodox way to be a teacher of boxing, has spent much time and pains in elaborating the science as a science. He obtained photographs from life illustrating the exact attitudes in which men should find themselves at various stages in the act of hitting and guarding, and added them to the verbal directions given in his book. By this means "cross-counters," in all their various forms, are understood at a glance. The proper position of the head, foot, and body in executing each movement is described with almost as much exactitude as it is by a fencing-master; and the side-step—most puzzling of all tactics to a beginner—ceases to be a mystery as quickly as the "trois-temps" when explained by a dancing-master. It must, moreover, be confessed that there are several other "professors" still living who keep up the best unwritten traditions of their art. As for amateurs, there was perhaps never a greater desire amongst them to learn sparring than there is now. The professional element has been discouraged, as aforesaid, firstly by the ruin of the "P.R.," and, secondly, by the absurd decisions which have been given as to legitimate and unlawful matches. But, if the boundary-line between the two classes of encounter were once made out, as it might be without real difficulty, there need be no reason why all classes of the community should not be allowed to engage in an amusement long peculiarly popular in this country. The only thing that is required to keep alive that amusement is that the supporters of it should keep "sparring" entirely separate from boxing or fighting, and so prevent it from degenerating into what the moralists of the age have resolved to characterize as "brutality."

THE NAVY.

THE warnings of those who endeavour to make Englishmen realize the naval weakness of their country are usually treated with a placid consistency which certainly appears to be effective. They are, generally speaking, either ignored altogether or met by the meagre statements, free from any tiresome detail, showing that everything is for the best in the best of all possible navies, which officials are always ready to make and Englishmen apparently always ready to accept. To attacks in the House of Commons some reply must of course be made; but any nonsense is thought good enough for an answer to a naval critic, there being a happy certainty that his complaints will awaken small echo in the country. To attacks made outside the House of Commons an official or semi-official reply is rarely given, whatever the position and authority of the assailants may be, full reliance being commonly placed at Whitehall on what may be termed either the complete apathy of the public or its complete confidence in Lord Northbrook and Sir T. Brassey and Mr. Campbell-Bannerman and in their power of greatly increasing the strength of the navy without increasing expenditure. That this is, from a political point of view, the best system to adhere to; that it is difficult to overrate the general indifference; and that complete silence is the best answer to criticisms, however well supported by facts and figures, seems undeniable; but even the calmest officials cannot always maintain their absolute trust in the apathy of the public, and sometimes there is a departure from the excellent system of mutism, which, for the sake of official peace of mind, ought never to be abandoned. Occasionally the Admiralty does attempt, in no very open or ingenuous manner, to answer the attacks of critics outside the House. Twice within the last twelve months this has been done, and the result has been singular, as in each case the result of the lengthy and confused defence has been to strengthen the case of the assailants. To show how much it has been strengthened, and what the nature of these remarkable replies has been, it is necessary to give a short retrospect.

Just a year ago Sir Edward Reed addressed a powerful letter to the Times in which he contended that the principle followed by First Lords and Chancellors of the Exchequer of limiting the annual expenditure of the navy to something between ten and eleven millions sterling was only maintained by the steady, deliberate, and continued reduction of our naval strength, inasmuch as the charges for half-pay, pensions, and for non-effective services generally were continually on the increase, and encroached more and more every year on effective expenditure. As Sir E. Reed is an ardent Liberal and a supporter of the present Government, his strictures could hardly be said to be due to that party feeling which the present Ministers, with due regard for their own past, so justly condemn, but nevertheless his letter remained unanswered, though, if he had been wholly or partially wrong in his main facts, it would have been extremely easy to have set him right. Some months later, however, the representatives of the Admiralty had perforce to speak, as, although newspaper attacks can be ignored, it is not unfortunately at present allowable to ask for votes in the House of Commons without giving some sort of explanation and without making some sort of answer to critics. In the debate on the Estimates in May last Sir Thomas Brassey, who was followed by Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, strove to show that, in first-class ships built and building, our navy was greatly superior to that of France. To prove this he made no detailed comparison, but gave totals merely, taking the very fallacious test of displacement tonnage. As he appeared to be under the impression that three times 8,500 was 22,200, his figures, which were scarcely reconcilable with those given in his own book, could hardly be thought much of except, perhaps, by the higher mathematicians; and they were practically demolished by Captain Price, R.N., the member for Devonport, who, in a letter to the Times, carefully compared thickness of plating and power of guns in English and French ships, and showed that at the end of the year the French would be ahead of us. No answer was made to his letter, at least, for a long while; and in like manner silence was for a time deemed the best reply to Admiral of the Fleet Sir Thomas Symonds, who fully compared the French ironclads of modern construction with ours, and showed that the French were rapidly coming up to us, and were almost certain to pass us soon. Here, as with Sir E. Reed, if statements were wrong or statistics erroneous, it would have been very easy to correct them; but, so far as we are aware, no attempt was made to do this, and the Admiral's criticisms thus received the strongest confirmation. Some time after their appearance, however, silence was at last broken and an answer given to the assailants of the Admiralty generally. In October last the Times published a long semi-official article on the visit of the Lords of the Admiralty to Portsmouth, and the writer prefaced his account of what was being done—a very interesting one, we may observe—by an attempt to exculpate the Board, pointing out discrepancies between the views of their critics and repeating Sir T. Brassey's statements. What the vindication was worth it was not then, and certainly is not now, necessary to inquire, as at the end of it the author very obligingly admitted the whole of the opponent's case. He said that the Admiralty deserved some credit for not refurbishing obsolete vessels, but for preferring "to devote the bulk of their limited resources to pushing forward the construction of ironclads capable of meeting an equal, if not superior, terms the ironclad navy of France." Now even the Premier himself could hardly attempt to show that this was anything but a plain admission that there was great danger of the French ironclad navy surpassing ours, which was precisely what the alarmists had so long and so steadily maintained without receiving any satisfactory response.

So much for the first attempt to defend the Admiralty. It admitted that the French were abreast, or perhaps ahead of us, and admitted by implication that the Board had not money enough, thereby showing that Sir E. Reed was perfectly right in what he had said at the beginning of the year. The second attempt at vindication, which was of much later date, was scarcely more fortunate. On the 2nd of the present month the Times published another long semi-official article, in which much trouble was taken to show that there had been lately a considerable increase in construction, and specially in the construction of armour-plated ships. In one extraordinary sentence the writer directly contradicted his own assertion; but this was apparently a slip of the pen, and it may be allowed that he was not unsuccessful in his attempt to prove that there had been more activity during the last three years than there had been before: but, if all his facts are taken for granted, the strictures of the alarmists are in no way weakened. It seems very difficult for those who speak on the Government side in this matter to look at it from any other than a party point of view. Their best answer to any demonstration of our naval weakness is to show that when Mr. W. H. Smith was in power we were weaker still. Even to political opponents this is a doubtful reply, but to those who look at the question from a national point of view—that is to say, to all who interest themselves in the subject, and are not carried away by party spirit—praise of Lord Northbrook's doings, as compared with those of his predecessor, is about as interesting as a discussion respecting the merits of Lord St. Vincent's administration would be. What is gravely stated, and to all appearance proved, is that the English navy is not so strong, compared with other navies, and notably with the French, as it should be, and that no such strenuous efforts as are required are being made to give it the strength it ought to possess. To answer that the present Board is not so supine as another Board has been is a mere appeal to party feeling, which is altogether wide of the main issue. When this line of defence is for a moment departed from, and an attempt made to reply to those who speak of the feebleness of our one safeguard against invasion, futilities and claptrap are all that can be offered. At the conclusion of the article above mentioned the writer endeavours to show that there is no ground for apprehension, and as the best proof he can give, quotes the words with which Sir T. Brassey was good enough to reassure Englishmen in a speech he made at Liverpool two years ago. The able historian of ironclads then said:—"We may be calm and confident because we know our inherent strength. If the resources of our private yards were utilized, as they would be in case of necessity, we know what the result would be. Setting aside the dockyards, united Europe could do nothing in comparison with our private industrial establishments. The mercantile marine is the backbone of the navy." Every public man has occasionally to talk nonsense, and on this occasion Sir T. Brassey was submitting to this inevitable necessity and talking arrant nonsense such as the most serious politicians cannot always avoid; and it can hardly be supposed that he meant his words to be taken seriously. No doubt the resources of our private yards could be utilized if, with a thoughtful regard for our interest, a foreign Power were to give us two or three years' notice of its intention to declare war—but not otherwise. To say that the mercantile marine is the backbone of the navy is as true as it would be to say that boatmen are the backbone of the mercantile marine. Never were sailors of the Royal Navy more separated from merchant seamen than they are now, and never, unfortunately, was skill in handling sails of so little account as now. What are required for warships are men who thoroughly know how to work guns of all kinds, not men who can merely set or take in sail. The Naval Reserve might render good service in war, but the ordinary merchant seaman would, in many cases, not be of much more use on board a man-of-war than a Kentish hoveller would be on board a sea-going vessel. As to armed merchant ships, it can only be said that it is by no means certain that they would not be promptly sent to the bottom. It is true that, in March last, there were, out of 4,000 merchant steamers of 100 tons and upwards, 300 vessels capable of remaining afloat with one compartment full of water, but perhaps even these specially strong ships would not be much use in warfare, as any but a very clumsy adversary would probably succeed in piercing two compartments, and in destroying very rapidly a portion of the backbone of the navy. Before using this unhappy expression, which has been so unhappily relied on, Sir T. Brassey would have done well to have referred to the memorandum issued by Mr. Barnaby in October 1880 respecting the unfitness of merchant ships for war purposes, and to the old experiments on the effect of shot on iron ships to which Admiral of the Fleet Sir Thomas Symonds has so aptly drawn attention.

The second attempt to defend the present Board of the Admiralty was then in no way more successful than the first had been. One writer, carried away by an irresistible spirit of candour, had to make an admission which was fatal to his whole argument; the other had to resort to second-hand claptrap. This week indeed the Times published an alarmist article which characteristically enough began with a sneer at alarmists. The extreme weakness of the answers which have been given through the press to the critics of the naval policy of the Government is, to say the least, a strong proof of the justice of their censures; but, if even this is not thought sufficient by those who see in the use of the word alarmist an answer to everything, there is, as it happens, at this moment proof yet more positive and absolute, proof which comes from tangible fact of the insufficiency of our naval armaments. For some time past the behaviour of the French in the far East has not been of a pacific nature, and, to aid them in carrying out operations which are not calculated to promote peace and goodwill, they have a very strong squadron in Chinese waters. We have, as we pointed out when previously treating this subject, but a very feeble one, although we have enormous interests, infinitely greater than those of the French, to protect in China; and if unpleasant difficulties arose and Admiral Courbet thought fit to act in the spirit of the late Admiral Pierre, who showed so clearly what French officers think of English naval power, he might order the British ships to withdraw, with the certainty of being able to sink them if his order was not complied with. For the weakness of the fleet where a strong fleet is so sorely needed there can be but one reason—utter inability to send more ships or men; and in face of this grave fact it can hardly be contended by any one who is not a slave to party feeling or to a few catchwords and phrases, that our strength is what it should be, and that the complaints which have been made respecting the naval policy now pursued are unfounded and due to mere nervous apprehension which Englishmen may justly disregard.

THE PIED ELEPHANT

THE coming of Toung Taloung has been celebrated by himself with trumpetings and by the daily papers with a curious amount of controversy. Naturalists, theologians, travellers, doctors, and other eminent personages have entered the lists, and we have many discrepant accounts of the animal, some asserting that he is an albino, some that he is a leper, some that he is nothing in particular, and others that he is a god, a knight, a king, or a very ordinary elephant. The British public is attracted by the subject. Natural history is popular in England at any time, owing perhaps to the prevalent love of sport. An elephant with real tusks has not been seen here for some years. Even if he had not been announced as white, the Burmese stranger would have been visited on this account. But when we hear that in addition to his tusks he has two Buddhist priests, that his attendants fulfil in their services the precept that "work is worship," and when, in addition, we are informed that a white elephant need not be white all over, but is quite as much venerated if he is piebald, it is easy to understand the excitement which draws thousands every day to visit the Zoological Gardens in spite of the weather.

It appears from Mr. Carl Bock's book on Temples and Elephants, which has made its appearance in the nick of time, that real albinos are sometimes discovered. He not only saw one in Siam, but was allowed to make a drawing of it in colours. It resembles nothing so much as a white pig. The skin is certainly not white, rather pink or brown, but along the profile of the back, so to speak, is a row of white bristles, and a scattering of the same character adorns the tail. Mr. Bock says, "Were I to describe him as white, I should lay myself open to the charge of colour-blindness; but he was quite an albino, the whole body being of a pale reddish-brown colour, with a few real white hairs on the back. The iris of the eye, the colour of which is held to be a good test of an albino, was a pale Naples yellow." How very different Mr. Barnum's elephant is may be judged from the account given of him by Mr. Balmanno Squire, who writes to the papers that Toung Taloung is suffering from a disease known as "leucoderma"—a "disease," that is, as distinguished from a "complaint," seeing the patient does not suffer in any way from it, while he changes colour like a chameleon, and being, in the human subject, at least, usually a negro, belies the saying about the Ethiopian and his skin. "The individual affected with leucoderma is not born so." He acquires his whiteness gradually, first in spots, then in large patches, ending with either entire whiteness almost like that of an albino, or else, after two or three years, with sudden and complete recovery. How disappointing it must be to a negro, after spending two or three years buoyed up with the hope of turning as pale as a European, to find himself relapsing into his pristine darkness!

If Toung Taloung, then, is not an albino, or congenitally piebald, it is possible that, after he has adorned Mr. Barnum's show for a few years, he may become as other elephants, and present a pale face no longer to the admiring gaze of the visitor. But the Times of Wednesday presents another and still more disappointing view of the case. Mr. C. P. Sanderson, who is thoroughly well qualified to give an opinion, since he is Superintendent of Government Elephant-Catching Operations in Bengal, thinks Mr. Barnum has been gulled. Mr. Sanderson is at issue with Mr. Bock. He tells us that Mr. Barnum has not got a white elephant, "for the sufficient reason that such an animal does not exist." As to India and Burmah Mr. Sanderson's authority is supreme and conclusive; but the testimony of another correspondent of the Times asserts the existence of at least biscuit-coloured elephants in Droungaria, a remote region of Chinese Tartary. He goes on to describe a beast which had "light blue eyes, in conjunction with a sandy colour of the hairs of the body and a somewhat lighter-coloured skin than ordinary." This may have been an albino like that which Mr. Bock figures. But albinos and pied elephants seem to be of no special value in India. Her Majesty the Empress is nowhere described as "Lady of the White Elephant," and Mr. Sanderson thinks that Mr. Barnum might have bought one with much more extensive blotches for about 150*l.* at Dacca, near Calcutta. Nevertheless, our own, and still more the American, public may flock to see an animal which is reported to be a "divinity" at home, just as they flocked to see a black man in Melbury Road because he had been a king in his own country, and as the Americans mob an English duke. Even on this point, however, there is controversy. Mr. Davis, Mr. Barnum's agent, "never came across an elephant so full of notions," and the same may be said of the people who have written letters about him. According to an anonymous correspondent of the Times, it is a complete mistake to suppose that a white elephant is ever worshipped. "White in Siam is an emblem of royalty." White elephants, moreover, are exceedingly rare. The writer finds fault with Mr. Bock in particular on the subject, but, though Mr. Bock describes the reception and "baptism" of a white elephant, he does not commit himself very distinctly to any assertion of his divinity. The arguments which draw a comparison between Buddhism and Romanism are a little unfortunate. Every one knows that the worship of idols is no part of Buddhistic religion, but it is equally true that many, if not most, Buddhists worship the supposed incarnations of their founder, whether in the form of the Grand Lama or of a white elephant. The Romanist religion may not inculcate idolatry, though some misguided people say it does, but nobody can deny that images are worshipped by thousands of Roman Catholics. It is easy to make a quibble about worship and veneration, but it remains a quibble after all. The same writer describes the ceremony of naming a new white elephant by putting its name on a piece of sugar-cane to be swallowed by the animal, and Mr. Bock gives us the exact inscription in one case which he witnessed. It was:—"Phra Sawet Sakoula Waraphat she ndom chat visute," and a good deal more, which reminds us that the King of Lilliput was named "Golbasto Momaren Evlame Gurdilo Shefin Mully Ully Gue."

CURIOSITIES OF SERMONOLOGY.

AMONG the many stories told to illustrate the canny reserve of —— as we are sorry to be obliged to call him—the retiring Bishop of Chester the following is not the least characteristic. A Dean whose theological opinions were matter of dispute had been preaching before him in the Cathedral, and the sermon was pronounced by some of the hearers to be "rather High" and by others to be "rather Low." The Bishop, on being asked for his own judgment, replied, "I thought it was rather long." That is no doubt a charge which may be preferred against many sermons both High and Low, but length after all is a relative term, and whether a sermon is too long depends a good deal on its intrinsic quality, and partly on the conditions of its delivery. It makes a difference, for instance, whether it comes at the end of a long service, or without any such accompaniment, and it makes a still greater difference whether the preacher is, say, Canon Liddon, or some raw country curate. It would however on the whole be a great relief to those who have to listen to them if the only or the worst fault chargeable on sermons was being too long or too short. A little book on Modern Preaching by Mr. Mahaffy, noticed a year or two ago in our columns, would alone serve to dispel so pleasant an illusion, nor could any greater immunity from faults of various kinds be reasonably claimed for the ancient than for the modern pulpit, though the prevalent faults are not, of course, exactly the same in every age. It was said of a certain Eton Fellow of a former generation, whose name we omit, though we are not aware that he has any surviving representatives,

> Didactic, dry, declamatory, dull,
> Big Bursar . . . . bellows like a bull.

Dulness, it must be admitted, like excessive length, which often goes with it, is a failing terribly common among preachers of every age, and a failing which is terribly hard to bear. Yet neither is dulness the worst of the ills which churchgoing flesh is heir to. It is possible to escape being dull by being not interesting but pretentious, and a preacher—or indeed speaker of any kind—who is pretentious is very apt to become absurd. He need not necessarily be a fool, in the sense of being simply unintelligent, though he is of course in one sense a fool, wherein his manner of speech bewrayeth him. This again is a sort of folly by no means peculiar to any one period or one country, but it has special manifestations at particular times and places, and occasionally in one country or another what may be called "the silly season" of preaching sets in with abnormal severity. Such a visitation appears to have come upon Spain about the middle of the last century, and it gave birth to a work by a contemporary Spanish Jesuit—one Father Francis Isla—which a writer in the Church Quarterly Review justly represents as a kind of clerical new version of Don Quixote; it was translated at the time into English under the title of the History of the Famous Preacher Friar Gerund de Campazas. We are afraid the good Fray Gerundio is not without his unconscious imitators among English preachers both in former days and in our own. But as it is always profitable "to see ourselves as others see us," such pulpit orators might with advantage study the idiosyncrasies of their Spanish prototype. And if they should be tempted to reply that their hearers applaud instead of hissing them, they may be reminded that Friar Gerund's manner of preaching also was not only prevalent but popular in Spain, and that few, if any, modern works have had a wider circulation in England than Mr. Tupper's Proverbial Philosophy and the late Dr. Cumming's voluminous Incubrations on the Apocalypse. Laudari a laudato viro is an excellent thing, but there is high authority for assuming that prophets may prophesy falsely—or foolishly—albeit the people love to have it so.

So fierce was the storm of frightened indignation provoked by the author of Fray Gerundio that not even the favour of that sternest and most uncompromising of all tribunals of censorship, the Spanish Inquisition, could protect him from its violence. Dominicans, Franciscans, and secular clergy, generally at feud with one another, combined to memorialize the King against a work which exposed the ministers of the Gospel and all religious Orders to vulgar contempt, and which they were assured could have no other result than "a relaxation, if not a subversion, of the national religion." Accordingly for the sake of peace the book was suppressed. But the very fierceness of these animis cœlestibus iræ proved that it had done its work, at least as far as ignominious exposure was concerned. The cap fitted "the scraitened forehead" on which it had been fixed too well to be easily dropped, and many a popular Fray Gerundio must have felt that his glory was departed. The hero of the tale is of course a fictitious character, but the fiction was only too closely based on fact. His birthplace is described with much solemn elaboration of detail; and there is a very wonderful "Dedication," in what the profane would call dog-Latin—and of a kind where the dogginess is much more conspicuous than the Latinity—the supposed author of which is made to observe with unconscious irony that "neither Cicero, nor Quintilian, nor Titus Livius, nor Sallust, ever made such a thing, or were ever capable of making it." It is quite indeed in the style of the fourth-form boy who translated "the milky way" by milca iter. But of all this, and a good deal more in the first volume of this history, Fray Gerundio might observe, like Tristram Shandy, "I forgot all this time I am not yet born." He is born however in the course of the volume, and christened Gerundio, in memory of the circumstance that his father had in his schoolboy days once, and once only, risen in his class, by his successful handling of a gerund. This father was a farmer, and much given to showing hospitality, especially to the clergy, and thus his house came to be frequented by "those of the begging and messenger kind, the Sabatine [or Saturday] preachers, and those who went about to preach in the neighbouring market towns in Lent and Advent." These good men had an unfortunate habit of rehearsing their discourses in the parlour of the farmhouse, and the boy Gerund—who proved only too truly to be father to the man—was fond of listening and then of imitating them. Their style of preaching, to judge from the citations given, appears to have been neither edifying nor intelligent, though it aimed, with doubtful success, at being sensational, and succeeded, if the author may be credited, in becoming extremely popular. The following extract from a sermon for All Souls' Day, which respect for sacred names compels us to curtail, may be taken as a specimen:—

> Fire! fire! fire! The house is on fire! Domus mea domus orationis vocabitur. Now, sexton, touch the loud-sounding bells. In cymbalis bene sonantibus. Do it so; for to toll for the dead and to toll for fire is the same thing, as the judicious Picinelus remarks: Lazarus amicus noster dormit. Water, sirs, water! for the world is burning: quis dabit capiti meo aquam? the interlineal, qui erant in hoc mundo; Pagninus, et inundus eum non cognovit. But what do I see? Alas! Christians. The souls of the faithful are in flames! Fidelium animæ! and the voracious element feeds on flowing pitch. Requieruut in pace, id est, in pice, as Vatablus explains it.

If the leisure hours of Gerundio's boyhood were enlightened with discourses of this type, his direct education at school was hardly more felicitous. His first master was possessed with a conviction that capitals or small letters should be used according to the greatness or otherwise of the "conception" indicated. Hence e.g. a "Leg of Beef" must have a large letter, and "a leg of a lark" a small one; "Mountain" and "mouse" were to be similarly distinguished; and whereas "it is plain from Scripture that zacchæus was a little tiny fellow, almost a dwarf," while Zabulon and Zerobabel were "giants," their respective names must be spelt accordingly. Gerundio's next preceptor had notions equally queer, though the queerness was of a more recondite and perplexing kind, and appears to have been chiefly derived from the current preaching of the day. At last the boy, who had been a scapegrace at school, is persuaded to enter a religious noviciate by the promise of a merry life—for the monastic discipline of the period in Spain was in a somewhat relaxed condition, to put it mildly—and in spite of his persistent neglect of study, for which "he had imbibed the utmost horror," he eventually blossomed into a preacher. His great instructor in the homiletic art was "Father Predicador Mayor," himself a notable pulpit luminary, of whose four rules for the composition of sermons we can only here find room for the two last. "Let the title or subject of the Sermon be always something jocular, or sonorous, or professional, or theatrical, or quibbling"; and, lastly, "Let thy style be always pompous, swollen, bristling with Greek or Latin, altisonant, and with as graceful a cadence as possible." It was also a principle of Father Predicador Mayor's "never to cite the holy Fathers, or even the Evangelists, by their proper names," which he considered vulgar. Thus St. Matthew was the Historian Angel; St. Mark, the Evangelic Bull; St. Luke, the most Divine Brush; St. John, the Eagle of Patmos; St. Jerome, the Purple of Belen; St. Ambrose, the Honeycomb of Doctors; and St. Gregory, the Allegorical Tiara. There is nothing new under the sun, and Father Mayor's idea of the vulgarity of citing proper names may be illustrated by a story told in the Life of Charles Simeon. A young disciple of his at Cambridge had brought his first sermon to read to the great master before delivering it. It was on the murmuring of the Israelites in the wilderness, and after some rather pompous platitudes proceeded, "In the midst of all this tumult, the son of Amram stood unmoved." "The who, Sir?" interrupted Simeon. "Why, Sir," replied his pupil somewhat abashed, "I meant Moses." "Then, Sir," thundered his preceptor, "why can't you say Moses?" Poor Fray Gerundio was blessed with no equally discreet Mentor, and we cannot wonder that the scholar of Father Predicador Mayor should have done ample justice, in the sermon for St. Anne's Day quoted by his biographer, to the instruction he had received: considerations no less of reverence than of space again oblige us to cut short the extract in the middle.

> Ann, as we all know, was the mother of our Lady, and grave authors affirm that she carried her in her womb twenty months, "Hic mensis sextus est illi"; and others add that she wept. "Plorans ploravit in nocten"; whence I infer that Mary was a Zahori, "Et gratia ejus in me warna non fuit." But let the orator attend to argument. S. Ann was the mother of Mary, but Mary was the mother of Christ: therefore S. Anna is the grandmother of the most Holy Trinity. "Et Trinitatem in unitate veneremur." On this account is she celebrated in this her house, "Hæc requies mea in sæculum sæculi." And what can be given thee, O Ann, in retribution for thy compendious benefits? "Quid retribuam Domino?" What parallels can express my words in the speaking thy praises? "Laudo vos? In hoc non laudo." Thou art that mysterious net in whose opaque meshes remain captivated the silly fishes. "Sagenæ missæ in mari." Thou are that stone of the desert which the lover of Rachel erected in the Damascan field to give water to his flock. "Mulier, da mihi aq nam."

Gerundio, as we are informed, persevered in this style of preaching to the last, in spite of all remonstrance, which was the less surprising, as his audience were lost in admiration of what they deemed "a most valiant performance"—on much the same principle, no doubt, which leads congregations nearer home to find in "the blessed word Mesopotamia" so deep a source of consolation. English preachers, however flowery or pedantic, do not usually interlard their discourses with scraps of irrelevant Latin, but there lives graven on our memory the record of a very young preacher many years ago at a parish church in Oxford, who had been entertaining an exclusively poor congregation on a week-day evening with a highly-coloured picture of early Church history, drawn from a strictly orthodox and Catholic standpoint, and had told them inter alia how "the blessed Athanasius rose as a burning light above the arid waste of Arian misbelief," with much more to the same effect, in a tongue not readily to be "understanded of the people" who sat under his pulpit. An old woman however was heard rapturously exclaiming to her crony on the steps of the church as they came out, "Ah, but that was a heavenly-minded young man, to be sure." We commend the example, together with Fray Gerundio's, to all popular preachers of our own day, Anglican or other, with a respectful exhortation not to do likewise. It has been justly observed that "nowhere are the arts of eloquence so necessary and so telling as with the vulgar crowd," and that precisely because "they want and understand only simple words and plain speaking." Preachers like Fray Gerundio were by no means wrong in making a study of their art, but they were fundamentally mistaken in imagining that the perfection of art is to be unnatural. The object of rhetoric, sacred or secular, as Aristotle long ago pointed out, is persuasion, and for purposes of persuasion to avoid artificiality, mannerism, and extravagance, is a first condition of success. Ars est celare artem; in the pulpit, as on the platform, that eloquence is alone effective which at least can simulate simplicity.

IMPRESSIONISME.

THE opening of the exhibition of M. Manet's works at the Ecole des Beaux Arts has, as might have been expected, given rise to a great deal of angry discussion, and heaped fresh fuel on the embers of the controversy concerning the "peintres intransigeants." Every journalist in Paris has declared himself with more or less vehemence for or against M. Manet and his school, and although we know full well that "there is a curse on whoso telleth of things in Aklis," we will add that in a certain measure M. Manet's posthumous exhibition has been potent to stir up dissension in the "Institut" itself. In the meantime there has been little or no thoughtful criticism on the subject, neither has there been any lack of the usual hideous jargon employed in such cases by professional art critics of the baser sort. Technical terms torn quivering from their true signification have been flung relentlessly upon the columns of the newspapers, while musical phraseology has been so unsparingly drawn upon, that it would not astonish us were we to light upon an article describing "une magnifique ébauche en cadmium dièse" or "un panneau décoratif en bitume bémol." In the meanwhile the word "impressionisme" has enjoyed a season of comparative rest. It has, indeed, been played out long since, and moreover has never recovered from the blow it received when the "impressionistes" themselves resolved upon discarding it. But, although it is to all intents and purposes dead as far as Paris is concerned, it has been resuscitated in London, where the average journalist employs it with an impressive recklessness calculated to make his French confrères wail over their lost opportunities. This being the case, it has seemed to us that it might prove interesting to some of our readers were we to glance at the history of the word and attempt to make the sense in which it has been used in the country in which it originated tolerably clear. To do this it will be necessary to briefly consider the development of modern art and art criticism in France.

Without going back as far as David, who may, broadly speaking, be termed the father of French art as it at present exists, we may take the romantic movement as our starting-point. Ingres and Delacroix were in their widely different ways preaching the doctrine of truthfulness to nature. Landscape can hardly be said to have existed as an art, and the study of atmospheric effect in painting figures out of doors was unknown. This came later, when Millet began to apply the knowledge he had acquired from patient study of the works of Poussin and of the great Italians, and got his pictures persistently refused at the Salon as his reward. M. Jules Dupré was coming into notice, and his pictures, which seem to us to-day to be heavy, and wanting in sincerity of effect, were held to be insolently natural. But it was from England that the influence came that was destined to give lasting vitality to the modern school of French landscape. It ought to furnish matter for lasting pride to all Englishmen who have any care for pure art to remember that the originators of the movement which produced such men as Rousseau, Daubigny, and Corot were Crome and Constable. We come now to Courbet, whose early work—infinitely painstaking and full of minute detail, somewhat heavy in colour, and characterized by a vigorous insistence of line—gave hardly any hint of the direction his talent was to take at a later period. As far as we have been able to discover, it was when he exchanged his first manner of painting for the looser method with which his name is commonly associated that the term "impressionisme" first came into use. As late as 1868 Théophile Gautier, referring to Courbet and his followers, still speaks of "l'école réaliste." From the moment that this baneful word saw the light it became a party cry—a purpose for which it was eminently suited, as it might be made to mean almost anything. To convey some notion of the manner in which it can be used in its best sense, we cannot do better than attempt a description of a well-known picture of Courbet's to which it has often been applied, both by admirers and detractors. This picture represents a forest scene in the snow. A few dead leaves stirred into tremulous motion by a passing breath of wind hang on the trees—two startled deer raise their heads and gaze out of the background. It is a momentary aspect of nature taken in and judged by an exquisitely sensitive and highly-trained eye and transferred to canvas by a masterly hand. If this be "impressionisme," we can only say that it is evident that every great artist who ever lived has been an "impressioniste."

Considered in this sense, we have sometimes fancied that the term may satisfy one of the most curious of the "bourgeois'" secret wants. Persons who possess no real feeling for or knowledge of art experience a vague dissatisfaction before any work which contains hidden knowledge; they feel in some indefinite way that they are "being done" and not getting their money's worth out of the show. This dissatisfaction finds an easy outlet nowadays through a solemn shake of the head and a remark to the effect that "This is a sad manifestation of 'impressionisme.'" Should our surmise be correct, and we believe it to be so, it follows that there are at this moment, "de par le monde," many people who would, if they dared to speak sincerely, declare the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel to be the work of an "impressioniste." Of course we leave out of our calculation such marvellous incarnations of the spirit of the "éternel bourgeois" as the person who declared that Michael Angelo's figures were produced by his "following the cracks in the plaster." The word may also be used for another purpose of a somewhat similar nature—that of defining the "bourgeois" mental attitude regarding what he fondly calls "finish." We cannot illustrate this better than by referring to Baudelaire's notice of the Salon of 1845, in which he says:—"Tous les demi-savants . . . . s'accordent en ceci; que définitivement M. Corot ne sait pas peindre. Braves gens! qui ignorent d'abord qu'une œuvre de génie . . . . est toujours très-bien exécutée quand elle l'est suffisamment . . . . qu'en général ce qui est fait n'est pas fini, et qu'une chose très-finie peut n'être pas faite du tout." The "demi-savant" or the wholly ignorant man of to-day merely says of such work that it is "impressionist," and refuses to waste any further words on it. There has also been a short period during which this wondrously elastic term was used to specify any painting done with the palette knife. It is only in the last three or four years that we find any really definite meaning attached to "impressionisme." M. Degas and M. Pissarro came to be described as "impressionistes," and it is with the sense that this use of the word implies that it has since been employed in Paris. We may remind our readers in passing that M. Degas has devoted the greater part of his life to attempting to render the effects produced by complicated masses of form and colour in violent movement before the brain has had time to fully analyse the nature of the disturbance set up in the eye of the spectator. M. Degas, who, unlike his followers, has a great knowledge of art and very considerable technical skill at his command, has sometimes been startlingly successful. Not so M. Pissarro, whose landscapes might be fairly well imitated by any amateur who should strive to paint the country he was travelling through in an express train. But still he is substantially at one with M. Degas in his theory of art, and the use of the term "impressionisme" seems to us to be perfectly legitimate as applied to these artists and their disciples. But it is impossible to attach any signification whatsoever to it as it is used in England, where indeed it appears to be generally employed by gentlemen who are hard up for an abusive epithet, and who moreover are profoundly ignorant of the works of the painters we have just mentioned. It is irresistibly amusing to find a critic gravely admonishing an artist whose works are so solidly constructed and so patiently wrought out as Mr. Boggs's to beware of the ways of Degas and Manet. It is equally entertaining to find painters who lay on their colour in thick masses accused of "impressionisme"—for as a matter of fact the "impressionistes" paint thinly. We have frequently found English critics speaking of any French work not belonging to the classical school as "impressionistic," and if we are not mistaken we have more than once seen M. Bastien Lepage, one of the most laboriously minute and careful artists living, spoken of as an "impressionist." This peculiar manifestation of human perversity is probably the result of a theory, apparently held by many people, that all shadows are brown, or should, at any rate, be represented as being so in pictures; and when they find a work of art in which the shadows are of another colour, they do not hesitate to declare that "some impressionist hath done this." If such catchwords are to be used at all in criticism which purports to be serious, it is high time that those who think fit to employ them should endeavour to ascertain their meaning. But we may add that, in our opinion, the sooner all such ready-made clap-trap expressions are abolished the better it will be both for artists and critics.

We have hitherto forborne to mention the name of M. Manet, having come to the conclusion that he was far from having been a leader in the school of which he was formerly accredited with being the chief. The exhibition of his works has conclusively proved that this so-called "chef d'école" spent his life in copying the characteristics of other men—of men in many cases who were commonly spoken of as his pupils. In his earliest works he appears wholly given over to the influence of Courbet—an influence from which he was slow to free himself. To this period of his development belong "Le buveur d'absinthe," "Le déjeuner sur l'herbe," and a few other pictures of a kindred nature. Soon afterwards he fell under the influence of Goya, whom he imitated with a fair amount of success; but his native want of originality, even in his manner of adapting the thoughts of other men, is still painfully apparent. One of his best and most complete works, "L'homme mort," is a direct inspiration from Velasquez, and whichever of his pictures one turns to, one is sure to feel the influence of some other artist. "Olympia" and "Le fifre" are perhaps his nearest approaches to original conception and treatment, and in both we may add that there is complete absence of "impressionisme," and of any subversive intention. "Olympia" is in some ways a very admirable study of the nude—somewhat incomplete, as all M. Manet's work was. "Le fifre" is a bright, vigorously-handled picture, but strikingly deficient in atmosphere. Let it be noted that all the figure pictures he painted at this time—from 1863 to 1865—were strictly conventional in arrangement. "Le combat du Kearsage et de l'Alabama" is a very powerful sea-piece, only differing from the common run of marine pictures in as far as it is superior to them. In the latter years of his life he manifestly yielded himself to following the tendencies of Claude Monet and Renoir. His most characteristic quality was a great sensitiveness to the more delicate colours in nature; his greatest defect was a certain nervous irritability of temperament which prevented him from carrying out any work which he undertook to the end. In spite of the violent wrangling which has taken place over his grave, he will fare as other men; his best work will be remembered, and the rest forgotten.

THE SALE OF POISONS.

IT is high time that some steps should be taken to amend the present state of the law on poisons. Many of us have been long under the happy delusion that the Act of 1868 was quite sufficient for the purpose of protecting the public. But, owing to defects in its wording, it is easily and systematically evaded, and a recent decision of the House of Lords has practically abrogated one of its principal provisions. Not only are poisons openly sold by unqualified people, but so are drugs of other kinds so inferior in quality as either to be useless or else actually deleterious. Nearly all drugs are more or less poisonous at best, but bad drugs are doubly so; and it is difficult even by legislation to protect people who are not learned in their properties. They are absolutely at the mercy of the vendors, who may call any substance by the name of a medicine, and the buyer has no means of ascertaining the truth or falsehood of the description. This view is borne out by many recent examples, and is put forward prominently by some of the most eminent members of the Pharmaceutical Society. In a recent address Mr. Attfield, the President, called public attention to it, and asserted that the present condition of things is worse than before the Act of 1868. The Act prohibited any one from taking the title of "chemist and druggist," and practising under it, without having qualified at an examination, and being placed on the State Register. But by some oversight no provision was made for the case of drug-sellers who did not take the title of "chemist," and the result is that a grocer may keep medicines, and sell them as if they were food or chandlery. Nay more; though the adulteration of food is forbidden, and the buyer is able to judge for himself, with drugs he cannot judge, and the State does practically nothing for his protection. True, the State forbids the sale of ostensible poisons, or rather draws a line between some poisons and others; but even this provision is easily evaded. Under cover of a patent-medicine stamp such poisons as opium, laudanum, and morphia are constantly sold by grocers or general dealers. Soothing syrups alone, which may be bought everywhere, are accountable for a vast number of deaths, and bring up infant mortality, especially in London, to its present appalling figure. It is asserted that in some districts in which opium is largely sold it is put up in regular packets, labelled "Sedative Powder," or some such name, sealed with a 1½d. stamp, and sold by any one who holds a patent medicine license. The respectable chemists refuse, as they are bound to do, to sell deadly poisons in dangerous quantities to any stray customer; but it is notorious that in other places—wherever, in short, an unauthorized chemist carries on his trade—the merest formality, such as signing a name, suffices, and the poison is sold, no questions being asked. This is, of course, the strong point in the complaints recently made by the pharmaceutists. It remains to be seen how far they are justified in their protests; but, admitting that the will of the nation was revealed in the Act of 1868, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that something more must now be done to give it effect.

Oddly enough, the whole question is complicated by another, with which at first sight no one would think it had any connexion whatever. We hear enough about the enormities of Co-operative Stores from tradesmen whose former profits are now cut down; and for the most part we turn a deaf ear to their complaints. The Stores are a convenience; and if the small tradesman is unsuited to the spirit of the times, he must go, as other people have had to go in the course of ages. But when the chemists complain of the Stores, their case is wholly different. Their complaint may be in part selfish, like that of the grocers, but it is also in part, and that the larger part, for the public good. Co-operative Stores have peculiar advantages in the sale of drugs. If they are managed by seven owners or more, they are absolutely in this particular beyond the reach of the Act. According to the recent decisions, a Co-operative Store may even sell poisons "if no registered assistant is employed," thus simply reversing the obvious meaning and intention, though not, of course, the letter, of the Act. But even as regards single shopkeepers it is inoperative. Professor Attfield gives particulars of many cases, described by his correspondents, in which most drugs are openly sold, and a few in which "not only ordinary poisons, but the scheduled poisons," are also to be had, but under certain bonds of secrecy. The druggist who has studied and has passed his examinations has no chance with the unqualified grocer or the storekeepers. They can both undersell him and make capital by pointing out what an extortioner he is. We have knowledge of a certain virulent and deadly poison which can be bought wholesale at about 4*d.* the pound, but which a chemist retails at about 4*s.* the ounce, and rightly so. But the unqualified druggist sells it at a moderate price, if he sells it at all, and perhaps binds his customer to secrecy as well, thus involving him in a conspiracy to break the law. A single grain of that particular poison has frequently produced death, yet in many different households enough may be met with to poison a regiment. There is a law regarding another poison which seems to be very seldom observed. Sulphuric acid is one of the most easily obtained, and one of the most destructive agencies known of its kind. Hardly a day passes but we read some case of "vitriol throwing." Vitriol being practically colourless may easily escape notice until too late. The public are partially protected against arsenic by its being, when sold in small quantities, coloured with indigo. The rule is frequently evaded, but it should be enforced and applied to sulphuric acid also. Mr. Attfield, in his speech at Southport, was necessarily more immediately concerned with the honour and the standing of his professional brethren than with the convenience or safety of the public; yet it is remarkable how completely the two were shown to be interdependent; and no one can doubt that a lowering in the standing and character of the dispensers of drugs must result, not only in loss to the qualified chemist, but in still more disastrous consequences to the consumer.

The quantity of medicine now prescribed and used is very much less than formerly. In 1830, for example, at St. George's Hospital the cost for every in-patient's medicine was 16*s.* 5*d.* In 1880 it was less than half. Partly this is owing, no doubt, to a cheapening in druggists' wares; but it is also due to the alteration in medical practice. Leeches, for instance, which used to be so frequent, are now seldom seen. Blisters are characterized by some eminent physicians as mere useless torture. Instead of a costly black draught, we have a few pence worth of some pleasant effervescing mixture. The whole aspect of medicine-taking has been altered. Ten years ago, even, a new-born baby received a dose calculated to injure it for life; and twenty years ago all children had medicine once a week, whether they wanted it or not. Mrs. Squeers with her brimstone-and-treacle was no exaggeration. Such scenes as Dickens describes in Nicholas Nickleby were common not only in such places as Dotheboys Hall, but in every large boarding-school, when many of us were almost grown up. At the present day, therefore, the apothecary cannot expect the same sale for his simples as formerly; but the public is not on that account the less justified in demanding greater security and greater excellence. The Patent medicine system is liable to all kinds of abuses, and should be abandoned. It brings in a trumpery sum, and is a legalisation of quackery. The very name of "Patent Medicine" is a lie. We have by the abortive Act of 1868 acknowledged that something should be done. The principle is admitted. Of course before 1868 it was open to any one to object that it is "grandmotherly legislation" to interfere with the sale of drugs. But no such argument will hold now, except perhaps with such old ladies and their friends as supported Mr. Stansfeld on a recent occasion. The right of the free-born Briton to make a beast of himself with drink is seriously called in question; but before proceeding to limit the sale of such a comparatively innocuous compound as beer or gin we should endeavour to protect ourselves both from adulterated drugs and also from poisons. Every daily paper contains stories of poisoning. Three have appeared this very week, each of which could have been prevented by proper regulations. A prisoner is poisoned in the very hands of the police. A child is poisoned by a quack. A husband obliterates features he once professed to admire by the use of a little sulphuric acid. The list might be indefinitely prolonged. Where did all these people obtain their poisons? It would be well worth the while of the Pharmaceutical Society to make a list of such cases for say three months, and to ascertain in each case if possible where the poison was bought. If it should be found that all or a majority came from stores, grocers, and other unauthorized dealers in drugs, the case put by Mr. Attfield would be immensely strengthened. It is perfectly true that legislation can hardly be evoked at the present day—in the "so-called Nineteenth Century," as it has recently been described—for the prolongation or strengthening of a monopoly; but, if the chemists can show that it is owing to the unauthorized sales of drugs and poisons that these shocking tragedies, so far from being less common than before 1868, are actually more common and on the increase, they may come to Parliament with a very good case; and when some of the much less important measures to which the present Government has pledged itself to please its Radical supporters have been disposed of, a Bill in extension, explanation, or confirmation of that of 1868 may be passed, and English people may be protected like Frenchmen, Germans, Italians—indeed almost all nations—against the occurrence of such horrors as we have mentioned.

ANGLO-FRENCH AND FRANCO-ENGLISH.

IN the always delightful book wherein are recorded the sayings and doings of The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table, a book designed to inculcate the wholesome doctrine that every man should be his own Boswell, the spirit of the sturdy Dr. Samuel Johnson, speaking through the circulating medium of Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, declares that "to trifle with the vocabulary which is the vehicle of social intercourse is to tamper with the currency of human intelligence," and the orotund presence adds the sentiment that in his opinion "he who would violate the sanctities of his mother-tongue would invade the recesses of the paternal till without remorse and repeat the banquet of Saturn without indigestion." From the context we learn that the spirit of the great lexicographer was perturbed by certain trifling puns or verbal witticisms with which the breakfast-table had been amused; but his ponderous criticism has always seemed to us to be quite as applicable to the ill-advised persons, or speakers, or writers who find the English language inadequate to the full expression of their recurring thoughts, and who are, therefore, forced to employ words and phrases from various foreign tongues. The habit of dropping into French unawares is as enfeebling as the habit of punning; and the one is quite as fairly to be considered a violation of the sanctities of the mother-tongue as the other. Either habit indicates a certain flabbiness of fibre, both moral and intellectual. It is difficult to believe either in the moral rectitude or in the mental strength of a man or a woman addicted to the quoting of odd scraps of odd French. When we take up the latest work of a young lady novelist, and find scattered through her pages soubriquet and double entendre and à l'outrance and artiste, and other choice specimens of the French which is spoken by those who do not speak French, we need read no further to know that the mantle of George Eliot and Jane Austen has not fallen on the fair authoress's shoulders. Even Mrs. Oliphant, a novelist who is old enough to know better and who has delighted us all with charming tales of truly English life, is wont to sprinkle French freely through her many volumes, not only in her novels, but even in her unnecessary Life of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, whom she rashly credited with gaieté du cœur (sic).

Of course it cannot be denied that certain French words and not merely those which came over with the Conqueror, have fairly won a right of domicile in England. Ennui, for example, and pique—these have no exact English equivalents, and their removal from common speech would leave an aching void. But why should a ballet-dancer be called a danseuse? And why should a singer be forced to sing a chansonnette when she might just as well have sung a little song? And why, oh! why should one of the best hotels in London call its luxurious dining-room a salle à manger? And why should that useful modern improvement known in America as an elevator and in England as a lift be denominated in this hotel an ascenseur? In like manner a new portable chemical fire-extinguisher for use in private houses and in hotels is called an extincteur. What evil spirit possesses Mrs. Tompkins, the milliner, and Miss Simkins, the dressmaker, to emblazon their golden signs with the mystic "Mdme. Tompkins, Modes," and "Mdlle. Simkins, Robes"? And here occasion serves to protest, with whatever strength may in us lie, against the superfluous d which British custom has injected into the French contractions for Madame and Mademoiselle. We say British, for this error is confined to Great Britain and her colonial dependencies, the inhabitants of the United States of America having happily escaped it. In America as in France Madame and Mademoiselle are contracted to Mme. and Mlle., and it is only the Briton who writes Mdme. and Mdlle., in the fond belief that he has caught the exact Parisian touch. It may be as well to note that the French phrase is à outrance, that there is no u in sobriquet, and that the French know no such expression as double entendre, the nearest approach to it being double entente, a double meaning, which is, however, wholly devoid of the ulterior significance attached to double entendre. Perhaps the word most sinned against is artiste. There is really no excuse whatever for the use of this word in English speech. It is the exact translation and complete equivalent of the English word artist, and it does not mean a female artist any more than pianiste means a female pianist. We can now recall with a shudder a programme thrust into our hands at a watering-place two or three years ago, in which a certain charming artist was announced as "the greatest living lady pianiste in the world." But perhaps this is not more painful than a sign still to be seen in a little street between Regent Street and Bond Street, and which declares that the house to which it is affixed is occupied by "Blank et Cie., Artistes in Corsets." This, in the language of the wild Western humorist after he had been to Paris, "frappe tout chose parfaitement froid!"

It was in the window of a shop in Regent Street towards the end of last season that we saw exposed for sale a handsome china tea-service in a handsome silk-lined box, bearing in its cover two little placards, that to the right declaring that it was suitable for "a wedding present," while that on the left suggested its fitness as "un present de noces." It was at the opening of the last Royal Academy that a youth of tender years and artistic yearnings confided to the more mature lady with whom he was talking that he did not greatly care for genre pictures! It was over the door of some sort of a free-and-easy or low concert saloon in New York that we once saw a transparency setting forth that the abode of bliss within was a "Resorte Musicale." And it was in an American theatrical journal that we once saw an advertisement of two music-hall artists, man and wife, who desired an engagement. From the advertisement it was evident that in their previous condition of single blessedness the lady had been more successful and had become the more widely known. Wherefore the husband, instead of bestowing his name on his wife, borrowed hers, and announced himself as "Mr. John Black nee John White." But the ways of theatrical people are inscrutable; who can tell what a Lion Comique may be? In ordinary life a man who makes costumes is a costumer, and a man who makes wigs is a wigmaker; but in the theatre and on the programmes of the theatres the man who makes theatrical costumes is a costumier, and the man who makes theatrical wigs is a perruquier. In the same manner a lady who plays tragedy or who has tragic gifts is a tragédienne, and a lady who plays comedy or who has comic gifts is a comédienne—and both the one and the other is a great artiste who has thoroughly mastered her rôle. Encore, although used in English in a sense wholly different from that which it has in French, is now acclimatized beyond uprooting, and so is a hybrid word parquette used in America to indicate the stalls or orchestra chairs, just as there is also used in America to indicate a railway terminus the word dépôt, with a hybrid pronunciation as though it were written dee-po. But then there are no costumiers or perruquiers on American playbills. Probably the only French word of all the many used freely and needlessly by dramatic critics, and by all writers about the theatre, which has any justification for its continued career on this side of the Channel is dénouement. It happens that there is no exact synonym for dénouement in its technical sense. The end, the climax, the culmination, the surprise, the discovery, are all slightly different in meaning from that ingenious loosening of the knot of intrigue which the word dénouement implies. In fact, permission to use dénouement as though it were an English word would be received by all dramatic critics as a felt want filled.

It would not be fair thus to rebuke our fellow-countrymen without noting the fact that the French are nowadays quite as prone to quote English as the English are to quote French, and also that there is very little to choose between the results. An article on sport in a French paper is almost as curious and macaronic a medley as an article on the fashions in an English paper. Just as the technical phrases which hint at the mighty mysteries of ladies' apparel are all French, so the technical phrases of masculine outdoor amusement are nearly all English. The report of a horse-race as it appears in a Parisian newspaper is quite as comic as the description of a bride's gowns as it appears in a London organ of society. The French dandy, who was once a gandin, and who is now a gommeux, is driven to the course in a break drawn by a pair of steppers; on the track he mingles with the betting-men and makes a book. Thus he accomplishes his duty to society, and is acknowledged to be tout ce qu'il y a de plus hig-lif. We are informed and believe that this strange perversion of high life is pronounced as it is written, "hig-lif." When the French swell is not mingling with the other sportmen on the turf, he has perhaps gone to the river to see the rowingmen, or into some garden to watch the jeunes misses playing crockett, by which last word the French are wont to designate the formerly popular game of croquet. In the summer, or rather in the early autumn, he varies these amusements by a paper-chase of some unknown variety which he complacently calls a rallye-papier. To see just how far can go this absurd commingling of tongues, complicated by preternaturally ingenious blundering, one must give his days and nights to the reading of the Carnet d'un Mondain, which the Figaro publishes under the signature of Etincelle. To see how even clever and well-informed writers may err in bad company, one must read the always interesting and often instructive chroniques which M. Jules Claretie contributes every week to the Temps, and which are gathered together every year under the title of La Vie à Paris. M. Claretie reads English, and he has travelled in England; but he makes repeated use of a hybrid verb—interviewer—which we assume to be some sort of a Gallicized interview. Interviewer is the act accomplished by the reporter—another word which the French have snatched across the Channel. But interviewer, bad as it is, and absurd as it is, is not a whit worse or more absurd than double entendre and soubriquet. In fact, the better one knows the popular misinformation on both sides of the Channel, the more willingly will one admit that honours are easy, and that English bad French is no better and no worse than French bad English.

There is an ancient and musty merry jest about a City madam who spoke only the French habitually used in young ladies' schools, and who rendered into English the familiar ris de veau à la financière as "a smile of the little cow in the manner of the female financier." But this is not more startling than many other things to be discovered by those who search the cook-books diligently. We remember a bill of fare in a far Western hotel in the United States in which all the familiar dishes were translated into unfamiliar French, the climax being reached when gingersnaps, the sole dessert, appeared transmogrified as gateux de gingembre. Perhaps it is in revenge for repeated insults like this that the Parisians now advertise on the windows of the cafés on the boulevards that Boissons Américaines are sold within, the only American drink particularized being a certain "Shery Gobbler," warranted to warm the heart of all vagrant American humorists who may chance to visit Paris while alive and in the flesh. In essence shery gobbler is but little more comic than rosbif, or than biftek, which are recognized French forms of the roast beef of old England and of the beefsteak which plays second to it. Both rosbif and biftek are accepted by Littré, who finds for the latter a sponsor as early and as eminent as Voltaire. And shery gobbler is not as comic as "cutlete" and "tartlete," which we detected day after day on the bill of fare of a Cunard steamer crossing from Liverpool to New York a few months ago. When we drew the attention of a fellow-traveller to the constant recurrence of the superfluous e at the end of cutlet and tartlet, the active and intelligent steward, who anticipated our slightest wants, leant forward with a benignant smile, and benevolently explained the mystery. "It's the French, sir," he said; "cutlete and tartlete is French, sir!"

Of the many amusing stories in circulation and turning on an English misuse of French, the most popular is perhaps the anecdote in which one of two gentlemen occupying an apartment in Paris leaves word with the concierge that he does not wish his fire to go out; as he unfortunately expresses this desire in the phrase "ne laissez pas sortir le feu," much inconvenience results to the other gentleman, who is detained in the apartment as a dangerous lunatic. This pleasant tale has in its time been fathered on many famous Englishmen. And like unto it is another which Americans are wont to place to the credit of a cockney, while the English are sure that its true hero was a Yankee—both parties acting on the old principle of "putting the Frenchman up the chimney when they tell the story in England." The story goes that a certain Anglo-Saxon—for thus we may avoid international complications—entered into a Parisian restaurant with intent to eat, drink, and be merry. Wishing to inform the waiter of his hunger he said, "J'ai une femme!" to which the polite but astonished waiter naturally responded, "J'espère que madame se porte bien?" Whereupon the Anglo-Saxon makes a second attempt at the French for hunger, and asserts, "Je suis fameux!" to which the waiter's obvious reply is, "Je suis bien aise de le savoir, monsieur!" Then the Anglo-Saxon girded up his loins and made a final effort, and declared, "Je suis femme!" to which the waiter could answer only, "Alors madame s'habille d'une façon très-étrange." After which the Anglo-Saxon fled, and was seen no more.

THE NEW CENTRE OF GRAVITY.

As our political system becomes daily more democratic in its character we find daily more reason to deplore the increasing licence and decreasing wisdom of the public utterances of politicians. The quantity of extra-Parliamentary speech is ever growing, the quality is ever on the decline. To such an extent is this the case that it is thought to be actually imperilling, by the force of reflected discredit, our Parliamentary system of government by party. This is of itself the most critical possible indication of the magnitude of the evil. If there be any good at all in party government, it must consist in the fact that the Opposition of the day possesses within itself the cohesion and the ability necessary to enable it at any moment and for all purposes to take the place of the Government of the day. It is this that neutralizes the effects of popular passion and makes it impossible for sudden shiftings of popular favour to put in power a disorganized set of politicians, inexperienced in the practical work of government. Yet such are nowadays the habits of politicians becoming that their very opportunities of succeeding to power are apt to be nothing so much an occasion for their own embarrassment and confusion. Ministers succeeding to office have many more difficulties to contend with than the mere sequelæ of their predecessors' policy. They have to face also their own utterances in opposition, and at all events to make a show of squaring them with their practice in office. This is the effect of a cacorthes not by any means peculiar to either side of the House. How few executive acts of any Government there are which cannot, if needful, be set in an unfavourable light; and how few are the speakers, to whatever Government opposed, who ever in these days resist the temptation to use those means of winning rhetorical success! A Government may be engaged in steering the ship of State through the shoals of newly-recurring complications in foreign policy. It may be loyally guiding itself by the fixed light of the traditional and only possible principles of British policy. Opposition speakers not the less incontinently commit themselves to new and impracticable developments of the received conception of England's duty in regard to her foreign relations. Hysterically preaching non-intervention, the concert of Europe, national self-denial, sympathy with oppressed nationalities, Opposition speakers find themselves constructing an entirely new, but also entirely impossible, philosophy of foreign relations. Or, again, a Government may be conscientiously doing what little can be done to prevent any serious relative increase in the net expenditure of the country. Opposition speakers not the less point reproachfully to increased apparent totals, repudiate all explanation, and recklessly commit themselves to implied, if not express, promise of reductions all round, not merely of apparent totals, but also of actual burdens. By the popular vote the spokesmen of the minority are suddenly converted into the Ministers of the majority; and the natural consequence ensues that the public interest suffers from a policy vitiated by the incurable propensity of Ministers to affect in their finance a parsimony, and in their foreign policy a disinterestedness, which, if unflinchingly practised, would result only in disaster.

But who is really to blame for all this? Members of Parliament themselves, we shall be told. They speak too much on platforms about the country. They say more than they mean; because they have to say something, and rarely have anything to say that they do mean except what has been earlier and better said by somebody else. Undoubtedly the excessive quantity of extra-Parliamentary speech is a link in the chain of causes. But who is to blame for that excessive quantity? How is it that the distinction which used to be won by rhetorical success in Parliament has now to be sought by rhetorical display upon the platform? If the vice is observed in both political parties, it is not unnatural to doubt whether the blame should rest entirely upon politicians themselves, and should not be also charged upon the common source whence all parties derive their power—the electorate itself. Does any man suppose that, outside a few specially interested demagogues, any member of Parliament, however distinguished or eloquent, ever went upon a platform during the recess without inwardly cursing the need for that unwelcome inroad upon the length of his holiday and upon the practice of the reserve which is so essential to political self-respect? He may curse the need, but he must mount the platform. Why? The local party organization is brisk and aggressive, and wants patting on the back. Or it is languishing, and has to be galvanized by the arts of the political medicine-man. The local complaint is that the local Big-Endians get scanty encouragement and countenance from Parliamentary leaders, while the abominable Little-Endians of the district seem to have no difficulty in getting M.P.'s down to speak. Refusal is unamiable. Compliance stimulates the appetite in other places; and the result of this political dram-drinking is that there is scarcely a country town, however insignificant, which does not consider that the activity of its Conservative Association or the zeal of its Liberal Five Hundred are fully worthy to be rewarded by a visit from Lord Salisbury or Sir Stafford Northcote, or from Lord Hartington or Mr. Chamberlain, of course "with a speech." Luminaries of the first magnitude cannot quite get to all the Associations and Five Hundreds, so the local managers must regretfully confine themselves to trying to beguile an Under-Secretary or ex-Under-Secretary of State, or may even have to content themselves with being "addressed" by the ordinary member of Parliament. The invitation there can be for him to say which he or others have not said before, and which will not embarrass his leaders' policy, arrives at the town which is preparing to "demonstrate." From the moment of his arrival he is urged on every side to pitch high the key of his denunciations, for that otherwise he will split the ears of no groundlings. The result one knows too well. Unfortunately the supposed peculiarity of the local appetite is by no means peculiar to it. Everywhere the political strong drink is demanded and absorbed in deep and exciting draughts, to the inevitable degradation both of purveyor and consumer. As with real intemperance so with political; it is the taste of the consumer that determines the strength and quality of the beverage. The playwright knows that he must write to please the public. They are the ultimate arbiters of his success; and in the same way it is the taste of the audiences that forms the manners of the platform. Theirs is the craving for fault-finding and strong language. Its gratification we have called political dram-drinking. By a certain school it is called the healthy increase of political activity in the minds of the People. But in either case it means that the plan of campaign is coming to be settled less and less by the leaders and more and more by the rank and file. The best that can be said of it is that it points to the increasing democratisation of our political life. Demos has found out that he need no longer remain a mere spectator of the show, but that himself can move the puppets on the stage. And he is by no means loth to make them dance to his liking. All this imports a changed position in the political centre of gravity, the seat of which is now, not the House of Commons, but the provincial platform. Demos gets thereby much increased amusement from his puppet-show, and naturally thinks it all a change for the better. A mutual understanding between parties might abate the evil. The pity is that there should be men of education and culture whose action makes such understanding impossible, and whose consciences permit them to tell Demos that he is right.

VICTORIAN.

Mr. JULIAN EDWARDS'S Victorian, the most recent addition to English opera, was produced at Covent Garden last Saturday, and received the applause of a genial audience. This reception can only be regarded as the measure of the current reaction in favour of national opera and the expression of the good nature which generally accompanies a first representation. Mr. Edwards's work does not possess the slightest pretensions to modernité; it belongs to a past school, and has something of the air and grace of an old-fashioned acquaintance: its smooth level of mediocrity ensures it from strenuous condemnation, for it presents no salient points to justify either praise or blame. Enthusiastic advocates of the establishment of a national opera house need not suffer their faith to waver because a young composer has preferred the well-beaten track to the more perilous adventure of a new departure. Many years must elapse before English dramatic music is substantially founded on such broad principles of art as are indicated in Mr. Mackenzie's Colomba. Emancipation from old traditions must be gradual, and we cannot all at once hope to see the disappearance of that insularity of treatment which once formed the truest claim of English opera to be considered national. The works of Arne and Shield and Kelly, in which our fathers delighted, were national enough to satisfy the most exacting patriot, and differed totally from any Continental form of opera; they thoroughly represented an age of fervid political life, when art suffered peculiarly through its detachment from foreign influence. We do not, of course, imply that Victorian is a study after an antiquated model, a mere resuscitation of the ballad-opera and the school of warblers; it fails, however, to satisfy the artistic instincts and aspirations of the time, it has not that vivifying dramatic spirit without which no opera can escape oblivion.

The libretto of Victorian is founded on Longfellow's Spanish Student. From a lyrical as well as a dramatic point of view the subject is excellent; the librettist has, however, produced but a commonplace book, inflated in language and loose in construction. He would have done better if he had more closely followed the action of his original, or had combined the fortunes of Preciosa with the loves of other characters from Cervantes, after the example of Middleton and Rowley in The Spanish Gipsy. There is little natural continuity of scenes as it is, the curtain falls fitfully and frequently, and upon ensembles of the tamest description. The finale of Act iii. is a curious instance of this, because it also exemplifies the inability of the composer to make the most of his dramatic opportunities. When the Count de Lara is stabbed in Preciosa's garden by the jealous Bartolomè and a band of men clothed in long cloaks enter and surround the body of the Count, a chorus of lamentation or vengeance is naturally expected; but the dusky band merely pose like conspirators in council, and the curtain falls. There are scenes suggested by Longfellow—e.g. the theatre where Preciosa is hooted by De Lara's followers—that would certainly not have been missed by an experienced artificer or have failed to inspire a musician. The music generally is deficient in colour and force, and is rarely characterized by dramatic vitality; the concerted pieces, which necessarily test the resources of the composer, are weak, and local colour is very slightly introduced. In the first act the well-known serenade, "Stars of the summer night," is agreeably set; but the and the loudness of the violins pizzicato. A long duet which ensues between Victorian and Preciosa wants passion, though it is melodious and pleasing. The best scene in the second act is where Bartolomè visits Preciosa and entreats the cold but fascinating girl to reinstate him in his old position as her lover. His passionate supplication was rendered with great feeling and expression by Mr. Sauvage, and received the only encore of the evening. In Act iii. an indifferent quintet, unnecessarily vociferous, precedes the duel between Victorian and the Count, and is followed by a pretty duet for Preciosa and Dolores. The familiar song, "Good Night, Beloved," which is the signal for Bartolomè's vengeance, is effectively set and skilfully harmonized. The last act contains the most striking number of the opera, the chorus "On the mountain-top I stand," bright and picturesque in character and happily instrumented. The revelation of Preciosa's birthright concludes the opera.

It is surprising, considering the subject he has treated, that Mr. Edwards has not made better use of Spanish dances and those popular songs that are so dance-like in rhythm. He seems to have been deterred rather than inspirited by the example of Weber and Bizet. The music of Victorian is singularly unrelieved by ornate melodies of complicated rhythm and quaintly varied time; the ballet, too, is undistinguished by any attempt at characterization such as the seguidilla in the first act of Carmen. In no direction could local colour be attained with more propriety than in this. The representation calls for little remark. Mme. Julia Gaylord, in spite of indisposition, sang with exquisite charm and refinement as Preciosa. Mr. James Sauvage fully sustained the impression he made in The Piper of Hamelin. Mr. Packard as Victorian, Miss Lucy Franklein (Hypolito), and Miss Devrient (Dolores) gave satisfactory renderings of their parts. The orchestra was under the conduct of the composer.

THE PRINCE'S THEATRE.

AT the corner of Coventry Street and Piccadilly East, standing on a plot of ground almost entirely isolated, Mr. Phipps has built for Mr. Edgar Bruce a new theatre, which is not only very pretty and convenient in position, but which combines most of the latest inventions by which buildings are made wholesome and safe. The site is excellent. The house is lighted by Swan incandescent lamps, and is therefore cool, while gas is laid on throughout the building in case of accident to the electric light. But perhaps the greatest, and certainly not the least welcome, curiosity, in the arrangement of the new theatre is the hydraulic iron curtain, which is to be let down once every evening to encourage the audience, and which completely saves the auditory from the stage—to such an extent, it is said, that if the latter were blazing, no smoke would reach the audience. The decorations of the theatre are bright and pretty, and the arrangements of the vestibule and staircases remarkably tasteful. The refreshment-room contains a circular kiosk instead of a bar, and out of the stalls' foyer there runs an underground grotto, which will be very attractive when the fountains are in better order and the ferns have taken root.

Mr. Bruce has not started with a new piece, but with two interesting and popular plays, neither of which has been very lately seen. In Honour Bound, which is perhaps Mr. Sydney Grundy's best comedy, though Mammon is a play of great merit, is acted by Mr. Edgar Bruce -whose original character was Sir George Carlyon—Mr. Temple, Miss Tilbury, and Miss Helen Matthews, who takes the difficult part of Lady Carlyon. The play is one which deserves more attention than an audience which had apparently come only to see The Palace of Truth were inclined to give to it. Like all Mr. Sydney Grundy's plays, it is written with scrupulous, almost pedantic, care. When In Honour Bound was first performed, its affiliation to Scribe's Une Chaine, and the boldness with which the dramatist drew attention to this play, and even sent his characters to see it acted, enforced admiration. Perhaps Mr. Grundy is a little too much enamoured of Scribe and the French method of the older school to please a modern London audience. In comparison with Mr. Gilbert's invertebrate series of entertaining scenes, in which the action scarcely moves at all, Mr. Grundy's nervous little comedy, with its rapid and conclusive evolution, evidently failed to please; nor, although Mr. Grundy has been long before the public, does his name compare with Mr. Gilbert's in popularity. He has not caught the universal ear; but he may flatter himself that it is partly because he speaks a purer English.

The piece was carefully acted. Miss Tilbury was a capital colonial niece, all raptures and innocence; and Miss Helen Matthews played the part of Lady Carlyon carefully, with a little less sharpness of delineation, perhaps, that could have been wished. The weak point of the play is the dialogue between Lady Carlyon and Philip, immediately after the former has overheard the confidences of the latter, and this weakness was increased by a kind of hesitation on the part of Miss Matthews. Mr. Edgar Bruce was excellent as Sir George Carlyon. Mr. G. Temple, who played Philip, lacked distinction of manner; so fascinating a lady-killer, too, should hardly be represented in a very badly-fitting suit of dress-clothes.

It is wise of Mr. Gilbert to revive The Palace of Truth while Pygmalion and Galatea is running, for the former to a great extent redeems the latter, and reminds us of the author's genuine wit and fancy. Of his fairy-comedies it is undoubtedly the best, as it may be said to be the earliest. It was brought out in November 1870, and first revealed Mr. Gilbert to the general public. It will still be remembered how facetious a King Phanor was presented by Buckstone, and how irresistible a Zeolide by Mrs. Kendal. In the present revival Mr. Anson deserves the chief credit of success, though all the parts may be said to be respectably played. Mr. Anson's Phanor is admirable, and the first act would scarcely be endurable without him. When he sits with his mandoline in his hand, in a ring of his courtiers, and is persuaded to recite once more his poem about "pitch-encrusted night," his gentle fatuity is beyond all praise. He glances from one to another with astute suspicion, till Zoram's marvellous compliments about the tetrachords and one redundant note quite sets his scruples at rest, and, with an ineffable smile of contented vanity, he turns to the others, and says of Zoram:—

> A wonderful musician—and a man
> Of infinite good taste.

Throughout the play Mr. Anson's King Phanor is of great service. It is a charming creation, and not the less pleasing because it is less vivid, less farcical, than Buckstone made it.

Mr. Kyrle Bellew, as Prince Philamir, has no opportunity to show his quality until the second act, where, under the spell of the truth, he has to pour out his very lukewarm feelings for Zeolide in accents burning with passion. This required a strain on the illusion of the spectators which Mr. Bellew enabled them to support by great skill and delicacy in his presentation, rising to something like genius at one moment, where he holds her head between his arms, and, leaning back as if in an ecstasy of amorous contemplation, sighs out

> I do not love you as a lover should.

His attitudes were graceful and without exaggeration, and he made the best that could be made of a thankless part. Miss Lingard was a sweet and forbearing Zeolide, and Miss Tilbury was excellent as Azema, with her exaggerated air of modesty and the crudity of her unconscious confessions. Miss Florence Marryat should correct a stiffness of movement and a monotony of voice which spoil her Queen Altomire. It is hardly necessary to say that Mr. John Maclean was good as Golanor. Miss Sophie Eyre, in an effective blue costume, played Mirza, the court-lady who has stolen the talisman, with considerable skill; she contrives, at the moment when we are all persuaded that she cannot but be true, to haunt us with what seems an unworthy suspicion.

The scenes are not very tastefully designed. The splendour of the Palace of Truth in the second act is of a merely gimcrack magnificence. The tinsel and sham mother-o'-pearl only serve to increase our sense of the illusiness of Mr. Gilbert's witty and graceful drama. With all its amusing quality, The Palace of Truth is slight and not entirely without a taint of vulgarity. At the close of the play the couples all forgive one another.—

> PHANOR.
> We've learnt how matrimonial constancy
> By causeless jealousy is sometimes tried.
> (Looking reproachfully at ALTAMIRE.)
> ALTAMIRE.
> How jealousy is sometimes justified.
> (Looking reproachfully at PHANOR.)

This is really all that we have learned when we have seen not this play only, but most of Mr. Gilbert's comedies, and the basis is a little slender for a dramatic reputation to be built upon.

THE RAILWAY CRISIS IN AMERICA.

THE New York Stock Exchange is passing through a crisis, the most severe it has experienced since the great panic of 1873. There does not appear to be any ground for fear, however, that the result will be as disastrous as in that year of widespread ruin. What is going on is rather the end of a long and slow liquidation than a sudden paralysis of credit producing a general industrial disorganization. When, in consequence of a succession of good harvests, of continual thrift, and of the accumulation of wealth, prosperity revived in the United States five years ago, the projects for building new railways that had to be suspended in 1873 were resumed. Population in the interval had greatly increased, new regions had been brought under cultivation, new towns had sprung into existence, new mines had been opened, and naturally, therefore, there was need for a further extension of the railway communications of the country. Moreover, with the revival of activity immigration began again upon a large scale, and to accommodate the new comers the opening-up of new fields of labour was required. But, as usual in such cases, the work was entirely overdone, and, to make matters worse, it was done in an unsafe manner. Formerly, when railways were built in the United States, the capital for building them was chiefly borrowed in Europe. The management of American railways, however, had taught European capitalists to distrust new Transatlantic railway schemes, and consequently the projectors of new railways five years ago found that it would be difficult to borrow largely in Europe. Nor did they very much desire to apply immediately to the European money markets. They wished first to secure a large profit, and to leave only the pickings to such European capitalists as might be induced to lend or to invest in their new undertakings. Accordingly, the projectors of new railways formed what are called "Construction Companies." They consist for the most part of but a few capitalists, and their avowed purpose is to build the railways in which these capitalists are interested. Their interests, however, are personal rather than public. One member hopes to sell iron or coal to the Company, another to issue the stock, a third to get the contract for actually constructing the line. And their plan of operation is to emit bonds to the amount required for actual construction, retaining the whole share capital in their own hands. In other words, the plan is to borrow on mortgage the money required for building the line, and to retain for themselves the absolute ownership, and of course also the management. If they can sell a portion of the shares, that is clear profit. For a time the plan succeeded admirably. The country was prosperous, there was a real want of additional railway communication, and there were most sanguine hopes formed of the future. But the mileage built was so immense that very soon the home money market was exhausted, and when the Construction Companies applied to the money markets of Europe, they discovered that European capitalists were not very ready to lend the sums required. They were obliged to find the means for completing their undertakings in any way they could. The first and most obvious method was to sell the securities of older and better-established Companies, for which a market could always be found either at home or in Europe. The sales became so enormous that prices began to fall, and, as each fall in price made the receipts of the Construction Companies less, to bring in a certain sum the sales had to be augmented. In consequence there ensued a continuous fall of prices, which has now lasted for nearly two years and a half. This fall of prices embarrassed speculators, who had bought securities on borrowed money in the hope of seeing prices rise, and who were called upon by the lenders for additional security, which in many cases they were unable to find. The outside speculators were thus compelled to sell, and gradually the selling assumed such vast proportions that the fall in prices has exceeded anything hitherto witnessed. It is estimated that the depreciation in the securities quoted upon the New York Stock Exchange exceeds in amount the indemnity paid by France to Germany at the close of the late war.

Of course, as we have often explained, a depreciation of this kind is to a large extent nominal. Investors who hold the securities of such great Companies as the New York Central, the Pennsylvania, or the Illinois Central, have for the most part bought for the sake of the revenue yielded by those stocks, and, speaking generally, are, in Stock Exchange phrase, neither induced "to take a profit" when prices rise nor frightened into throwing away their property when prices fall. To the mass of shareholders and bondholders, therefore, the loss through the fall of prices is purely imaginary. But, nevertheless, even to investors the loss in many cases is very serious. Where a shareholder or bondholder has for any reason whatsoever been obliged to sell, he has lost a great part of the capital invested. And where he has required to borrow on the security of the stocks or bonds held by him, he has been able to obtain less than he would have done two years, or even twelve months, ago. It is, however, upon the members of the Construction Companies and speculators generally that the real losses have fallen. Speculators, for example, who bought a year or two ago at 30, 50, or, in some cases, 100 per cent. higher than the prices now obtainable, did so by means of money borrowed, and were obliged to lodge with the lenders security for a certain proportion of the money lent, on the express condition that they would always keep up security to the same proportion. On every fall of prices they have been called upon to increase the security thus lodged, and the majority of them have been unable to comply. They have in consequence been obliged to sell the stocks in which they speculated, losing altogether the securities lodged with the banks and other lenders. In this way the number of failures caused throughout the United States has been greater than has been witnessed for many years past. If the speculators were a class apart, who lived by mere gambling upon the Stock Exchange, the result would perhaps be beneficial. But unfortunately the purely professional speculators are few. The great body consist of men who are engaged in various trading, industrial, and professional occupations, and their losses upon the Stock Exchange have consequently affected their other businesses, and have thus caused widespread suffering. Apart from all other causes, the embarrassments of the Construction Companies would have brought about a great fall in prices, but the effect of their embarrassments has been immensely aggravated by other influences. Not only have new railways been built in the newer parts of the Union, but while the mania lasted, lines were started even in the older States in competition with the greatest and best established in America. And the competition thus threatened drove the older Companies to adopt measures which have made the crisis much more severe than it otherwise would have been. To take the example that for the moment attracts most attention. The New York Central Railway runs through the most populous part of the State of New York, and passes through the only gap in the Alleghany Mountains in that part of the country. The line may practically be said to belong to the Vanderbilt family, who regarded their monopoly of the traffic as quite secure. The gap, indeed, is only wide enough to allow of one railway at each side of the Hudson River; and one bank was already occupied by the New York Central. Several years ago, however, a charter was obtained authorizing the construction of another railway on the other side of the river, but so chimerical did the building of this line appear to Mr. Vanderbilt that he is said to have refused to pay 5,000*l.* or 10,000*l.* for the charter when offered to him. At the height of the recent mania the project for building this competition line was revived, and capitalists eagerly took it up. It runs quite close to the New York Central all the way from New York to Buffalo. When Mr. Vanderbilt saw that the construction of the line was being pushed on in earnest, he adopted measures to defeat the threatened competition, which resulted in the "war of rates" that lasted for so many months in 1881 and 1882. It was generally believed at the time that his object was to so discredit new Railway Companies in the United States and in Europe that the Construction Companies would be unable to obtain the funds they needed, and if so, his object has been fully realized. He was aided, it must be remembered, by a great drought that prevailed throughout the whole of the United States in 1881, and caused a general failure of all the crops. The war of rates and the bad harvests began the fall in prices, which has gone on steadily ever since, until it has reached what seems to be the lowest point at present. Already the New York and New England Railway, one of those in close alliance with the New York, West Shore, and Buffalo, Mr. Vanderbilt's competitor, has found itself in such difficulties that on New Year's Day its President had to apply for the appointment of a Receiver over it. An application has since been made for the appointment of a Receiver over the New York, Ontario, and Western, another ally of the West Shore. And, lastly, the North River Construction Company, the Company which has built the West Shore, has likewise fallen into the hands of a Receiver. There are rumours afloat that the difficulties of the West Shore itself are extremely great. The most remarkable failure, however, which has as yet resulted from the crisis is that of Mr. Villard. He was a member of the Construction Company that built the West Shore, and, besides, he was President of the Northern Pacific Railway, of the Oregon and California Navigation Company, and of the Oregon and Transcontinental Company. In fact, he ruled absolutely the railway, river, and ocean communications of the vast territory lying west of the great lakes, south of the British provinces, and north of California. And the aggregate capital of the three Companies controlled by him amounted to about 40 millions sterling nominal. The fall in the securities of these Companies has amounted to about 50 per cent., so that at the present market prices they would realize perhaps not quite 20 millions sterling. And in consequence Mr. Villard himself has been reduced to poverty. He has been obliged to resign the presidency and directorship of all the Companies in which he was interested, and it is said has lost every penny he was worth.

That the crisis is not yet at an end is certain. The struggle between the New York Central and the West Shore Companies is still going on; and, if it is possible for the former to put an end to the competition of the latter, the struggle will be continued until the West Shore succumbs. At the same time, efforts are being made to struggle competition in other directions; while, of course, speculators see their opportunity for making money in the difficulties all round. Those who lost large sums by buying securities in the hope that they would rise, are now endeavouring to make up for their losses by selling securities in the hope that they will fall still farther. These purely speculative sales by persons who do not possess the stocks of which they dispose have powerfully contributed to the depreciation referred to above, and they are sure to be continued as long as the market remains in its present unsettled condition. It is to be borne in mind, however, that speculative sales of this kind in the long run are certain to bring about a rise. For, as soon as the speculators see reason to fear that they have made a mistake, and that prices may move upwards in spite of their efforts, they immediately turn round and buy back what they have sold. Otherwise, should the rise occur, they might be called upon to deliver the securities which they have sold without possessing them. Thus, if anything should frighten the speculators, their purchases might cause all at once a sudden and very considerable rise in prices. As long, however, as they are not rendered apprehensive, they are likely to continue their "raids" now upon this stock and now upon that. Furthermore, bankers generally are alarmed at the rumours current of the difficulties of great speculators, and are rendered cautious by the appointment of receivers in different parts of the country. They are unwilling, therefore, to lend largely wherever a Construction Company or a new Railway Company gets into difficulties. It is possible, therefore, that there may yet be very considerable failures and on a very large scale. Another adverse circumstance is that the Presidential election will occur next November, and that therefore public attention will be occupied with political agitation. But, in spite of all this, the probability seems to be that the crisis is rapidly drawing to a close. As stated above, the fall in prices has been going on for about two years and a half. In that time the bad business accumulated during the railway mania must have been nearly liquidated, and at the same time the country has been growing both in wealth and population. Moreover, the construction of new railways is now completely at an end. In 1882 the length of new lines built was 12,000 miles; last year only about 6,000 miles were constructed; and now it is estimated that in the current year the building will not exceed 2,000 miles. Last year and this year, moreover, all the mileage added to the American system was simply in completion of work already undertaken. No new line has been projected for two years. The sinking of capital, then, in new railways, and the manufacture of new railway bonds and shares, is practically at an end, and the growth of the United States is so rapid that things must now have nearly righted themselves. Nor is it to be lost sight of that the redemption of the debt by the United States Government is going on at such a rate that many who hold Government bonds and have been paid off are obliged to look out for other securities in which to invest. This money, as soon as confidence begins to revive, is likely to be invested in the better class of railway securities, and therefore to tend to raise prices.

REVIEWS.

EMERSON ON DREAMS AND BOGIES.*

DURING this autumn and winter there have been produced in England two editions of Emerson's works, one published by Messrs. Routledge and one by Messrs. Macmillan. We do not intend to discuss the exact position of Emerson in English literature, nor the worth of the pieces in some of these volumes, collected for the first time, as compared with those with which we have long been familiar. But this much we may say, that the reader must be ill-starred, either in his chance or in himself, who turns over any volume of Emerson for more than a few minutes without finding something for which he is the better—something fresh, welcome, and, above all, healthy. Many readers, and not incompetent ones, look on Emerson mainly as an idealist: and such may be surprised that one should dwell on sanity as one of the leading characters of his thought. But it is just in the combination of an ideal height and range of thought with balance and sanity that we find Emerson's charm. He constantly teaches us in his informal way, as Berkeley taught us with classical English and philosophy, that idealism is nothing else than common sense transfigured and enthroned above sophistry. There is in one of these volumes a short essay on "Demonology," taken from a course of lectures delivered about forty years ago, which very well illustrates this wholesome alliance, or rather identity, and, moreover, is still appropriate to the times. We do not think it can be much known, as yet, to readers in England; we shall therefore, without more ado, take it as our text.

Emerson goes straight to the true note of his subject with the first sentence:—"The name Demonology covers dreams, omens, coincidences, luck, sortilege, magic, and other experiences which shun rather than court inquiry." That is, in a nutshell, the common and the fatal character of all so-called occult knowledge. We are told of signs and wonders and powers that are beyond the scope of our common experience. They do not shrink from being talked about; their expounders, indeed, court notoriety; but it must be on their own terms, and there must be no meddling of the dry light of normal day. When it comes to real cross-questioning, these candid and innocent observers of unexplored phenomena begin to shift their forms as fast as Proteus, and few there be that can hold them to any tangible certainty. As surely now as forty years ago, or, for that matter, forty centuries, they "shun rather than court inquiry." They say, of course, that they love light of all things. They invite the fullest examination and the strictest of tests; but somehow, when the examining begins in earnest, it always turns out that the sceptic's candle must be put in a dark lantern provided by the showman, or there will be no show to-day. Some time, at last, a sturdy Menelaus, undaunted by long lying in ambush among creatures of evil odour, a Mr. Ray Lankester or whoever else it may be, catches his Proteus and exposes the very body of the imposture. The juggler's booth is overturned, his dupes go sorrowing, and in a few months another like unto him resumes the same business with trifling variations, much the same customers, and equal or greater success.

Emerson, after that comprehensive sentence of prelude, begins with dreams, a subject capable of infinite nonsense, and also capable of being turned to more profit than has yet been made of it by rational psychology. His notes are full of keen observation of the things all of us have felt and few remembered. The difficulty of recollecting a dream so vivid that in the first moment it seemed as if it would always cling to us—"but we cannot get our hand on the first link or fibre, and the whole is lost"; the dislocation, as he happily calls it, whereby some strange incongruous element is always coming up to mar the palaces of our dream-fancies; the still stranger memory and congruity of a sort that runs through dreams, making us feel at home after a fashion among the trains that never get started, the fine sentences that never will construe, or the armies of nations that turn into boys with popguns and penny whistles—all these Emerson expounds in his lucid easy way, and with intimate knowledge. We shall be thought paradoxical again for calling him lucid. Let any one who has noted his dreams read this essay through, and then contradict us. Again, there is the uncontrollable quality of dreams, when "we call the phantoms that rise the creation of our fancy, but they act like mutineers and fire on their commander," a quality which may show a man by flashes, as Emerson truly says, undisclosed recesses of his own character, or of his true temper and judgment concerning other things, thus giving what we call presentiments, and more of them than we know could we but seize and interpret them. "The sign is always there, if only the eye were also." And so we pass from the occult world that every man carries with him to the other occult world that men go seeking, in the fond hope that somewhere they will buy or pick up the back-door key to the secret of the universe.

What is the verdict of the leader of modern English idealism on the modern trade in mysterics? (English, we say, speaking of the things that pertain to our common language and literature on both sides of the Atlantic; the clumsy "Anglo-Saxon" means nothing more, and there is always "British" to fall back upon for the local and political distinction). Emerson's verdict is purely that of robust common sense. First and foremost, that the honest daylight nature of things is so much more wonderful, in any case, that ghost-hunting is put out of court as poor trifling work at best. "I am content and occupied with such miracles as I know, such as my eyes and ears daily show me, such as humanity and astronomy. If any others are important to me, they will certainly be shown to me." But, also, there is in Emerson's quiver a more direct and piercing arrow for the mystery-monger. "For Spiritism, it shows that no man almost is fit to give evidence." No more shrewd and vital word could have been spoken. It goes to the heart of the superstition that besets in these matters many good-hearted men, and has even beset men of genius. Innocently, but recklessly, they assume that what is commonly called the evidence of trustworthy witnesses must be believed. There was a Cambridge squib, some twenty years ago, in which a freshman expostulated with his bed-maker on the levitation, or vanishing, or dematerialization of cups and saucers, referred by her alternately to occult automatic processes and to the cat, and, after failing to obtain any further or better hypothesis, meditated on the profound truth of Paley's saying (not to be found in those words, we need hardly add, in the received text of that author), "That it is not contrary to experience for witness to be false." Or, as the authentic text of Hobbes puts it, every claim to irresponsible prophetic powers (or, in later times, to occult intelligences, thought-reading, and what not) must at last rest on the assertion of a man: "who, being man, may err, and, which is more, may lie." There is no lie so gross and palpable but it may be supported by a vast bulk of credible testimony. Most excellent witness is on record, in books published in all seriousness as late as the eighteenth century, of dragons in the Alps, some winged, some crowned, some four-legged, some two-legged, some two-headed, some cat-faced; no mere rumour, but depositions of eye-witnesses, with full particulars of date, place, and persons. And there is the standing instance of witchcraft, of which the evidence, if we are to apply the rules of normal human affairs, is nothing less than overwhelming. The Psychical Society will never equal its volume and cogency though they get a houseful of answers to their pseudo-scientific circulars of questions. Most of the witches were executed on their own confessions—the strongest kind of evidence known to courts of justice dealing with the conduct of sane men. And yet this mean and ugly terror that overshadowed men's lives for centuries was a phantom void of substance, a thing of pestilent vapour. We have blown it out of our road, and pass on. Only the student of morbid psychology looks back upon it now.

To return to Emerson, he is not content with exploding the impostures of the supposed occult world. He goes to what is, after all, the curious and interesting point raised by them. Why is a large part of mankind ever seeking after these things? Wherein is the perennial fascination of self-deception? Probably no simple answer can be given. Human folly is a complex thing, and neither its roots nor its fruits are lightly to be numbered. But the cause assigned by Emerson is a true one, and lies deep. It is the desire of men to escape from the impartiality of nature. "The history of man is a series of conspiracies to win from Nature some advantage without paying for it." When the sun that shines upon the just and the unjust is not good enough for us, we set up a private ignis fatuus. "In the popular belief, ghosts are a selecting tribe, avoiding millions, speaking to one." But nature has only one voice, and gives nothing save at her own just price. She forgives not nor forgets any attempt at circumventing her rules of business, and sooner or later the day of requital is at hand; for "this supposed power runs athwart the recognized agencies, natural and moral, which science and religion explore." Then the ghost-hunters are left in such a case as was Micah of Ephraim's after the six hundred men of Dan appointed with weapons of war had carried off his teraphim and his domestic Levite. The pet Levite is convinced some fine day of being a common rogue and vagabond, and the worshippers cry pitifully like Micah, "Ye have taken away my gods which I made, and the priest, and ye are gone away; and what have I more?" Sometimes they console themselves with denouncing the scientific arrogance which heeds not their array of credible witness, and is blinded to their revelations by preconceived theories. But Emerson has a word for them here, though not in this essay nor in this connexion. "The shallow clamour against theoretic men comes from the weak." Show us a complainer against the dogmatism of men of science—that is to say, against the presumption of men who venture to think they know their own business—and we will show you a judgment infected by conversation among charlatans or dupes, if not something worse.

Let us end with a wholesome breath of Emerson to drive off the fumes that rise when one thinks of these things:—"Coincidences, dreams, animal magnetism, omens, sacred lots, have great interest for some minds. They run into this twilight and say, 'There's more than is dreamed of in your philosophy!' Certainly these facts are interesting, and deserve to be considered. But they are entitled only to a share of attention, and not a large share. . . . The whole world is an omen and a sign. Why look so wistfully in a corner? Man is the Image of God. Why run after a ghost or a dream? The voice of divination resounds everywhere and runs to waste unheard, unregarded, as the mountains echo with the bleatings of cattle."

"GENT wants a thinner and drier vintage, does he? We'll see how he likes this," says the waiter, in Leech's sketch, as he pumps water into a sherry decanter. Critics have always been telling Ouida that they liked a thinner and drier tap than she was in the habit of supplying. The Falernian vintages of Ouida's genius have been found too sweet and rich, though undoubtedly very "curious." Strathmore and Under Two Flags, with many of Ouida's other samples, really seemed as if no amount of keeping would ever tone them down, and correct their luscious flavour and superabundant alcohol. In deference, perhaps, to numerous requests, Ouida now presents us, in Frescoes, &c., with a beverage which is distinctly thinner and drier than Chandos and Strathmore. But we fear reviewers will say that the dryness and thinness are only got by the waiter's expedient. The tap is not a new tap; it is only the old tap watered down.

If any artless reader asks what the old tap was, it is easy to give a reply. Ouida's old manner was a romantic manner à tous crins, as she might say herself. Her motto (selected from so many romantic writers) was L'orgie échevelée. Her topics were the delight of the eye and the pride of life. Life, in Ouida's ancient vein, was excessively exuberant and full-blooded. How strong, how tall, how beautiful, how wicked, how all-accomplished was her hero! Ouida, like Launce, would have her hero "to be, as it were, a dog at all things." The heroine was equally passionate and versatile; while her wealth of tawny tresses and the opulent carnations of her complexion might have made an art critic die of envy. The gorgeous magnificence of the raiment and furniture of these persons was among the things which we best loved in the Ouida of old. Some of the heroine's dresses in A Winter City still abide pleasantly in memory. With all this revel of luxury Ouida was by way of being a moral sort of writer; she would stop in a description of marble halls to lash the indolence of the aristocracy and the greed of the age. She never failed to expose vices which reminded her of what she had read in Suetonius and Petronius (and Podonian the Elder, for what we know), when she met them among her characters. She had a kind of lingering way of resting among such matters and in the midst of these classic reminiscences. Then virtues, with Ouida, were as lily-white as vices were flaming and scarlet. No people were ever quite so innocent as the innocents of Ouida, no self-sacrifice ever matched their devotion, or so critics used to say. Another great charm of Ouida was her following after Mrs. Malaprop. No lady writer made more and more diverting mistakes when touching on such topics as sport and the classics.

These were the qualities of the Ouida of our salad days, and in Frescoes, &c. the same qualities are present, only they are watered down. If we are to put Ouida's books into the hands of the virtuous, we prefer not to take them as they were in the fearless old fashion. Frescoes, &c. is a volume with which a girl may trust her mother. The little stories and "Dramatic Sketches" are written in a tone comparatively moderate, just as "Leo Adolescens" wrote comparatively moderately in the Pall Mall Gazette when he "was voted under par in Fleet Street." There is even a certain vein of humour in Frescoes, and humour has hitherto been almost as rare in Ouida's work as in the work of George Sand, which occasionally resembles Ouida's, much as a Titian resembles an oleograph. On the whole, Frescoes may be read with pleasure and diversion. But, we return to our point, the matter is the old matter diluted.

In the first story (which gives its title to the book, and is told in a series of letters, post-cards, and telegrams) we have the ancient class of puppets, and a romantic plot so venerable as to be almost prehistoric. Ouida's hero, Leonis Renzo, is an Italian painter. He is our early friend, the Admirable Crichton of Ouida's fancy. A child of supposed illegitimate birth, he is brought up in his little Italian village by the curé. He studies at Paris, and he acquires, somehow, the colouring of Botticelli, with the design of Michael Angelo. Such painters, unluckily, are more common in Ouida's novels than in this evil every-day world. We remember another specimen who eked out a miserable subsistence by painting the lids of chocolate boxes. Well, if a young Italian combined all the skill of Venice, Florence, and Rome, he would make a fortune in a very short time; at the least he would make a name. But Leonis Renzo was poor and unknown. A Mr. Hollys, of the English Embassy, was aware of his miraculous powers, yet somehow Hollys did not find him customers. He sent Leonis, however, to decorate the drawing-room of his cousin, a young, unmarried lady, Countess of Charterys, and Châtelaine of "Milton Ernest," in Berks.

The judicious reader now understands all about it. The Italian is the soul of courtesy and courage; he manages horses to admiration; he is as proud as he is poor; he sings divinely; he can do everything except speak English, though he alludes with familiarity to Shakspeare and Herrick. The latter does not seem an author likely to be known to a young Italian painter, even if he has taken high honours at the University of Rome. Everything happens as in the best and oldest models. The magnificent, faultlessly lovely, but bored Lady Charterys learns Italian from the beautiful and accomplished painter. Her grandmother, Lady Cairnwith of Oswestry (or Othwestry), in vain remonstrates. A young Duke (rather after Mr. Henry James) proposes in vain. The Countess falls in love, the painter falls in love: but he is too honourable to declare his passion. Finally the Countess leaves the painter while she goes to the Riviera. He has a commission to rummage in her cabinets, and arrange her Old Masters' drawings. While thus engaged he finds—who does not guess what he finds? He discovers that he is the true Lord Charterys, that his mother was married to the last earl of that name, that he is legitimate, and as for his poor lady-love, "she is no longer Lady Clare." Everything ends happily, as in Lord Tennyson's ballad on this theme, whose antiquity is so venerable. There are traits of humour in the sketch, and Renzo is, of course, very hard on the manners and customs of the British aristocracy, who are greedy, ill-mannered, fond of brandy and soda-water, and too rich in the possession of leisure. The Italian nobles, by the way, are not famous for their energy. But this reflection of Renzo's is true, and pleasantly expressed:—

> When I hear all these people talk of going here, going there, of flying this way and that, like so many happy birds, I understand that to be poor is to be a bird without wings, like that poor hopeless, ugly apteryx which is the laughing-stock of naturalists and the cruel jest of nature.

The love-making in this story is pretty and innocent. In fact, Frescoes is a very creditable little romance, with all Ouida's love of splendour and of extremes in everything toned down. The habit of lingering in perilous places over what may be said about the "improprieties" of Boccaccio, or a false sense of the word bastarda, comes out in "At Camaldoli" and in "Afternoon." This weakness of the author's is not exhibited in Frescoes. "At Camaldoli" is a little drama of cross purposes between an Italian Duke and a Belgian lady whom he believes to be rich. He loves her, and she him, but he is a little startled when he finds that she is not the rich Comtesse de Riom, but the poor one. How the matter ends readers may discover for themselves. The English prig in this piece might have been more true to nature; the American lady is pretty good, at least as English people understand Americans, which, we are often told, is not at all. In "Afternoon" we have an English nobleman who boasts that he "won the Grand Military three times running." Is there not a horse somewhere in feminine fiction which won the Derby three times running? As to the plot of "Afternoon," we have only to echo L'Estrange's criticism on himself, "Great God! how could I be so blind!" However, this sort of blindness (which prevents a man from recognizing his own wife) is not uncommon in fiction, and is very convenient. On the whole, Ouida's "Dramatic Sketches" may be compared to the "Little Comedies" of Mr. Julian Sturgis, though they are much more violent in the stage tricks than anything Mr. Sturgis is ever likely to produce. To bring an incident that would stagger Xavier de Montépin into a little comedy of society is to dare too much. Beyond references to "Henri Boyle," as a writer on love, and to one "Edon"—"that blunder comes from Edon"—errors of the old funny sort are scarce in Ouida's new book. Critics will be most diverted by Ouida's little essay on "Romance and Realism" which first appeared in the Times. We must once more explain to Ouida that we do not object to romance (would that Mr. Louis Stevenson gave us more of it!) but to romance which is spoiled by ignorance of human nature and by the curious obliquity of vision that regards a wretched scandal (here told by Ouida) as "romantic." Ouida describes how a Genoese noble kept a mistress and "showed liberality to her family," how she took another lover, how the generous nobleman challenged the other lover, how the lover was a cur, how the noble threatened to shoot him, how the police would not hear of such a thing, and how the idiotic nobleman took a shot at himself, while the "venerable Brigadier of the Guard wept like a child." Ouida thinks this tale at once real and romantic; but we fail to see the romance. Here are a strumpet, a family like Les Cardinal, a "monsieur" who is a coward, and a "monsieur" who is a fool. The puzzle is to find the romance. Romantic things often occur in real life; but Ouida's reality is not romantic, and her romance is not real.

BOOKS ON INDIAN WARFARE.*

THE fourth edition of the Rev. George Hodson's memorials of his heroic brother is noteworthy for other reasons than the satisfaction which any fresh proof that Englishmen have not yet lost interest in English prowess must cause. It includes a careful and elaborate vindication from the extraordinary attack which Mr. Bosworth Smith thought proper to make some months ago on a dead man who had fought for England. We have said extraordinary, but perhaps that is scarcely the right expression. The lues biographica which makes biographers too often think it necessary to adopt in a mass the prejudices of their biographees is unluckily an ordinary thing enough, and it is certain that Lord Lawrence both disliked Hodson and treated him with harshness. It so happened, too, that the biographer had particular predilections of his own which might have led him to vilify the slayer of certain Mahommedan princes even if Lord Lawrence had been of his party, and the misleading effects of these little personal whimsies are ordinary enough too. Lastly, the petty jealousies and heartburnings which gave Mr. Bosworth Smith the somewhat insufficient excuse that other writers have spoken severely of Hodson are ordinary also—very ordinary, as ordinary as human nature. With the book itself there is no need to deal, and with the general character of its hero hardly more. We for our parts are very glad to adopt Mr. Smith's description of Hodson's crowning deed, the pistolling of the princes at Delhi. "The deed was worthy of the man, and the man of the deed." He could not possibly have said a truer thing. Not merely the immediate hardihood, which could do such a deed in the face of enormously superior numbers of armed and threatening enemies, but the steadfastness of mind which could dare the certain opprobrium of cavilling humanitarians were worthy of a hero, and Hodson of Hodson's Horse was worthy to take the crowning vengeance for the unutterable crimes of the Indian Mutiny. That England may have such a man to do her work for her whenever she needs him may be very heartily hoped. But a little more detailed notice is due to the "Vindication." Mr. Smith has said that Hodson in early times behaved in such a manner that Sir H. Lawrence "lost all faith in him." Mr. Hodson produces letters both of a private and of a semi-official character, dated long after the time in question, in which Sir H. Lawrence speaks of his brother in the highest terms. Mr. Smith speaks of the alleged malversation of regimental funds, and states truly enough that a court of inquiry came to conclusions adverse to Hodson. Mr. Hodson points out that Mr. Smith has suppressed the fact that his brother appealed, that a second inquiry was ordered, that Major-General Reynell Taylor, who conducted it, expressly and completely vindicated Hodson's behaviour as "quite satisfactory," saying, moreover, that "there was nothing whatever in the charges," though this report, the existence and nature of which are undeniable, was for some reason never officially published. Again, there is the charge of looting and of vast stores of valuables found in Hodson's boxes after his death. Mr. Hodson disposes of this by pointing out that these vast stores were sold by public auction (an exact inventory of which exists) for considerably less than two hundred pounds. Finally, there is the famous charge of being killed while looting, which was the subject of voluminous correspondence in the daily papers some months ago, and which Mr. Hodson collected a great mass of testimony to refute. He does not reproduce all this in extenso, but those who followed it most closely will acknowledge the accuracy of his summary when he says, "All agree in the important facts, with such trifling discrepancies as might be expected."

Of course, it is by no means necessary that every one should hold so high an opinion of Major Hodson as it is right and just that his brother should hold. Judging from all accounts, it seems probable that he had some of the faults which often accompany an essentially military temperament, especially that kind of military temperament which finds its best exercise in the half-irresponsible and self-directed career of a leader of irregulars. It is likely that governableness was not his strong point; that he was not prone to take what he thought wrongs or slights meekly; that he got on better with his inferiors or his superiors by a great deal than with his equals or immediate chiefs; that his notions of the etiquette of military book-keeping were primitive; that his justice was something of Jeddart justice. An incident which Mr. Hodson puts by irrefragable proof in its true light, but which has been distorted into a charge of wholesale plundering—the buying, that is to say, of a great herd of cattle which his general did not know what to do with, after which the beasts were escorted by Hodson's Sowars to Delhi and sold at a profit—is just the kind of imprudent proceeding which its sporting interest no less than its probable gainfulness makes attractive to a certain class of minds, but which a prudent man would for more reasons than one have abstained from. We can discover no proof of any looting in an evil sense, though, if Mr. Bosworth Smith will inquire in any extensive circle of persons who had friends in the Mutiny he will probably find some interesting cimelia, the present title to which is not easily to be traced to anything but Faustrecht. That the charge of going out of his way (it is admitted that he was not on duty at the time of his death) to loot is a base and groundless slander there can be no doubt. But that Hodson's ways were much more those of old-fashioned warriors than of new-fashioned ones there is also no doubt. He was probably bad at filling up reports, and good at utilizing the resources of the country; he was certainly prompt of hand and high of heart.

The flesh of reviewers, as of other men, is weak, and it is possible that we might be inclined to think better of Mr. Duke's book but for some physical peculiarities. It is a very large book; one of those stout and portly octavos which lie open with difficulty, and fatigue the hands greatly in holding them. And there is no reason why it should be a large book; for, even if the author persisted in retaining the considerable amount of irrelevant and superfluous matter which he has mixed up with his own recollections, the adoption of somewhat smaller type and closer printing would have reduced the corpulence of the volume very materially. As it is, the type and spacing would be large for any standard library edition of a great classical author. Furthermore, the book is bound in sticky shiny calico, the touch of which is as unpleasant to the fingers as its scarlet hue is trying to the eye. Let it not be said that these are matters with which the critic has nothing to do and the author not much. They fall entirely within the former's province, and the latter would be wise if he more frequently remembered that they also fall within his.

Size and binding are not the only things in which we have too much of Mr. Duke. He is one of those unwise persons who, shrinking from the undertaking of writing a regular history of a certain set of events, cannot resist interpolating all sorts of miscellaneous matter with their own experiences. Mr. Duke had experiences which he has a perfect right to tell. He was attached to Sir Frederick Robert's personal staff, not indeed at the passage of the Peiwar, but immediately before the conclusion of the Treaty of Gundamuck; he was present at Charasiab, was close by when the Sherpur magazines blew up, was beleaguered in that fortress, and, finally, shared in the march to Candahar and in the battle which avenged Maiwand. Thus he has something to tell; and he tells it, not indeed with any extraordinary literary talent, but in a pleasant and straightforward fashion which is quite readable. The situation at Sherpur and some other incidents and scenes are illustrated by useful lithographs from drawings on the spot; and the preface contains a short paper by General Roberts himself on the conduct of Yakub Khan, which is an interesting and valuable document. But Mr. Duke, not satisfied with these things, has mixed up with them all sorts of other things which are not in any way his own experiences, which are not novel, and which are quite out of place among them. We have extracts from the accounts given by English newspaper correspondents; we have, in the very first chapter, a long account, extending to nearly fifteen pages, of a not particularly eventful exploring expedition, which was not only not made by Mr. Duke, but which, apparently, was made before he reached Afghanistan. Constantly in the course of the narrative the reader finds (and there is nothing more irritating to a reader who is possessed of some modicum of intelligence and information) that his author has left off recollecting altogether, and is simply compiling from others. Lastly, Mr. Duke prints in an appendix all the correspondence between Shere Ali and General Kauffmann, &c.—documents, no doubt, of great value, but very well known already, absolutely unentitled to rank among his "recollections," and dealing with matters which do not even come within the period of those recollections. All this makes, not to mince the matter, a bad book—a book which in parts will be worth consulting by any future historian of the campaign, but which is neither itself a good history nor a good book of personal reminiscences. The passage describing the ascent of Mount Sika Ram, the account of the Sherpur explosion and of the city of Cabul during the English occupation, and the tale of how the relieving force first came heliographically into communication with Candahar, are perhaps the best parts of Mr. Duke's volume. But his accounts of battles, though minute and careful, lack not only spirit (which is too often gained or aimed at by the sacrifice of minuteness and care) but still more that clearness and manlike intelligibleness which good military historians often, with the use of the simplest language, succeed in imparting. We are sorry not to be able to speak better of Mr. Duke, because he is entirely free from pretension, in no way parades his own services or exploits, writes in a thoroughly good spirit on matters political, and will, as we have said, be useful to the skilled student and future historian—both of whom, however, will probably indulge in much stronger language as to the composition of his book than we have used. The fact is that the practice of book-writing by persons who have taken some small personal part in important affairs has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished. If any such person has the talent and will take the time and trouble to write a regular history, he of course ought not to be discouraged. But the eking out of original matter by all sorts of digression and compilation is something very like a nuisance. What would be welcome and valuable in the shape of a short memoir or article becomes unwelcome, and only with difficulty available for any useful purpose, when it is padded and bolstered out into a portly volume.

Mr. Gillham-Thomsett, who is a professional colleague of Mr. Duke's, is exposed to no such strictness as his fellow-surgeon. His book is a very little one, and a very unpretentious, confining itself (with the exception of a few letters from friends) to the recital of what the writer actually saw during the Afghan war. Unfortunately Mr. Gillham-Thomsett did not see very much, the only stand-up fight at which he was present being the engagement at Mattun. Here, however, and on some other occasions, he was witness of the remarkable gallantry of the hillmen. One of their chiefs, his comrade, a standard-bearer, having been killed by a shell which struck him point blank on the breast, caught up the flag, ran down the hill towards the English for fifty yards in front of his men, and stood there regardless of the fire waving them on. Mr. Gillham-Thomsett is perhaps wont a little to exaggerate mishaps (such as some hours' jolting in a springless vehicle, and a nasty struggle in the snow during a dark afternoon's ride), which might occur in circumstances where hardship is less to be looked for than on active service in an enemy's country during winter. He also seasons his narrative with jocular passages of a deplorable kind, the jokes being known not only to every one who has ever entered a mess-room, but to every one who has ever consorted with his fellows in any state of life. But his book is not long enough to make these drawbacks other than tolerable.

THE ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA.*

THE sixteenth volume of the ninth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica may be as heartily recommended as any of its predecessors to students who want a good book of reference, or to readers who like to acquire miscellaneous information in an agreeable manner. It opens with the article, "Mena, Juan de," and ends with "Mosul." Between these two subjects no small part of human knowledge is to be found in a condensed but readable form in the 868 pages of the volume. A wise tutor would scarcely recommend his pupil to read it right through. The youth who tried that feat would probably be reduced lower than the severest course of cramming could bring him. Neither would it be prudent to turn the book over, except for purposes of muscular exercise, and dip into its contents. Such a futile employment of his time would probably bring the reader into doubt whether Monasticism was not one of the four orthodox sects of Mohammedanism, or as to whether the Mongols had something to do with Morphology. By carefully abstaining from looking at the text, the pages may be turned over to some useful purpose, for the volume is admirably illustrated. We do not refer to the plates at the end, which are almost all maps, and ugly maps too. Not that any blame attaches to Messrs. W. & A. K. Johnston, of Edinburgh, who made them. No map-maker can by any skill of workmanship cause Michigan and Minnesota and Missouri to look like anything but irregular chess-boards, at least on paper. The woodcuts in the text, however, are far more pleasant to look at. The drawing of the illustrations for the article on the Microscope is excellently clear. Some of the illustrations to other articles are not only good workmanship, but artistic into the bargain. Two of the woodcuts to the very solid article on Metal-work, by Mr. J. H. Middleton, deserve particular mention. The first is the drawing of a wrought-iron candle-pricket, a piece of Florentine work of the fifteenth century. The other is a part of the "Eleanor Grill" on the opposite page. On coming to p. 851 any person of delicate nerves should skip, or at least prepare for a shock. It contains the picture, full size, of a very terrible bogey in the shape of "part of a Persian's head from the Battle of Issus"—one of the illustrations to the paper on Mosaics.

We cannot attempt to notice more than a few of the several hundred articles contained in the volume. On the whole the arrangement seems to be fairly good, in so far at least that none of the subjects has been allowed to take up an inordinate amount of space, as has sometimes been the case in former instalments of the work. Not that curious examples of editorial mismanagement are wholly wanting. By what process of reasoning, for instance, was it decided that Lady Mary Montagu was entitled to just a little over half a column, while three are given to Charles Méryon? Lady Mary's share is indeed just a few lines more than that of Hégésippe Moreau; and, looking to the literary and critical qualities of the articles, the injustice seems even more glaring. Why, again, should, "Sir Anthony More, a distinguished portrait-painter," be disposed of with less than half the amount of biography and comment given to Charles Auguste Louis Joseph, Duc de Morny? The only possible explanation is that Morny and Moreau died the other day, and that More and Lady Mary have been dead a very long while. An encyclopædia is not supposed, however, to be composed on newspaper principles. Neither is bad arrangement of this kind wise from a business point of view. Long before this work has reached the letter Z, even scandal-mongers will probably have come round to the opinion that More is still better entitled to attention than the cynical Minister of Napoleon III. Neither will there be much difference of opinion as to whether or not Lady Mary is a more considerable figure in literature than Hégésippe Moreau. Mistakes of this kind are, however, the exception. Various scientific subjects fall to be treated in this volume. At the rate at which science is advancing in our days they will probably be ripe for rewriting by the time the Encyclopædia is complete; but they are signed by names which are a guarantee that they have been brought up to the present date. Professor Dittmar contributes an article on Metals, and another on Metallurgy. Dr. Carpenter signs the profusely illustrated paper on the Microscope. The article on Morphology is by Mr. P. Geddes; and that on the Mollusca is by Professor E. Ray Lankester. Two authors—Messrs. W. C. Roberts and R. A. Hill—sign the article on the Mint, which is profusely illustrated and full of information. Professor Caird covers many pages on the inexhaustible subject of Metaphysic with columns which may be looked at with respect, and attacked with a sense of the gravity of the undertaking. The historical articles are also numerous, and of great interest. Nowadays, when the intelligent reader of the daily papers has such good reason to try to understand what a Mahdi is, the three articles on "Mohammedanism," which we should greatly prefer to call Mahometanism, ought to be carefully studied. Professor Wellhausen gives a sketch of the life of Mahomet, whose name he spells Mohammed, which is at least better than other forms, fringed with a varying number of accents, which we have seen. The second article, by Professor Stanislas Guyard, is on the Eastern Caliphate. It gives an apparently full account of the religious condition of the Moslem world after its first age. The reader may learn from it the consoling fact that Islam is divided by heresies and schisms as effectually as Christianity, which is worth knowing in times when we are continually told that every single Mahometan is ready to shed the last drop of his blood in the cause of every other. It would, in fact, appear that most of them are as likely to do so as the late Dr. Begg and his Highland host would have been to die for Pio Nono because they both called themselves Christians. From the article on Mahometanism the reader may profitably pass to another on the Mongols by Professors R. K. Douglas and B. Jülg. Among historical subjects which lie nearer home, Mr. Pattison deals with the life of Sir Thomas More. The article is an excellent example of what the work done for an encyclopædia of a high class should be. It is full of facts, and quite free from eloquent padding, without therefore being destitute of literary merit. Mr. Pattison seems to us to have defined More's position as a man of the new learning, who was, however, a sincere Catholic with perfect precision and at the same time to have done justice to the King without falling into paradox. He can see that Henry took, on the whole, the best course for England without at the same time jumping to the conclusion that he did it from wholly noble motives. Mr. Gardiner gives a sketch of the life of another of those high-minded and well-meaning men who have come to the ground between two stools in his article on Montrose. There is naturally much matter which is pure information in this volume—such, for instance, as the article on Mexico; to which, however, is prefixed an account of the civilization which the Spaniards found there, and destroyed. America has a considerable share of these geographical papers, owing to the fact that the names of so many rivers and States begin with the letter "M." Readers in search of information about Michigan, Minnesota, Milwaukie, Mississippi—the river or the State—Missouri, and Montana will find it in abundance in this sixteenth volume of the Encyclopædia.

The artistic and literary articles are, as they have been in former volumes, often of great interest. We cannot honestly say that all of them come up to our idea of what the contributions to an encyclopædia ought to be. The preciosity of Mr. Wedmore's "Méryon" is more obvious than the solidity of its criticism. No doubt the rule that a word must not be repeated in the same sentence was invented mainly for the purpose of helping people who have no ear to write without being too continually flat, but it has its merits not the less. From the fact that Mr. Wedmore goes out of his way to offend against it some score of times in two columns, we conclude that he considers it the invention of the Philistine. Certainly there is no gain in lucidity to compensate for the unpleasant repetition in such a sentence as this—"But a living authority, himself an eminent etcher, and admiring Méryon thoroughly, has called Méryon by preference a great original engraver—so little of Méryon's work accords with Mr. Haden's view of etching." Some of the judgments in Mrs. Pattison's article on J. F. Millet contradict one another. It is quite impossible to believe that he was at once a faithful painter of peasant-life and that the "dresses of his figures are not clothes, but drapery, through which the forms and movements of the body are strongly felt," or that he is true to nature in giving a "Washerwoman at her Tub" "the grand action of Medea." The dresses of peasants do look like clothes, and washerwomen do not possess the grand action of Medea, at least only once or so in a hundred years. It would be more accurate to say that Millet drew pictures of the life of the country labourers coloured by his own strong and gloomy imagination, but no more true to commonplace nature than the pastorals of Watteau, though they are infinitely more manly. The article on Michelangelo by Professor Sidney Colvin is altogether admirable. In the space at his disposal, some thirteen columns, he gives all the essential facts of one of the longest and perhaps the best filled of all artistic lives. No better account of the many-sided career of the great Florentine and of the wonderful world in which he acted his various parts can ever have been given in anything like the same space. Much sound criticism, a condensed catalogue raisonné, and a guide to the bibliography of Michelangelo are given along with the biographical matter. Among the literary papers we grieve to have to say that the most readable are devoted to Frenchmen. Mr. Lang contributes a chatty article on Molière, which gives the results of modern research in the least pedantic of manners, with not a little sound criticism in an incidental way. Mr. Saintsbury adds to the excellent series of critical biographies of French men of letters with which he is enriching the Encyclopædia. In the present volume he signs four papers on Mérimée, Michelet, Montaigne and Montesquieu. In the article on Michelet Mr. Saintsbury justly observes that "a whole critique" of French literature and French character might be founded on La Femme. We wish that he would write it. Mr. Saintsbury is sterner to Montaigne than he was to La Rochefoucauld. He seems to have found it easier to forgive the reckless intriguer who cared not whether he ruined his country than the easy-going philosopher who shirked facing the plague. La Rochefoucauld's readiness to fight covers his sins. Professor Minto's papers on J. S. Mill and Thomas Moore are full of facts, but they might profitably be cleansed of certain graces of style. There is, for instance, an appearance of disrespect in saying that Scott and Mackintosh "scribbled off" histories even for Lardner's Cyclopædia. Also, we think, there is a rather misplaced poetry of the weaker amatory kind in saying that Dumont's Traité de Legislation aroused in J. S. Mill "an ambition as enthusiastic and impassioned as a young man's first love." We may make one more observation on the literary part of this volume. The Spanish articles are, as they have been all along, very poor; but the height of absurdity is reached when the two Moratins, very worthy but very dull men, have a page between them, while Moreto, in some respects the first of Spanish dramatists and a master of comedy, is clipped down to a dozen lines and a jejune list of his plays.

SOME MINOR POETS.*

THOUGH Aristotle is not a minor poet, it seems more than ordinarily fortunate that a copy of the Poetics should have found its way to us along with the twelve volumes of verse which form the subject of this notice. It gives a timid critic a great sense of security to be able to lay his finger on his Aristotle as he employs what authors are apt to disregard as the flouts and jeers of a reviewer. There are many truisms very necessary for the minor poet that were spoken by Aristotle, and are clearly rendered by Mr. Wharton. For instance, what could be better than to remind poets, great and small, that the perfection of style is to be clear without being mean; or that when a style is "strange and metaphorical, with lengthenings and everything unordinary," then "the result will be either a riddle or a jargon"? Every one should admit the truth of such remarks; but how much better they come from Aristotle than from ourselves. Mr. Wharton's translation does not, we presume, aim at being more than a crib, and as such it is successful. The cribs of a nation, like its histories, require rewriting every few years—at least it would appear so; for a new translation is always in demand at the Universities. Though Mr. Wharton not unfrequently assumes that familiar and peculiar phraseology which is connected with the name of Bohn, he on occasion can employ a more idiomatic form of expression. His translation is always construable.

When Mr. Wyville Home published his first volume of poetry—The Songs of a Wayfarer—the Bristol Times and Mirror, with that healthy ardour which endears the provincial press to the young versifier, predicted for his work "second and subsequent editions." It is true that the Bristol Times and Mirror put in an "if"; but even with an "if" it would be very rash to predict "second and subsequent" editions for any volume of modern verse. We do not say that the poems do not deserve such editions; many of them do; but "second and subsequent" editions in these days are only accorded to very great merit or good luck. Still we will hope that the sanguine Bristol Times and Mirror may be right. Bristol, if well roused, might itself swallow an edition, for ever since the days of Amos Cottle Bristol has loved the Muses. Mr. Wyville Home certainly knows how to write, and chooses good subjects for his poems. But the real question for the critic is, admitting that he can practise all the delicate devices which this age has been taught by the great masters of style that adorn it, does the writer show that he has the real stuff of poetry within him in addition to these graces of style? Can he reach from heaven some of that true fire of song with which to fuse his thoughts and make them take poetic expression? We think that the poem "On the Hither Side of Death" does in some degree show this power. The light is fitful, not sustained, but there is the true gleam of poetry. It is impossible here to do justice to Mr. Wyville Home's verse by quotation. Much of it is very harmonious, and it invariably shows itself the work of a scholar of fine sense. We hope that Mr. Wyville Home will continue to write, and that, if he does, his work will be in subjects idyllic and descriptive. His work, too, would be best in some measure of great resources which will bear infinite elaboration in beauty of cadence. Blank verse, the couplet, or the Spenserian, or octave stanzas, all afford excellent opportunities. In the present volume the blank verse is a little heavy and monotonous, but in the couplet a considerable success has been achieved.

Mr. Philip Bourke Marston is known as one of the lesser lights in the school which is called æsthetic, if that word is not obsolete yet. When Mr. Swinburne, Mr. Morris, and Mr. Rossetti began to delight the ears of men with their music of words, their first followers seemed themselves remarkable. But now so many men have got the seed that the mere exercise of a particular form of style is anything but an excuse for verse. Of rhymes like those of Mr. Bourke Marston it is not too much to urge "All Hampstead spins a thousand such a day." In truth, no amount of love for beauty, no power of rhythm, no cultivation or scholarship can make a poet. This seems too true to speak; but yet it is the only thing to say to those who write with such care as does Mr. Philip Bourke Marston. "Caught in the Nets" contains some good lines, but we cannot congratulate the author on his choice of the subject. The Merman is always a pleasant person in poetry, but we cannot help declaring that he becomes somewhat ridiculous when represented as he is in the passage which is prefixed to this poem:—

> A.D. 1180. This year also near unto Orford in Suffolk certain fishers took in their nets a fish having the shape of a man in all points, which fish was kept by Bartholomew de Glandeville in the Castle of Orford six months or more. He spake not a word; all manner of meats he did gladly eat, but most greedily raw fish. Oftentimes he was brought to the Church, but never showed any sign of adoration. At length not being well looked to, he stole to the sea and was never seen after.—Sir Richard Baker's Chronicle.

Certainly a most "delicate monster." The idea of the strange beast longing for his sea caves is perhaps poetic; but as much can hardly be said for his gastronomic feats. Mr. Bourke Marston, however, thinks differently, and we are told all about what the fish had to eat:—

> They gave me food, of which I was full glad,
> And strange it was, and sweet, so that I had > Some joy in eating it; and fish they gave,
> Dear fish that smelt and tasted of the wave.

We have not space to tell how the fish escapes, and how he is comforted "with damp and salt caresses." It is almost enough, however, to state that Mr. Marston contemplates such a terribly uncomfortable form of endearment, to show into what absurdities the verse-writer seeking originality may be led.

Britannus's "National Portent" is one of those rare books which bring unmixed pleasure to the reviewer. The poem is short, the print is large, and after its kind each line is a gem. The meaning of Britannus is at first hard to grasp; but after considerable pains and a minute perusal we have arrived at the following result. The poem is "supposed to have been found amongst the papers of the Rev. ——— ———, of Christ Church, Oxford," and to have been written by him in India. The reverend gentleman in the first line of the poem informs us that he had "a faithful friend" who rivalled all his young compeers, and was imbued with a "love for classic lore." The friend takes to affairs of State. One day the narrator finds him "in painful agitation and unrest," with a "lofty frown" "stamped upon his brow." "At night-time," exclaims the poor distracted gentleman, "I have had a fearful dream." This "vivid nightmare" is then described. The dreamer found himself in a high position in the State, but with his nature spoiled by ambition. Rebuffed by his friends, he has recourse to "vindictive wrath," and he proceeds to lead "a life of wild revenge." "A petty hatred towards a rival mind" then led him down to depths he most abhorred, and made him attempt, "with subtle Jesuitical designs," to destroy his country, solely because

> My rival wisely chose the nobler part,
> Nought then remained for me but to destroy.
> Thenceforward all that now I value most
> I laboured in my rage to bow it down.

Though his friends "cried shame," the unfortunate dreamer "sped more fiercely" on his mad career, till at last he was awakened from the dream, as he says himself,

> Or ever I had reached the final doom.

So ends the Dream. "Final doom" is good. We have been apt before to consider that the one redeeming feature in dooms generally was their finality. The dreamer goes on to explain to his friend that "not once or twice, but full three several times," the vision haunted him "wildly" in his "nightly dreams," and that it "moved him to a frantic state of mind." He protests against the cruel fate which was to make him "force on legislation in the teeth of wiser men," who at the same time "close their eyes for shame." The reverend listener is melancholy at this recital, but remarks that in case

> Thy mind should prove thee false to that degree
> I pray that friends more mindful of thy fame
> May save thee from a ruin worse than all.

We trust that the Premier will be duly edified by this effusion.

The Story of St. Stephen is a somewhat mystic poem written in an octosyllabic stanza. The cadence of the verse is not unpleasant, but the whole does not seem to rise above the usual level of poetry devoted to sacred subjects. Why sacred poetry should be, as a rule, so unsatisfactory is a difficult question. Mr. Collett's book does not suggest a ready explanation. The hymns and minor poems which follow The Story of St. Stephen are quiet and simple, but display nothing approaching originality or power.

Mr. Reid's Romance of Song is just one of those books that puzzle a reviewer. There is nothing in it that he can conscientiously praise. All he can say in blame is, probably, that the writer is not a poet. Such criticism is not very satisfactory to the critic, the public, or the author. Mr. Reid's intention to write as well as he can is so thoroughly honest that there is no necessity for strong language such as arises with the pretentious coxcombs of verse who flaunt their parchment covers and rough edges before the public. Mr. Reid does not appear to be a very young writer. Advice would be of no use to him. The birthday verses to a poetess are the best in the book. One stanza is decidedly good.

but the poem is unequal. Even Scotchmen, we should imagine, will find the poems in imitation of Burns very dull reading. The poem called The Romance of Song displays a knowledge of English literature of the kind which gets people into Sandhurst. Every poet has a phrase found for him.

It would be dangerous to tell "Lara" that he is not a poet. He might fancy he was a Shelley, and think that his poetry was abused because of his opinions. He would tell us that our criticism was worthy of our creed, and other withering little home truths. Now to make "Lara" fancy himself a Shelley is the very last thing that we want to do. We are afraid that such a position is quite unattainable by him. Secularism is "Lara's" creed, and he is the most dogmatic of sectarians. He is violently missionary. This does credit to his sincerity; but it does not make him a poet. We intend to criticize "Lara" simply on literary grounds; we will not, therefore, refer to the vulgarity and bad taste of his satires. Still we cannot help regretting this want of good taste, because some of the poems show a considerable amount of feeling and sense of the beautiful. People get over violent fits of atheism and secularism; real defects of taste are, we fear, things more hard to cure.

Lyrical Recreations contain usually more recreation for the writer than for the reader. So it is with Mr. Ward's book. American poets have achieved the questionable success of writing on unusually twaddly subjects in very smooth verse. There is, in truth, nothing to recommend Mr. Ward's best verses except their smoothness. To some of the inferior of his poems the criticism "easy, vulgar, and therefore disgusting," would be far more applicable than to Lycidas. We do not wish to say it is applicable, but the poem "In Fifth Avenue" comes very near it. The following stanzas are an example:—

> Though I forgave him he wanted still more;
> I scorned my vows to betray,
> But ordered him to be shown to the door,
> And moped no more that day.
> And I sometimes wish that this stupid life
> Might finish without delay;
> I'm a virtuous uncomplaining wife,
> But I mope the lifelong day.

Miss Sydney Lever collects a small volume of songs suitable for music. Many of them would make very pretty songs, and we sincerely hope that the musicians may adopt some of them. The words set to much modern music are quite intolerable. Miss Lever writes sense and grammar, and that is a great deal. "The Brocade Gown" would make a little drawing-room ballad such as young ladies insatiably desire to sing.

A poem about the Mendips may be enough to reconcile a few Somersetshire people to a volume of poetry, but the general reader will feel no such sympathy for the poem headed "Furze Blossoms late in Autumn." On the whole, Ella Cuthullin does not contain very much that is remarkable. The poem which gives its name to the volume is ambitious in design, but the writer is not capable of dealing adequately with his subject. The plot might serve for a tragedy. Many of the lyrical poems are smoothly written. One of the last in the book, called "Those Merry Walks Together," is not without a certain pleasant swing.

Mr. Edwin Waugh completes the issue of his works by the publication of his tenth volume. The book is well and clearly printed, and has a good many woodcuts. Of these the small are often pretty and attractive; the larger are, however, very dreary. The poems in the Lancashire dialect might be expected to be the best; but, though at least two of them are decidedly good, we do not feel sure that this is the case. Mr. Waugh seems a little inclined to let himself write twaddle just because he is writing in dialect. This is always a danger, for things are apt to look poetical and picturesque in their homely dress which, in truth, are not essentially poetic. "Come whoam to thy childer an' me" is a poem of a high order of merit because of its simplicity and directness, and hearty ballad swing. "Bonny Nan" is another song which has some of the true gold of poetry in it, though it cannot boast of any very careful finish, such as Burns shows to be quite compatible with the use of dialect. The occasional poems at the beginning of the volume show decided traces of the influence of Wordsworth, but there is little or nothing borrowed from more modern writers. Many of these little poems are written with considerable grace, and the language is harmonious and intelligible. Of these "The Moorland Witch" and the lines "To a young lady who lent me a book" are perhaps the happiest. We cannot but congratulate Mr. Waugh upon the good fortune that has allowed him thus to gather all the writings of his life together. He deserves such a reward for the simple sincerity of his work.

Mr. Whittier's new volume is prettily bound and printed. His name is a warrant for good taste and literary finish. This is the chief merit of the poems now before us. The ballad of The Bay of Seven Islands has many good lines in it, though there is an impending sense of the prosaic throughout. "How the women went from Dover," a tale of the persecution of the Quakers in New England, tells how two women were whipped through the villages, tied to the cart's tail. There is something of the ring of Mr. Browning's Rabbi Ben-Ezra in the poem. The Quaker women prophesy against their persecutors:—

> In the light of the Lord a flame we see > Climb and kindle a proud roof-tree;
> And beneath it an old man lying dead,
> With stains of blood on his hoary head.

"Godspeed" is prevented from being a very exquisite little poem by the form which makes it very nearly a sonnet, and yet not quite one. We have no objection to poems of fourteen lines which are clearly not sonnets; but the ear becomes so accustomed to the harmonious cadence of the true sonnet that its imperfect form always jars a little. Mr. Whittier does not make the proper break in sense after the quatrains. Altogether the poet's English admirers will find much to like in the present volume.

CARICATURES AND PORTRAITS.*

THE present volume contains a reissue, in a reduced form, of the famous series of portraits contributed by Maclise to the Fraser of 1830–38—the Fraser of Thackeray and Carlyle and Maginn. Of these there are some eighty, which number the editor, on his own responsibility, has increased by four: one, of Henry Hallam, produced for the series but never published; and three others—of Maclise, Thackeray, and Father Prout—from various sources. They are reductions, as we have said; but they suffer little or nothing by the process. Those that were excellent are excellent still. Those that were bad are no worse than before. In fact, their merits and demerits are the same as when Rossetti wrote of them. "No such series," he says, "of the portraits of the celebrated of any epoch, produced by an eye and hand of so much insight and power, and realized with a view to the actual impression of the sitter, exists anywhere." That is true of them now, as it was true of them twelve years and more ago. There is no doubt, too, that they are something more than unique: they are interesting and suggestive in the highest degree.

Before proceeding, however, to discuss them in detail, it will be well to deal with the "Memoirs"—eighty-four in number—in which they are "embedded and enjellied." The editor has thought fit to omit the notices by Maginn, in whose company they originally appeared, and to fill their room with notices of his own. "The context of Maginn," he judiciously observes, "brilliant as it undoubtedly was, contained much that was hasty, illiberal, and purely ephemeral; and, it was thought, might be omitted, at least in its substantive form, with advantage." Of the wild work done for the "Gallery of Illustrious Literary Characters," by the original of Thackeray's Captain Shandon, this is a description which, to say the least of it, does not err on the side of severity; but we cannot at all agree with Mr. Bates that its omission "in its substantive form" is advantageous. On the contrary, we hold that it was his duty, as a good editor, to republish Maginn with Maclise, the portraits with their original settings, the prose of Oliver Yorke—with its "all-too-Irish mirth and madness, and odour of pulled punch"—with the vigorous if somewhat dandified pencillings of Alfred Croquis. He might have annotated and corrected and explained as much as he liked. But he should not have hesitated for a moment to reprint the whole work, if only as a literary curiosity. To say that it "contains much that was hasty, illiberal, and purely ephemeral" is beside the mark. So do the Noctes of Christopher North; so do the Runnymede Letters of young Mr. Disraeli; so does journalism in general. The drunken and swashing humorousness of Oliver Yorke was a characteristic feature in the periodical literature of half a century ago; and that we are nowadays mim-mouthed and delicate of fancy is not a reason for suppressing, "in its substantive form," the work of a man who was neither the one nor the other; particularly when, as in the present instance, that work is indispensable to a right understanding of certain matter which has been deemed worth reproduction in its entirety, and to the elucidation and adornment of which it was originally appropriated. Maclise has merit enough of his own to be interesting—even remarkable—alone; but to get the whole flavour of his satire, to breathe a full breath of the air in which he produced it, to make ourselves as nearly as possible his contemporaries, we should have had him as he came, with Maginn behind him. The pictorial satirist, in fact, is not all himself in the banishment of the satirist in words. They complete each other: like the "deux pantalons" in which M. Hugo clothed a future dignitary of the Empire, > Dont les trous, par bonheur, n'étaient pas l'un sur l'autre.

They were reckless and truculent in their lives, and it is hardly fair to either that in their deaths the "substantive form" of the one should be divided from the "substantive form" of the other.

But where some editors would fear to tread, the present editor has rushed in, and produced a readable if imperfect and lopsided book. He has a sincere and undiscriminating affection for the men of fifty years back, and he writes of them with an enthusiasm, a disorder, a garrulity of style, an intemperance of insight, a "nice derangement of epitaphs," that are amusing in no mean degree. He is often wrong in his facts, and often merely imaginative in his criticisms; but his work has in it not a little of "fine confused good feeling." It is too bad of him, no doubt, to ascribe The Woodspurge to poor Mr. W. M. Rossetti; to claim for "bright, broken Maginn" what he calls "a proximate niche in the temple of fame with the great foregone masters" in his own peculiar style of writing—with Lucian, with Aristophanes, with Rabelais, and with Swift"; to write of an "alleged rejoinder" of Lamb (the italics are his own) that it is "full of ovine humour, and has so much of the bovine in it that it might well find a place among the stories in Miss Edgeworth's bucolic essay on Irish Bulls"; to talk of Lockhart's Roman novel as something "coldly and sternly classical, as a romance of Apuleius or Barclay." It is scarcely wise of him to think—in print, at all events—of the Laureate's famous attack on The New Timon as "poor stuff. . . . Weak, washy, and diffuse; much of it mere ab use, and the rest obscure and meaningless." It is hardly prophetic of him to opine that the late Lord Lytton was "the last literary man, of the present day at least, concerning whose place of sepulture a care will be felt." It is certainly peculiar of him to deal so freely in such luxuries of style as italics and small capitals, and in such gallantries of English as "hight," "circumforaneous," and "exiguity of bulk." But, for all this, and a vast deal more of the same sort, his work is singularly useful and amusing. He has gone grubbing among the dry bones of the epoch he loves until he has got to know more of it than he knows of his own. He has it as his fingers' ends; and he gossips and blunders and gives way to eloquence about it in a way that really disarms criticism. He is full of scandal about Queen Elizabeth and the Marquess of Hertford. He can tell you all about Crofton Croker, and L. E. L., and Westmacott (of the Age), and the amazing Lardner, and the excellent Jerdan, and a hundred little immortalities beside. He is not, it is true, shy of adducing the late Dr. Kenealy as a critical authority, or of keeping himself in countenance by an appeal to "Richard Oastler, who was his (Maginn's) companion in the Fleet." But to him who can quote from works so enchanting and recondite as "A Man of Fashion's" D'Horsay: or, the Follies of the Day, a great deal may be forgiven. Such a man is Mr. Bates; and students of manners and literature will find his book, for all its oddities and absurdities, as full of matter as an egg is full of meat.

The portraits themselves have been so often discussed that at this time it is hardly possible to say anything new about them. Some are admirable; others are poor indeed. The good ones, though, outnumber the bad. You have but to consider them to know a great deal about the men they represent. Here, for instance, is S. T. C.: querulous, a trifle deprecating, yet obviously full of words; the prophet of the soomjective and omjective of Carlyle's ironical vision. Here, in raiment of faultless cut, in an attitude of the utmost elegance, his head "sunning over with curls" (like the Laureate's Maud), with Oriental arms upon the wall, and a monstrous pipe, and a vast ottoman, is young Mr. Disraeli—"the wondrous boy who wrote Alroy"—handsome, exquisite, imperturbable: a kind of Dandiacal Apollo. Here is Morier, arrogant and loud: and Mrs. Norton, fastidious and superb; and Wordsworth, majestically parsonical, and D'Orsay, like one of Balzac's ideals—Rastignac, or De Marsay, or the incomparable La Palférine; and Robert Montgomery, as an inspired hairdresser; and Lady Blessington, in years, all dignity and charm, with Lady Blessington in youth, all grace and beauty and delightfulness, upon the wall; and Talleyrand, club-footed and withered, dozing to death beside the busts of the many rulers to whom he has paid his perjured fealty. Here are Rogers—hideous and shrewd and death-like as in life; Washington Irving—a kind of fairy man of letters; Hook—impudent and pert and loose-looking, a right professional ribald; Harrison Ainsworth—a pink of fashionable elegance and correctness; Bulwer—in the act of shaving, with extraordinary nobleness and vigour; Miss Porter—with the air of a mère noble; with a score of brilliant or eccentric appearances beside. Here, too, to take the other side, is Carlyle, in an attitude which suggests a poet's monument, with a lock of hair on his forehead, and a good hat in his hand, and the appearance of one to whom Æsthetic Tea is a necessity of life. Here, stooped and aged and suspicious, is Goethe, looking for all the world like some one who has found a halfpenny, and is about to pick it up, fearful of observation. Here is Scott, among his dogs, heavy, limping, lumpish, loutish, as unlike the "Shirra" as the author of Waverley. Here are Ude, a satyr with a ladle; and Cobbett, like a bad wax-work figure; and Hogg, like a tobacconist's Highlander; and Sydney Smith, like a Toby Fill-Pot jug. These last are hard to bear; but to forgive them we need only look at the others.

RECENT DIVINITY.*

THOSE who have read the first volume of Dr. Weiss's Life of Christ will probably want neither invitation nor incentive to read the second. The writer and his book have an individuality of their own. He is one of the most learned of German scholars, an earnest believer in Christianity, and a free critic of the Gospel narratives. In fact, he avowedly refuses to regard his faith as dependent on the invariable accuracy of Scripture. Not the less he is an ardent defender of the "historicity" of the Fourth Gospel against the criticisms of Baur and his disciples, and maintains that they have been definitely confuted. A few words as to the form of Dr. Weiss's work will show its value in systematizing the Gospel narrative. For readers are very apt, even when not reading it for devotional purposes, to miss the crises in the progress from the Cradle to the Cross. It is interesting to observe, as regards all the elements of material success, what a steady decline it was. Its stages are marked by one failure after another. He comes under the ban (curiously misprinted van in the table of contents) of the hierarchy in His earliest public days; after entering on His "period of conflicts" He encounters His first failure at Gerasa! He finds a fresh foe in the wealthier classes, who "cannot enter into His kingdom"; He is accused of employing Satanic agency in casting out devils; He finally breaks with the Pharisees (the popular and national party) after His denunciation of them, and with the hierarchy after their question about His "authority," and, last of all, alienates the sympathies of the multitude when they wanted to set Him at their head. The Gospels lose none of their devotional value by the historical realism which they acquire when a reader is able to mark the steps which led to the final catastrophe.

Professor Reuss's History of the Canon of Scripture is to be distinguished from his earlier work on the General History of the New Testament, and was written in answer to a request to translate that book into French. He thought its method and form unsuitable to French readers, and produced another volume entirely new. The best thing that can be said about Mr. David Hunter's translation of it is that it has very little of the flavour of a translation about it. Professor Reuss is another instance of a learned German whose orthodoxy, like Dr. Weiss's, is rather religious than dogmatic. He writes, as he says, as a historian, not as a controversialist, and therefore does not notice polemical writers on the other side, but leaves his facts to answer them. The line between the historian and the Christian is clearly marked in these pages; and it is, perhaps, due to these Christian prepossessions or convictions that he is so little inclined to dogmatize on a subject on which the extent of his reading might be thought to have given him very definite views. He feels uncertainty, on the limits of the Canon, and, while unable to accept the dictum that it is to the Church that we must look for its formation and preservation, seems to regard the maxim of the Reformers that "the authority of Scripture depends on the inward word of the Holy Spirit bearing witness by and with the Word in our hearts" as too vague and variable a test to serve as a basis for the definition of Canonicity. His own opinion is that the time is not yet come for science to draw its final conclusions; that inspiration has appeared, and still appears, in different degrees: that no formula can mark a distinction between the inspiration of all Christians and that of the sacred writers; that theology has no longer any interested motive in preserving the Canon intact, for it does not believe Christianity or the Church to be in danger because the Book of Esther is not put on an equality with the Epistle to the Romans. Theology, he thinks, must henceforth aim at a higher mark than drawing up a list of books, though he does not tell us in what other way a Canon is to be formed. Those who go to the author for an authoritative limitation of the Canonical books, therefore, will be disappointed; but the reader who desires to see all the available knowledge on this subject lucidly grouped by a writer who is a firm believer in inspiration, though he cannot define it, will endorse our recommendation of this volume.

Here is yet another volume on the inexhaustible subject of the personality of our Lord. The transition from the dry light of German analysis to the impassioned declamation of the Père Lacordaire is like passing from the crisp herbage and bracing air of the downs to the beauty and luxuriance of tropical vegetation. Yet, fervid and rhetorical as these orations are, they form a consistent argument, which occupies the whole of a volume of 417 pages. Stated briefly, the object of this argument is to combat the efforts of Rationalism to "destroy," to "pervert," and to "explain" the life of Christ; and the statement of the purpose of the volume is the explanation of its somewhat puzzling title. For the preacher divides his subject into three parts, represented by his threefold title, and devotes the first to a proof of the divinity of Christ, the second to an examination of the nature and work of God and of man, and the third to the intercourse between God and man, the need and the result of this relation. In calling these arguments proofs we are adopting the point of view of the preacher. They are satisfactory and convincing to a Christian reader, and they are more than this, for they give him new reasons for the faith that is in him. They are eminently Christian discourses addressed to Christians, and on a susceptible congregation gathered together in the nave of Notre Dame to hear the famous Lent Conférences of the eloquent Dominican must have produced a profound impression. The reader no doubt gets but a feeble echo of the emotions of the hearer, and is able to criticize what if he had heard he could only have admired.

But so many English people are familiar with Lacordaire's preaching that it is probably unnecessary to describe it. Most readers, as distinguished from hearers, will be inclined to think that he diverges too frequently and too far into the flowery paths of illustration, and it is impossible to sympathize with a good many of his rhetorical effects—we had almost said artifices—without his voice and presence to carry them off. Much of this failure, if failure there be, is possibly due to reading him in a translation, and this translation is not one of the best. Many things can be said in French of which the literal English gives a totally different meaning, and in sermons the translator's object should have been to find out what would have been the corresponding word in an English sermon, and not the dictionary equivalent. Lacordaire, for instance, is very fond of saying, "Ah! messieurs," but no one can imagine him saying to an English audience, "Ah! gentlemen." And there are worse faults; these two occur on the first page:—"Christianity is the greatest event which has passed in the world;" and such a string of words as this, "and yet once more consequently." And worse still and later on, Christ is called "the Eternal Verb." The sermon which will probably attract most attention is the one with the paradoxical title, "Mystery as the Object of Prophecy," in which the writer seems to us not so much to prove his point, as to prove the existence and beneficent effect of mystery. It is a subject in which he revels, and those who read the sermon on "The Need of Supernatural Intercourse" &c. will be inclined to class the preacher with the religious mystics. But, with all deductions, we frankly acknowledge the greatness of the preacher and of his sermons; they will be useful reading to English clergymen, and may encourage them to burst the limits of their hide-bound style; they need not be afraid of being led too far in imitation of their copiousness of illustration or effusiveness of sentiment. No such danger need be apprehended.

Mr. Bellett's volume of Biblical studies is one of a class of books which, with the best intentions, often does as much harm as good to the cause it advocates. He has set himself the task of finding fulfilments in the history of the twelve tribes of Israel of Jacob's famous prophecy about the destiny and character of his sons, in the forty-ninth chapter of Genesis. Such an examination of the Old Testament, conducted on the principles of literary criticism, might have made a useful and interesting little book, and would certainly have revealed some remarkable coincidences. But this is not a little book, but a solid volume of 336 pages, and the reason why it is neither a little book, nor, in our judgment, a good one, is the same—namely, that it is written with a purpose; a purpose, that is, other than to find out exactly what the Bible does say and omits to say. The author tells us in his preface that the Bible is its own best evidence, in which we entirely agree, but in which he appears not to agree; for all through his volume he is coming to its aid, as he thinks, and making passages seemingly remote from all such reference subserve his main thesis. And this bias, as might be expected, vitiates the book. It seems to us not only to have led the writer to the strained applications of Jewish events and words to the coming of the Messiah, but into a certain amount of special pleading in establishing the fulfilment of the Patriarch's prophecy in the fortunes of the several tribes. For instance, Jacob's prophecy about Simeon and Levi is twofold. "Instruments of cruelty are in their habitations," and they are to be "divided and scattered in Israel." No attempt is made, as far as we can see, to establish cruelty and violence as the characteristics of Levites, and some of the cases charged against Simeon are only common features of the warfare of all Israel, or are what look like nothing else but a twisting of the narrative to serve the writer's end.

The only ground, e.g., for saying of the mutilation recorded in Judges i. 7 that the Simeonites were "specially employed in, and perhaps suggested it," is that they were invited by Judah to join her in the campaign against Bezek, and the defeated king was mutilated. For anything that is said Simeon might have protested against it; Judah, at all events, took the lead in the war. So in the two cases instanced from 1 Chronicles iv. 39-43, the first has an exact parallel in the seizure of Laish by the tribe of Dan (Judges xviii. 27), and the second the justification of Samuel's order and example in the destruction of the Amalekites. There may have been features of exceptional ferocity in this tribe; but the extracts given do not prove it, and no imputation of the kind is made against Levi. On the other hand, the attempt to show that Simeon was scattered, as Levi undoubtedly was, must be regarded to have failed also. Certainly two of the passages on which Mr. Bellett relies either mean something quite different, or refer to two or three other tribes as well as to the one in question. In either case they are useless as proofs of a special fulfilment. It will surprise most persons to hear that Judith is adduced as an illustration both of the scattering and the "cruelty and violence," which is in her case modified into "ferocity and audacity." The writer is not sure of the site of Bethulia, where she lived, but let that pass; her residence in the small Simeonite colony would no more prove the dispersion of Simeon than the occupation of Laish proves the dispersion of Dan; and as for her "ferocity," she seems to have been regarded then as she is now—more as a popular heroine, a compound of Joan of Arc and Charlotte Corday, than an "instrument of cruelty." Similarly the author quotes 1 Chronicles vii. 4 to prove that Issachar was sunk in sloth and sensuality; but omits the following verse, which rather conflicts with his theory. He appears to us to be quite capable of writing a devotional work which would find acceptance with a considerable party in the Church, and also to have reading enough to produce some interesting historical exegesis of the Old Testament. May we advise him in future to separate the two, and not try to make historical inquiry subserve the end of devotional exhortation?

The Drummond Missal was described by the late Bishop of Brechin, and its Calendar stands first in his collection of Scotch Calendars. It is called the "Drummond Missal," from being in the possession of Lady Willoughby d'Eresby of Drummond Castle, and a description of it was written as long ago as 1787, after which date it was lost until 1861, when it was again discovered by the Bishop. It is a small quarto of 109 pages, and the character, according to Mr. Ramsay, its first describer, is not earlier than the Irish of the eleventh or twelfth century. The most noticeable points about this Missal are (1) Its omissions. Taking the Sarum Missal as a standard of comparison, the services for Christmas and its attendant festivals, those for Lent and Holy Week, and even for Good Friday, are left out. The "Proprium Sanctorum" is suppressed, and an unusually full "Commune Sanctorum" substituted for it. (2) The office for Trinity Sunday differs from that in any known Missal, possibly on account of the comparatively recent date of this festival. (3) Its Calendar of Saints is unusually full. (4) There are many peculiarities of spelling, especially in the names of Irish saints, of whom a long list is given. These appear to have been transcribed by some one who did not know Irish, and being all written in the genitive case, sometimes the Irish genitive, as Colmain for Colman, and sometimes in the Latin added no little to the difficulty of the editor's task. Hence the unusual number of more than four pages of "additions and corrections." In other respects the volume contains only what those who are familiar with such literature would expect. The editor (the Rev. G. H. Forbes) did not live to complete the work, which was carried out by his literary executor; and the result of their joint labours will be welcome both to the antiquary and the student of Western Liturgies. Even the student of human nature may find an interest in observing how the instinct of the Celtic race for personal veneration finds expression, in Gaelic verses, amid the Latin services of the Church.

Professor Sayce has written a book whose value is not to be estimated by its size. It is a much more important ally of religion than many more professedly religious books. The preface shows its character and the main results which have been arrived at by the laborious examination of records of the past. In answer to those who had determined that the sacred histories were as legendary as the early annals of Greece and Rome, "the stones cry out," and bear their unimpeachable witness to the fidelity of the Hebrew Scriptures. And not only have striking confirmations of plain statements been given by these mute witnesses, but obscure points have been cleared up. The frequent mention of Hittites in the Old Testament and the way in which they are mentioned have long been a puzzle to Biblical critics. They seem to point to a power which has left no history and could not be located. Now it is known by the "testimony of the rocks" that the Hittite Empire, from its seats of Carchemish on the Euphrates and Kadesh on the Orontes, contended on more than equal terms with Egypt before the Exodus, and carried its arms, its arts, and its religion to the shores of the Ægean. The victorious campaign of Assyria against Jerusalem (Isaiah x.) was another difficulty, for Sennacherib's invasion was a failure. It is now made clear that his father Sargon did invade and conquer the city and destroyed many of the inhabitants. Students of the books of Kings and Chronicles and Ezra have tried to account for the evident sympathy of Cyrus, King of Persia (as was supposed), with the Jews by the hypothesis that he was a Zoroastrian, and therefore a Monotheist. We know now on his own authority that he was a Polytheist, and that it was Elam and not Persia which invaded Babylon, as Isaiah foretold. The land of Goshen has been excavated, and Pithom the treasure city disinterred, and bricks made without straw found there. The instrument for bringing to light all this life of the past is the power of reading the cuneiform character. The ingenuity with which M. Grotefend hit upon the key, the important part played by the letter r in the process, and the patience from which he worked from this point to the conquest of the whole alphabet are interesting to read of. What will strike most readers is the curious "modernness" of the story of the Siloam inscription (discovered in 1881). It is strange to read that when Hezekiah made his conduit, the workmen began to dig at either end, as they did at the Mont Cenis Tunnel, but did not meet, though they were near enough together at the centre to hear one another's "picks."

THREE NOVELS.*

DURING a round of country visits the philosopher may find it amusing to observe the proportions of literature of various kinds among the books from the circulating libraries, and he will probably come to the melancholy conclusion that the average number of novels is in the proportion of nine to two; that is to say, the majority of country subscribers order three three-volume novels and two other volumes each time that they replenish their book-boxes. Here, therefore, we have before us what we may term one consignment of new novels.

We will begin with Ione, a novel by Mrs. Lynn Linton dedicated in most flattering terms to Mr. Swinburne. The heroine is not introduced until the end of the first volume, but when once she appears, she makes every other character pale into insignificance. Ione is of the type of woman known as the beautiful demon. This interesting but horrible character is drawn with great power. She is represented as so terrible that her wickedness might appear overdone if it were described by a less skilful artist; but as it is, although one would hope that there are few such women in existence, the reader never feels the character to be impossible. We have here a picture of the blackest side of human nature, but it is free from coarseness, cunning, and avarice. In most criminals the mental organization is more or less imperfect, and the nervous sensibility is weak: but Ione is exceedingly intelligent, and her nerves are strung to the highest pitch. Half English, half Sicilian, and born in disgrace, this beautiful child was brought up at Palermo, and her nature as a girl is compared to that of "Etna with its heart of fire ever ready to break forth in active storm and desolating tempest." In nine novels out of ten the description of the heroine may safely be skipped; but it is impossible to read that of Ione without interest. One of her first acts in the story is to kill her pet canary because it leaves her for a moment to fly to another girl, and she ends by killing her husband because he admits that he was once in love with another woman. The scene of the murder is horrible. As soon as the deed is done Ione kneels by the hearth, "her husband's lifeless body lying prone across her lap; . . . the lifeless head pressed against her bosom—the red blood over her dress and the firelight flashing over all:—it was a kind of infernal Pietà, where crime stood for sacrifice and the anguish of remorse for the agony of love." Presently, among the crowd that rushed in, came a man whom she dreaded. "He bent over her and touched her head and called her his love and his life, while his hot breath on her forehead seemed like the kiss of some demon straight from the hell—where she was going. Going?—where she was at this moment!"

It must be admitted that this novel is considerably padded, but Mrs. Lynn Linton's padding is better worth reading than that of some novelists. Ione can scarcely be called either a wholesome or a pleasant book, and yet it contains many amusing passages. There is a capital description of what may be called a professional invalid. There is a great deal about love-making, and there is much more about the quarrels of married people. The author evidently thinks that in matrimonial contests the ladies usually, if not always, get the best of it. After a grand flare-up between a husband and a wife, we are told that the former "felt as men do when they are defied by their wives—helpless, tongue-tied, and handfast." A good contrast is drawn between Ione's protestations that poverty with the hero will be perfect happiness, and her quarrel with his only servant five minutes after her arrival in her new home. Her attempts at domestic duties were not very successful. She "did a little dusting," and broke the chimney-piece ornaments; she "tried her hand at gardening," and "rooted out the seedling annuals in the borders"; and her only idea of economy seems to have been to buy new dresses to save the old ones.

She imagines that her hard-worked husband neglects her, and when, in order to satisfy her on this point, he offers to spend an afternoon with her, she immediately suspects that he merely does so because some other woman, whose opinion he respects, has been remonstrating with him. We are bound, however, to say that her husband was a prodigious fool; and, excellent as he is represented to be, he almost deserved to be murdered. The character of Theodosia, a spiteful married woman, whom Ione compared to a pretty rat, is very cleverly drawn. It would be difficult to imagine a person with a more venomous tongue; but we do not remember any novel in which there is more fire-spitting between women than in Ione. One question we may be permitted to ask. How did Ione kill her husband? The murder was committed in the dining-room after dinner. All we are told is that she "raised both her hands high in the air." Did she "brain" him with a decanter, and, if so, was it with the port or the sherry; did she slay him with the melon-knife, or did she strangle him with her dinner-napkin? A lady's naked fist could hardly kill a full-grown man. It would scarcely be a compliment to Mrs. Lynn Linton to call Ione her best novel, but it would be pretty safe to say that in many passages of Ione Mrs. Lynn Linton is at her best.

After the fire-eating ladies in Ione the four heroines of Quatrefoil are a change, if not exactly a relief. In the opening chapter an artist was "drinking in with delight the wild beauty of" Porth Mawr. Now the peculiarity of Porth Mawr was that "from week's end to week's end Porth Mawr lay lonely and lovely under the soft grey sky, through whose rifts the blue beyond seldom gleamed." "The half 'divine tear' dimmed" the artist's eyes. "For a moment he pictured to himself a disembodied spirit looking upon a scene like this"; why or wherefore we are not told; and then "a new phenomenon" "dashed from the shelter of the cliff into the sea." "Four slim, swift-footed, white-limbed sprites, lightly clad in purple (perhaps torn from the sea-cloud), and linked together, formed the apparition." These sprites were nothing more nor less than four young ladies in their bathing-gowns. It may shorten matters if we say that these four sisters lived near St. David's, and that, although they were nearly grown up, "a rare visit to Haverfordwest had been their nearest approach to seeing the world." Their mother had died when they were very young, and their father, a man of old family and moderate wealth, was a misanthropic old naturalist who shunned the society of his fellow-men. His daughters were brought up by an old servant, and they had little or no education, in the proper sense of the word, but they read some poetry and history on their own account, and in the matter of learning they appear, as far as they could, to have done those things that they ought not to have done, and to have left undone those things that they ought to have done. The principal amusements of the four sisters were as follows. Gwen, the eldest, loved reading, singing, and poetry; Erthin cared most for drawing; Moel, who was a clairvoyant, played a Welsh harp; and Ione, the youngest, was a naturalist. Running wild about the coast in scanty attire was a pleasure that was common to all of them.

Mr. Surcott, the artist, was not long in gaining the acquaintance and the friendship of the four wild beauties; and on the death of their father he persuaded them to go to London. After various adventures, they took a house furnished and decorated by Surcott; and the contrast between the life of these semi-savages on their native heath and in the metropolis is decidedly entertaining. Surcott was an artist of no ordinary reputation, and he had already immortalized the eldest of the sisters by painting her as Athene in one of the most famous pictures of that year's Academy. He was the recognized leader of the inner circle of the æsthetes, and he turned the sisters' house into a temple of sweetness and light, of which they were to be the priestesses and he was to be the prophet. Having carried out this little arrangement to his satisfaction, he bid the faithful enter and worship. The hard part of it was that he left the sisters to pay the bills, which were far from light, the tulips and lilies costing nearly two hundred pounds in a few months, to say nothing of the ices, the Chinese page, the embroidered portières, and the odds and ends from Japan. The exceeding unconventionality of the Welsh girls was looked upon as æsthetic virtue by the lily-worshippers; and certainly the eccentricities of these maidens in London rivalled those of Cetewayo himself. The situation is so amusing that an immense amount of fun might have been made out of it; but the author, after tantalizing us by leading us to anticipate a great deal of entertainment, disappoints us at the critical moment. She evidently has a great talent for conceiving original situations, but she does not yet appear to have learned how to make the most of them. The whole story has this fault—namely, that it begins brightly and ends flatly; the last part of the book is by no means the best, and the interest flags in the second half of the third volume. Indeed the novel begins like a feu de joie and ends like the going out of a paraffin lamp. It must be said, however, that Quatrefoil is eminently a book about which tastes are likely to differ; and, although we have criticized it freely, we admit its merits, and think that it will be much appreciated by certain readers.

Ralph Norbreck's Trust, like Red Ryvington, by the same author, is a novel which treats of manufacturing life. In both of these stories the hero is a manufacturer, and most of the leading characters are either manufacturers, or wives, sons, or daughters of manufacturers. Ralph Norbreck's Trust, however, is less political than Red Ryvington, and in this respect we much prefer it. The greater part of the first volume describes quiet life in a manufacturing district; the second is for the most part an account of life in Trinidad and Venezuela, and might almost be said "not to be novel at all"; and the third is all earthquakes and bloodshed. In most novels it is the second volume that is spun out, but in this instance it is in the early part of the first that the spinning takes place. Long descriptions are given of the characters and doings of people who die in the first half of the first volume, and one is almost inclined to think that the author, after intending to make them the chief actors in his drama, must have changed his mind, and killed off the first generation to make way for a second and a better.

When a thing is to be done at all, there is nothing like doing it well. Now we took exception to a certain hairbreadth escape in Red Ryvington as overstrained and impossible, but the hairbreadth escapes in Ralph Norbreck's Trust are so excruciatingly fine, and the agony is so awfully agonizing, that it becomes amusing. A tragedy at a small local theatre is often more amusing than a comedy, and it is where the tragic begins that Ralph Norbreck's Trust is most entertaining. Off the coast of Venezuela the hero was within an ace of being shipwrecked among a shoal of sharks. But this was nothing. After various adventures in Venezuela, the hero made friends with a native general, who took him to a certain river, and pointed out some of the objects of interest that swam therein. First, he called his attention to "scores" of crocodiles, remarkable for their ferocity—"great dirty yellow creatures, some of them twenty feet long." Secondly, he showed him some "hideous little fish, not more than seven or eight inches long, but furnished with jaws so powerful and teeth so strong, that they can nip off a finger at a snap, and cut through a piece of iron wire at a bite." These were the caribes colorados, who attack a man when crossing a river, in shoals, and bite him until he bleeds to death. Thirdly, he pointed out some tembladores, or electric eels, observing that, if the hero had the ill luck to fall into the water among them, he would never be able to get out again. Shortly afterwards he persuades the hero to ride a race for him, on his famous horse Castaña, a chestnut with a black mane and tail. It may possibly be objected that chestnuts with black manes and tails do not exist, but this we indignantly deny, for we distinctly remember possessing one many years ago in our Noah's Ark. Of course Castaña wins by any number of lengths. "The goal is reached and passed, the race won; but still Castaña goes on as if he never meant to stop, no more heeding his rider's efforts to pull him up than if he had been a horse of steam." This was all pleasant enough until his jockey saw before him the river gleaming in the sun. Now a "douse" in a brook is never agreeable, even in Leicestershire, but it would be still less inviting among "the demon horrors of the river—the crocodiles, the caribe fish," and the electric eels. He is now close to the brink, "the drop down into the water is at least fifteen feet, and on the opposite side he can see three or four huge crocodiles" waiting for him. "The next moment, he and his horse are flying through the air." Alas! unhappy man! "Then down they go, down to the very bottom of the river." At the very bottom we must leave him for a moment in order to explain what became of the crocodiles. The fact is that the black-tailed one plunged into the river with such a terrific splash that the crocodiles were frightened and decamped. But to return to the horse and his rider, who are "up again," and "bravely breasting the flood." Suddenly the horse "gives a violent snort, and throws his head back. A caribe colorado is hanging from his nostril." This is the more interesting because ordinary horses do not swim with their nostrils under water: but this was a chestnut horse with a black mane and tail. "Then another comes, and another, and two or three fasten on his neck," &c. Presently "Bertram feels a sharp pain in his thigh, as if a knife had been run into it. The fiends are at him now, the water is all stained with blood," and so on. However, to cut a long story short, the hero—with heaven knows how many caribe colorados hanging from his thighs, reaches the shore just in time to live, while his horse reaches it just in time to die. As soon as the hero's thighs were healed—we may remark in passing that he killed a man who tried to murder him during his convalescence—he went to explore the celebrated Miraflores mines; but when he had penetrated through the subterranean galleries, far into the mountain, a mighty earthquake, with "the most awesome sounds," brought down an avalanche of earth, which "obliterated every trace of the mines of Miraflores." After informing him that they were irrevocably buried alive, his guide fell on his knees and said that before he died he wished to confess that he had been hired to murder him in the mines. The assassin and his victim immediately became sworn friends, and after groping about for several days, they found their way to a cave, at the end of which they thought they could see a faint gleam of daylight. This, however, only proceeded from a narrow slit, through which it was impossible to pass, so they blasted with nitro-glycerine. As soon as their eyes became accustomed to the light, they found themselves not only free, but in what was probably the finest gold-mine in the world. But before regaining the haunts of their fellow-men, they had to cut their way through many miles of primeval forest, at the rate of a mile a week, feeding principally on monkeys and squirrels. We need only add that the villain of the story was tied to the back of an unbroken mustang, who was "forced to make a mad leap into the demon-haunted stream," among the crocodiles, the caribe colorados, and the electric-eels, among whom he perished miserably.

It will be observed that these three books have at any rate the charm of variety, and in a box of novels that is an important consideration. Whether they will please a variety of readers is another question.

PALMER AND LE STRANGE'S ENGLISH-PERSIAN DICTIONARY.*

THE late Professor Palmer's Concise Persian-English Dictionary, of which a second edition is announced, is one of the most useful books of its kind, and for practical purposes has superseded all predecessors. The present volume is its counterpart, and will doubtless achieve an equal reputation among travellers and others to whom a good English-Persian Dictionary has long been a desideratum. The ghastly tragedy at Wady Sudr unhappily deprived the work of its brilliant author's revision, and when we realize that a book of Palmer's needed another eye to see it through the press, the full force of our terrible loss in that last fatal expedition of the "Sheikh Abdallah" comes home to us with fresh poignancy, and we feel with undiminished sadness how irretrievable is the calamity. It is, however, a satisfaction to find that the work which was thus robbed of its rightful revision has found so competent and reverent an editor as Mr. le Strange, one of the translators of the Persian comedy The Vazir of Lankurán, who has spared no pains to render it as perfect and as worthy of its author as care and sound scholarship could avail. Indeed the MS. was in so unfinished a state that the editor's share in the work is large enough to entitle him to the distinction of being named joint-author. He has not only completed the task of reversing the Persian-English vocabulary, which was the foundation of the present volume, but has added many heads from other works, such as Mr. Wollaston's excellent Dictionary, and especially from his own repertory of conversational Persian. The result is as complete a list of words as any one can demand; while the virtue of conciseness has never been forgotten, and the neat little volume can be stowed away in a jacket pocket.

This conciseness has been gained by a very careful system of abbreviations, and by taking advantage of the Persian use of verbs compounded of the past participle with an auxiliary verb to combine the adjective and verb under one heading. For example, rishvat means "a bribe" and rishvat khurdan "to bribe"; both are given under one head in the form "rishvat (kh)." Thus are saved many useless repetitions. Another economy of space is effected by omitting all synonyms that are not likely to be sought for, or that can be easily and naturally found under their commonest form. "Nought," for instance, is omitted in favour of "nothing." Words that are of rare occurrence are also of necessity omitted; but we doubt if their absence will be noticed by one traveller out of fifty who use the book. A comparison of the heads under the letter N in the present Dictionary and in Mr. Wollaston's much larger work shows that the number of separate heads in the latter is more than double that in Palmer. But when we come to examine the additional words, we find that the greater number consist of participial and verbal forms which are included under a single heading by the admirable system adopted in the smaller work, and most of the rest are not likely to be required more than once in a lifetime, or possess synonyms that will immediately occur to the student. "Nag," for instance, does not occur in Palmer's list, because its equivalents are given under "Horse," which is much more likely to be referred to, and "To near" is omitted because people are more apt to look out "Approach." Such foreign words as Naïve, Nazarene, Nazarite, Noces, Nonchalant are, we think, properly excluded, and we very much doubt whether Mr. Wollaston's heads, Naturalist, Nauseousness, Nave, Nebulous, Necktie, Necromancy, Nepotism, Newswriter, To nettle, Niceness, Nick-nacks, Nook, Nolecole, Normal, Nothingness, Novelist, Nudge, and Nymph, which are the chief remaining additions, will be in much requisition by the student of Persian in Persia. Mr. le Strange has done well to set these aside, as well as such Persianized forms as Nihilist, which has no more right to be in a Persian dictionary than Kunservátif. We do not wish to disparage Mr. Wollaston's very useful and necessary work; but we must quote these examples to show by what means the author and editor of the new Dictionary have managed to reduce the word-list to its convenient proportions, and to prove that the process excludes little that is likely to be needed by the majority of students and travellers. Here and there, no doubt, we miss a word that is in tolerably frequent use; but it is generally to be made out by an obvious synonym or a simple combination. Altogether the conciseness has been obtained with great skill and with small sacrifice of completeness, and the volume is certainly the most handy and generally serviceable that has so far appeared. Mr. le Strange has wisely prefixed the Simplified Grammar of Persian which Professor Palmer compiled for Messrs. Trübner's series, and which is a clear and compact outline of a grammatical system that is peculiarly susceptible of such compression. We observe that on the vexed question of the v or w sound in Persian Mr. le Strange differs from Professor Palmer, and his adoption of the former letter in transliteration causes some inconsistency in respect to the former volume. Kúwat in the Persian-English becomes Luvveh in the English-Persian. As the sound is really between the two, as with the German w, there was surely no necessity for the change. But it is ungracious to find fault with an editor who has bestowed so much labour and learning to convert Professor Palmer's well-imagined but unfinished MS. into an admirable English-Persian Dictionary.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

AMONGST an unusual number of official documents—for example, Reports of the Secretary of the Interior extending over, or more properly belonging to, two or three distinct years—the only work of serious or permanent interest, the only one that can be said to have the character of literature, is the Twelfth Volume of the Geological Survey (1). The so-called Volume consists of two heavy, solid, closely-printed octavos of about five hundred pages each. The first deals generally with the Survey of the Territories of Wyoming and Idaho, and particularly with their geology and palæontology; the second is devoted to the Yellowstone National Park. The progress of civilization and settlement has been so rapid—the natural movement of population having been hastened or anticipated in some measure by political action respecting the Park—in a much larger degree by the opening of the Northern Pacific Railway—that the descriptions of five or six years back are now almost obsolete; and the reader who takes up the official account of the Yellowstone Park, perhaps the most magnificent national possession, as well as one of the greatest natural wonders, in the world, must bear in mind that the Survey was made in 1878, though the publication of its records only bears the date of 1883. It is not now true, we believe, that the Park, "as the only district unoccupied by troops, affords a refuge to hostile or rebellious bands of Indians," nor is it very likely that an exploring party, or even an ordinary band of tourists, should now be robbed of their animals and baggage in the midst of the great national playground. There are, of course, much briefer and more readable, if not more effective, descriptions of the Yellowstone Valley; and few even of the travellers who may meditate a visit to this most wonderful combination of what may be called the eccentricities of nature will care to study its particulars beforehand in a volume twice as thick and containing thrice as much matter as those of Mr. Froude or Lord Macaulay. The Park is now hardly less attainable than the Mammoth Cave; and the laws of demand and supply have called forth several guide-books, all of them, of course, deficient in that precision and certainty which nothing but reference to elaborate official maps, panoramas, and descriptions could have secured. As is often the case in America, apart from its conscientious minuteness and elaboration, rendering it intolerably and unreadably lengthy, the official Report is by far the best and most complete existing description, nowise less intelligible or interesting than any of its unauthorized rivals; and the reader who can skip judiciously may obtain from its sketches, photographs, pictures and panoramas a better idea of the real appearance of the scenery as a whole and of its individual marvels than from any other extant source. At the same time, we must observe that some of the illustrations, and especially the coloured ones, though better than could have been looked for anywhere else as mere appendages to an Ordnance Report, are far inferior in clearness and natural truth, as well as in beauty, to many—indeed to most—similar efforts of Mr. Hayden's artists. Contrasting the coloured representations of the geysers and terraces in the second part and of the Garden of the Gods, for example, in the first, with many other panoramic or local illustrations in previous volumes, we must pronounce them slovenly and tawdry. Less ambitious but incomparably better executed delineations of scenes almost equally wonderful and striking in everything except brilliance of colour may be found in several preceding volumes of the Survey. The surveying officials have done their special work, and done it thoroughly; in so far as they have failed, it has been in attempting something far beyond their proper functions. But the same public spirit and national liberality which has always marked the course of the Federal Government in bringing home to the people the character and appearance, the geology as well as the geography, the archaic as well as the existing natural history of their remotest possessions, the thoroughness with which every part of the Territories has now been explored, the pains and cost lavished on the publication of the information accumulated, forbid us to doubt that the authorities at Washington will in due time present the world with a volume worthy of their most striking national possession. The national sense, spirit, and indifference to expense which have secured the Yosemite and Yellowstone Valleys, in all their native beauty and grandeur, to the nation and to mankind at large, sacred from the disfigurement and free from the charges with which they were threatened by the greed of enterprising speculators, will surely give us ere long an adequate description of their wonders and beauties, as adequately illustrated as the resources of modern art will permit.

Dr. Chadbourne's work on Instinct (2) was originally given as a series of what are called the Lowell Lectures, in 1871, and soon afterwards published. The present is a second edition, somewhat improved and elaborated; but the length of time which has elapsed since the original publication, and the very limited circulation which, in so far as we know, the book has obtained in this country, may excuse us for calling attention to a treatise which, if not very full of new views or new information upon a subject minutely and incessantly discussed during the last twenty years, yet possesses in a high degree the merits of independent if not original thought, of painstaking labour, and, we believe, of conscientious accuracy. The author is familiar of course with the work of Mr. Darwin, Mr. Wallace, and their more eminent disciples, if he regards his subject from a different standpoint and in a more or less different light. The development of instinct in the lower animals, the marvellous perfection which it attains in grades of life by no means exalted, its relation to the reason which makes its appearance at a higher point, and which seems rather to supersede than to co-operate with or improve upon it, are among the most curious and interesting, certainly among the most complicated and difficult, of the manifold and infinitely complex problems involved in the theory of Evolution. The great teachers of the latter doctrine have of course studied this problem as deeply, and mastered it perhaps more completely, than even a specialist like Dr. Chadbourne. But the peculiar interest of the present work is that it regards the general subject from the specialist's standpoint; considers Evolution in the light thrown upon it by the history of instinct, rather than instinct as one branch of the great work ascribed to Evolution and Natural Selection. Whether their view be right or wrong, those who like Dr. Chadbourne point out the appearances of consistent and persistent design underlying the marvellous developments of instinct—a wisdom far higher than the highest reason of man directing creatures seemingly devoid of reason to the fulfilment of all necessary functions, the performance of all duties necessary to the preservation of the individual or the race, without the slightest knowledge on their part of the objects to which their actions are directed—contribute in no small degree to the ascertainment of the truth; and those who most differ from them will, in proportion as they are candid and conscientious, be thankful for the criticism which forces them to consider their own discoveries and inferences in another aspect, and to account on Evolutionary grounds for these things whose evolution is least easily conceived or understood. Mr. Darwin assuredly, with his unrivalled fairness, moderation, and justice of temper, would have considered a work like this with patient and respectful attention; and nothing would have been more interesting than to read his remarks upon a collection and representation of facts obviously intended, if not to challenge his conclusions, yet to throw doubt upon some of his assumptions, and to question here and there the correctness or sufficiency of his arguments.

Dr. Winchell's World-Life (3) is a much more ambitious, but not necessarily more valuable or more instructive work. "Comparative Geology" is hardly, perhaps, a correct sub-title. The author's object seems to be to combine the results of astronomical and geological research into a series of cosmogonic speculations. He occupies the ground which may be called either the borderland or the common possession of both sciences; discusses the actual or possible, the probable or proven effect of laws belonging to astronomy in the geological province; the influence, for example, which the Earth, through a tidal attraction far more powerful than that of her satellite, may have exercised upon the Moon in the earlier stages of planetary existence. The author's speculations are carried further perhaps than prudence would have permitted, certainly lead him to conclusions which do not altogether accord with the received doctrines either of astronomers or geologists. His estimate of the time which has elapsed since the last glacial epoch, and his views of the probable constitution of the exterior and inferior planets incline rather to those of Whewell than to those of more modern and more thoroughly informed men of science.

Mr. Wheeler's Course of Empire (4) is a favourable specimen of a class of works especially American, a species of text-books not unknown in this country, but which beyond the Atlantic often come from writers of some pretension, and aspire to satisfy a real popular demand, if not to fulfil any true requirement of sound and thorough education. They endeavour to give in short space, in a compact form, and, as it were, already digested, so as to save the reader trouble in mental assimilation, what the author would call the substance or outline, what with scholars passes at best for the merest smattering of human knowledge upon subjects of which men may endure to be ignorant, but of which it is hardly profitable to acquire a shadowy, pretentious, confused idea. Mr. Wheeler's work does not pretend to be a text-book of universal history, rather repudiates the pretension; but if it be not intended to save the reader the trouble of studying for himself the history of Greece or Rome, of mediæval Italy, Spain, and France, of all that preceded and indirectly brought about the discovery and settlement of the New World, it is difficult to understand why such résumés of Athenian and Spartan, Roman and Carthaginian, Spanish, French, and English wars and revolutions should have been given. It is not of course from a single volume, or from half a dozen such volumes as this, that an American or English schoolboy of sixteen can acquire that coherent view of human history as a whole of which even the cultivated American is too commonly and too contentedly ignorant. What the present work may do is to bring home to the reader the fact that civilization has a connected history which goes back further than the earliest trustworthy annals of Rome or Athens: that Greece in the first Olympiad was in possession of arts and laws, of a polity and a social development which had not grown up on Grecian soil, but had been the slowly-matured fruit of centuries of Egyptian and Assyrian civilization, of despotic statesmanship, priestly science, before Athens or Sparta, perhaps before Mycenæ or Argos, had been heard of. Mr. Wheeler, moreover, has learned and keeps constantly before his reader's mind the continuity of European history—the real character of that "deluge of barbarism" which till lately was supposed to have submerged for nearly a thousand years the laws, the arts, the arms, and the Empire of Rome. It is something to do this, even in aiming at very much more and failing to achieve it. It is something to bring home to the fifth-form English schoolboy, and to that vast majority of Americans who never pass beyond his standard, the truth that the Roman Empire, Roman law and civilization, did not come to an end in the fifth century after Christ; that the direct successors of Constantine preserved the tradition, the jurisprudence, the arms, and the arts of the earlier Empire till not long before the discovery of America; and that, in the belief and feeling of the age at least, the Western Empire endured unbroken till a still later period; that Joseph II. was not only in his own opinion and that of his subjects, but by the admission of European diplomatists and historians, the lineal successor of Augustus no less than of Charlemagne. In the recent history of France we see what practical influence for evil may be exercised by the sheer historical ignorance which imagines that between Constantine and Louis XVI., if not between Cæsar and Napoleon, there was nothing worth preservation or even remembrance; that modern life, politics, and civilization are a new creation, owing nothing, except what the mimics of the French Revolution may have consciously borrowed, to Rome, old or new; and we are not sure that the same idea is altogether without political influence beyond the Atlantic.

Mr. Drake's "New England Legends" (5) are truly described;

(2) Lowell Lectures, 1871—Instinct; its Office in the Animal Kingdom and its Relation to the Higher Powers in Man. By P. A. Chadbourne, LL.D., Author of "Relations of Natural History" &c. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1883.

(3) World-Life; or, Comparative Geology. By Alexander Winchell, LL.D. Chicago: Griggs & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1883.

(4) The Course of Empire: Outlines of the chief Political Changes in the History of the World. By Charles G. Wheeler. Boston: Osgood & Co. 1884.

but of true folk-lore New England is necessarily devoid, or what she has thereof is Indian not English—consists of relics borrowed, and necessarily perverted in the borrowing, from the history or traditions, the mythology or the fairy-tales, of a race which has no relation, save that of locality, with its successors. Three hundred years afford time for the growth of local legends such as have found poetic expression in Longfellow's Evangeline, and in several versified narratives less ambitious and elaborate, perhaps, but not less touching or interesting, told by poets like Lowell and Whittier. But these legends have for the most part a solid, ascertainable, historical foundation. A few of them may be mere fictions, localized by the fancy of the original inventor, or the imagination of later generations. But, as a rule, such stories as Whittier has told of the Maceys and the Quaker maiden sold into slavery, or of the double snake, and Mr. Longfellow of Paul Revere's Ride, are genuine historical incidents, embellished no doubt by tradition, though less perhaps than by conscious poetical license. The same may be said of Skipper Ireson's Ride; indeed, of Mr. Whittier's narratives, the most purely mythical is one of the most recent, the story of Barbara Frietchie. And in a collection of legends so-called, the hideously truthful story of the witchcraft persecutions should hardly have found a place. There is nothing legendary or mythical about it; the alleged crime of the unfortunate victims was, of course, purely fictitious, the savage, senseless cruelty of the rulers, the half-criminal, half-insane credulity of the people, the brutalities inflicted upon the innocent and helpless, are among the best authenticated as among the most disgraceful incidents of the dark ages of New England Puritanism.

One of the most sensible and instructive of the volumes on our list is perhaps the smallest and least pretentious. In setting forth What Social Classes Owe to Each Other (6) Professor Sumner has enforced in very few and very simple words some of the most important and most neglected principles of political and social economy; has exposed, with temperate but none the less telling sarcasm, the most absurd but not least popular crotchets of modern philanthropic enthusiasm. The schemes of modern social reformers may, as the Professor says, always be reduced to this type—that A. and B. decide what C. shall do for D. In one practical lesson, in one obvious, realistic, every-day instance after another, Professor Sumner illustrates the philanthropic eagerness of A. and B. to benefit D. at some one else's expense; and maintains, with an earnestness sometimes ludicrous, sometimes pathetic, but always effective, the rights of C., "the forgotten man," as he is not inaptly styled; the taxpayer, the ratepayer, the thrifty capitalist, the hard-working farmer, who is burdened, fined, made to pay double prices for the benefit of the idle or the vicious, the ignorant, the wilful, and the foolish. The clamorousness of selfish, separate, limited interests, of charity-mongers eager to win cheap credit for liberality to the poor at the cost of the industrious and thrifty; the silence, the patience, and the unfair treatment of the great majority of average honest, self-regarding men who mind their own business and bear their own burdens, have seldom been set forth more truthfully and effectively. As applied to an older society and a more crowded country there might be a certain hardness, if not in Mr. Sumner's principles, yet in some of his conclusions; as applied to America, where no one with fair bodily health and strength need be poor unless he chooses, his severest strictures may well be strictly and literally just. Perhaps the most telling of a hundred phrases, so true that they have the sound of paradox, is this—"Now we never can annihilate a penalty. We can only divert it from the head of the man who has incurred it to the heads of others who have not. A vast amount of social reform consists in just this operation."

The Magazine of American History (7) deserves something more than a passing notice. It consists of a series of papers, monographs on historical topics or historical documents rendered available by republication, throwing no little light now and then on obscure or forgotten facts, oftener on imperfectly known or inaccurately explained features of general or local institutions, whose origin and meaning has been overlooked or misrepresented. Such, for example, are the papers on the "Cincinnati," almost the only Order which has ventured to defy American legislation, and feeling stronger than legislation, against class or hereditary honours; and, again, an essay on the geographical nomenclature of Louisiana, showing how French and Indian names have been corrupted into the strangest, most meaningless or vulgar English, often into grossly offensive or ridiculous slang: as, for example, "Choupicach" (Indian for muddy) was corrupted by the French into chou-pique, which in its turn has been corrupted into "Shoe-peg"; as the Choctaw, Funna Louach (burnt squirrel) has been turned into "Funny Louis," "Bacchanals" into "Bag-o'-nails," Carencro into "Carrion Crow," and Petit Bois into petits pois, translated Pea-island. The better known "Grand Gulf," again, is Grande Golphe, "big whirlpool."

Mr. Hamilton's Mexican Handbook (8) contains a good deal of incidental information respecting the various resources, races, and climates of the unhappy country which the Monroe doctrine and Mr. Seward's vindictive hostility to the French Empire deprived of its last apparent chance of civilization and decent government. Enough is told to suggest why the vast mineral wealth of the country remains almost undeveloped, why even its agriculture scarcely deserves the name of industry, and why under a republican government a people in some small measure Spanish, in a larger degree mongrel, but mainly Indian, has no chance either of liberty or order. But the civilized world knows little and cares little for Mexico; and Mr. Hamilton's fragmentary descriptions of haciendas, ranchos, and mines, decaying towns and semi-barbarous tribes, are neither clear nor coherent enough to enlighten the almost absolute ignorance of his European readers.

Mr. King's so-called Dictionary of Boston (9) is in fact a guide-book alphabetically arranged.

Was it worth while to publish a new account of the well-known story of Abelard and Heloise (10), even if it were worth while to give the lady's letters to the American public in a translation? Or was it necessary to publish or republish in the form of a pamphlet a very ordinary review article upon Miss Austen's Novels (11)?

Of fictions, short and long, A Woman of Honour (12), Vagabondia (13), and The Mate of the "Daylight" (14) are, in their several ways, fair average specimens. A Year of Sunshine (15) is a kind of birthday-book. Mr. Aldrich's Mercedes (16), a prose drama, and the accompanying lyrics, will of course find a certain number of readers in right of the author's reputation. Mr. Abbey's City of Success (17) is hardly likely to achieve for him even the limited popularity of Mr. Aldrich.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

READERS of Mr. Kinglake's famous and vivid account of the Coup d'état of the 2nd of December (1) may feel a certain shock at seeing an account of it written with much calmness, and at the same time an entire freedom from anything that can fairly be called impudence, by the only survivor of the chief contrivers of the event. The Prince President is dead, and Morny is dead, and "Fialin, called Persigny," and "St.-Arnaud, formerly Le Roy." But M. de Maupas, the suddenly created Prefect of Police, whose skilful and ingenious measures effected what was for the moment, and might have continued to be, a bloodless revolution, is very much alive, though also very much forgotten. He has reminded the world of himself to some purpose in this volume, which is written in a spirit to which no fair-minded man can object, and which makes points against M. Victor Hugo's somewhat poetical account of the matter, and more against the much-discussed publication known as the Mémoires de M. Claude. It would perhaps have been better if M. de Maupas had cut short his general reflections on the Second Republic and his reasons for lending himself to a plot against it; but in an apologia something of the kind was to be expected. With regard to the actual coup, M. de Maupas certainly seems to show that he arranged it very cleverly, and that the victims submitted in a fashion by no means savouring of heroism. As for the unnecessary bloodshed which followed, and which, much more than the overthrow of a Republic pour rire, excited the indignation of Europe, he produces documents certainly proving, if they are genuine, that General Magnan and the military were alone to blame, and that the former distinctly and explicitly refused to take the measures to prevent it which he, M. de Maupas, recommended. There are some interesting incidental criticisms of the Empire and its prominent men; but as more is promised, and the present volume deals directly only with the Deux Décembre, it would be premature to discuss them.

A short but interesting tractate, by M. Léon Say (2), deals with the system of country banks lately established in Lombardy and neighbouring districts. The efficacy of these institutions in rescuing the small cultivator from the clutches of usury is not doubtful. And, though it would be too much to say that the opposite evil of an undue extension of credit is unknown, there is equally little doubt that it is far smaller than that whose place it takes.

If any one desires to possess the famous "Voyage extravagant"(3) of the Paris Correspondent of the Times in a very neat form, admirably printed, and handy for the pocket, M. Plon has given him the opportunity. To English readers, perhaps, the loss of the incomparable lingo in which M. de Blowitz writes, or his employers on this side the Channel translate, his telegraphic lucubrations, may be somewhat severe. But men like M. de Blowitz are not of or for one country alone; and the French version here agreeably presented gives the reading public of Europe what was originally given only to those few Britons who can read and enjoy the lingua Britannica secundum Iordizium.

M. Ladreyt's essay on French and American education (4) (which might perhaps better be called an essay on American education with special reference to France) obtained, we are informed, a considerable prize in the competition instituted a few years ago by M. Isaac Pereire. It certainly is not intrinsically without merit. The author starts with some rather irritating commonplaces. But when he gets well into his subject it becomes evident that he is at home in it, and can speak sensibly about it. The sketch of the actual state of education—primary, secondary, and higher—which fills most of the book, is apparently accurate, and is certainly very readable and clear.

It is always a pleasure to note M. Jouaust's issues in his various collections of French classics. We have now before us the always welcome Souvenirs de Madame de Caylus (5) in the "Bibliothèque des dames," and in the "Petits classiques" a selection from Fontenelle (6), which deserves something more than a mere mention. Corneille's accomplished nephew has had less than his share of the extraordinary energy which French publishers have of late years bestowed upon standard French literature; and any one who wishes to make acquaintance with his work has to wait till the second-hand booksellers can pick up one of the old copies in ten or a dozen volumes. Therefore he is specially welcome and recommendable in this fine new coat, even though there is but a small part of him here. The Dialogues of the Dead, the Plurality of Worlds, and a few Eloges are introduced by a preface from M. J. F. Thénard, with which there is no fault to find except that it might have been a little fuller of fact. Perhaps, also, M. Thénard might have done better to follow that best of all selections, Genin's Diderot, in giving numerous short extracts from the works not printed at large.

Not many pleasanter gift-books have been issued this year than the little story, but goodly volume, which "Quatrelles" has written and M. Eugène Courboin has illustrated (7), partly in black and white, partly in gorgeously coloured examples of a kind of aquatint. How Mme. de Gai-Fredon was left a widow just at the time of the glorious days of June; how she set out for a mysterious and reputedly haunted country house which formed part of her very scanty jointure; how she was supposed to be the Duchesse de Berry in disguise, and was the subject of attentions equally embarrassing from many police officers and several gallant Royalist gentlemen; how she had to stand a siege in the haunted house, and how everything ended happily, MM. Quatrelles and Courboin tell with pen and pencil in a highly satisfactory manner.

SPEECHES from THUCYDIDES, translated into English for the use of Students; with an Introduction and Notes. By HENRY MUSGRAVE WILKINS, M.A. Fellow of Merton College, Oxford.

"A very scholarlike and readable translation of a most important Author."—ATHENÆUM.

"A translation which, whether we regard the accuracy and skill of its exegesis, or the ease and fluency of the style, is thoroughly admirable, surpassing not only previous translations of the same Author, but we may almost say all classical translations in the language."—SPECTATOR.

"Undergraduates and sixth-form fellows will find a godsend in the scholarly work of Mr. WILKINS's. Older heads that still retain their Greek, will recognize its combination of critical with translational matter, and will derive pleasure as well as instruction from its very thoughtful and well-reasoned introduction. And last, not least, English readers, though quite unable to comprehend the niceties of Greek construction discussed in the foot-notes, will get from it a capital notion of these far-famed speeches.....Mr. WILKINS's exact scholarship has of course led him duly to estimate the immense force of such connecting particles as γάρ, εἰ, &c.; and, as far as our examination serves, we should say that no former translation has come anywhere near his in the case, as well as accuracy, with which these are made to exert their influence on the sense.....For a clear insight into the whole question of the authenticity of the speeches, we know not where to direct the student to abler or more concise assistance.....Of his success in catching not only the mind but the antithetic manner, where he chooses, of his Author, we could produce many instances; and his general execution is immeasurably more spirited than even that of Mr. CRAWLEY."—CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

THE STORY OF

CHINESE GORDON.

By A. EGMONT HAKE.

Demy 8vo. with Portraits and Maps, 15s.

"The story of Chinese Gordon's life, full as it has been of adventure and stirring incident, cannot fail to appeal to a wide circle of readers. Very few men of our age have held so large a place in public consideration as he has, both for his lofty courage and for his honesty of purpose, while his achievements in China have obtained a durable place in history.....So far as his career has yet run, Chinese Gordon, who is now a Major-General in the Royal Engineers, will be remembered for two episodes, the Taiping rebellion and the governorship of the Soudan. His biographer shows that his private life has been the counterpart of his public career. Devotion to duty has been his motto throughout, and, if his extreme dislike to be praised and his over-anxiety to hide himself and his actions from the world have sometimes misunderstood, they are the natural accompaniments of his simple but lofty character. The age of heroes has long gone by, but so long as Chinese Gordon is with us there will be a living type of the qualities which were, and must always be, heroic."—Times.

THE NEW LUCIAN; being a Series of Dialogues of the Dead.

By H. D. Traill. Demy 8vo. 12s.

"Mr. Traill's book is one of the happiest contributions made by modern literature to the politics of our day."—Daily Telegraph.

"The book is undeniably clever."—Athenæum.

"There are dialogues in it which reveal a vein of the best of Walter Savage Landor's."—Spectator.

Memoirs of Sir W. Siemens, Sir H. Bessemer, Sir J. Whitworth, & Sir J. Brown, and other Inventors. By William T. Jeans. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"That steel has had a remarkable history no one will doubt after reading this attractive volume by Mr. Jeans, who evidently writes from talent and acquaintance of knowledge..... We have no space to deal exhaustively with Mr. Jeans's volume, and will therefore content ourselves by adding that it deserves a wide circulation."—Times.

A HISTORY of ART in CHALDÆA and ASSYRIA.

By Georges Perrot and Charles Chipiez. Translated by Walter Armstrong, B.A. Oxon. 2 vols. royal 8vo. with 452 Illustrations, price 42s.

"It is profusely illustrated, not merely with representations of the actual remains preserved in the British Museum and the Louvre, but also with numerous conjectural representations of the way in which this ruined architecture was built. To English students of the original and collections of Assyrian antiquities presented to the British Museum the volume presents much interest.....We may point out that an English translation by Mr. Walter Armstrong, with the numerous illustrations of the original, has just been published by Messrs. Chapman & Hall."—Times.

HOW WE DEFENDED ARABI and HIS FRIENDS: a Story of Egypt and the Egyptians.

By A. M. Broadley. Demy 8vo. Illustrated by Frederick Villiers, &c.

ALARIC WATTS: a Narrative of his Life.
By his SON.

Associated with the Literature and Art of the first half of the century, the "Life of Alaric Watts" will be found to contain interesting and valuable facts, reminiscences, and correspondence hitherto unpublished, of and concerning his friends among the poets and painters of that day—of Coleridge, Wordsworth, Southey, Hood, among the former; of Leslie, Constable, Etty, De la Roche, Ary Scheffer, Devoria, among the latter.

THE GIRL of the PERIOD; and other Social Essays. By Mrs. LYNN LINTON.
2 vols. 21s.

"Perhaps it may seem odd to speak of sermons in connection with anything sparkling; but persons who will not go and hear sermons because they are afraid of being bored, can obtain both instruction and edification from Mrs. Lynn Linton's essays. It is true that she is often irresistibly amusing, but amusement is not the only object of her trenchant essays. He or she must be an obtuse reader who can peruse the whole of them without recognising the fact that they depict with rare felicity, and almost unapproachable ingenuity, the failings and the virtues of all sorts and conditions of people."—Figaro.

Ready this day, the Second Edition of the Reprint of

THE PRIVATE LIFE of MARIE ANTOINETTE, QUEEN of FRANCE and NAVARRE. With Sketches and Anecdotes of the Courts of Louis XIV., XV., and XVI. By Madame CAMPAN.
An entirely New and revised Edition, with Additional Notes. Second Edition of the Reprint, 2 vols. with 18 fine Illustrations on Steel, 30s.

"Madame Campan's position was undoubtedly unsurpassed for this process of collection, holding from an early period the position of first lady-in-waiting to the beautiful and much-maligned Queen Marie Antoinette, and moving all her life in those Court circles where, for good or for bad, history is formed by the fashions and follies of those surrounding the throne."

WINIFRED POWER. By JOYCE DARRELL,
Author of "The Sapphire Cross." 3 vols.

"This is a novel of a very superior kind in some respects, especially as regards the unexceptionable style of writing, the grasp of character, the [illegible] of certain conceptions, the diversity and clever discrimination of the portraiture, the [illegible] round of pathos, the purity of tone, the worthiness of the lesson that is taught."—St. James's Gazette.

THE MILLIONAIRE. By LOUIS J. JENNINGS,
Author of "Field Paths and Green Lanes," "Rambles among the Hills," &c.
3 vols. crown 8vo. 25s. 6d.

"The Millionaire is the romantic figure par excellence of the nineteenth century. Mr. Dexter File, the American millionaire of the story before us, is a decided success. We follow his doings with unflagging interest. To the story we have little but praise to give."
Pall Mall Gazette.

"Where the author breaks new ground is in America, with the railroad beings of New York and the lobbyists of Washington; the character of Dexter Fiske is wholly fresh and wonderfully interesting. The book throughout is smart and racy."—World.

"'The Millionaire' shows much ability. It is never dull. No just idea of its merits could be given without saying it is a novel of a high order, and a piece of excellent workmanship."—Athenæum.

This day is published.

READINGS in RABELAIS. By WALTER BESANT. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

THE ENCYCLOPÆDIC DICTIONARY

An Entirely New and Exhaustive Work of Reference to all the Words in the English Language, with a full account of their Origin, History, Meaning, Pronunciation, and Use. With numerous Illustrations.

Amongst the distinctive features of THE ENCYCLOPÆDIC DICTIONARY are:

1. Its thoroughly encyclopædic character, the "Encyclopædic Dictionary" being not only a comprehensive Dictionary, but also a complete Encyclopædia to all branches of knowledge.
2. Its comprehensiveness and its wideness of range, the work embracing not only modern words, whether of an ordinary or of a technical and scientific nature, but also all obsolete words and phrases to be met with in the works of English writers from the thirteenth century to the present day.
3. The history of each word and the historical and logical development of its various meanings and uses.
4. The fulness and completeness of the illustrations and quotations, the value of which is materially increased by the fulness and exactness of the references.
5. The treatment of the etymological portion of the work in accordance with the results of the latest researches in Comparative Philology.
6. The exactness and clearness of the pronunciations.
7. The large increase in the number of words registered, which is shown by the following estimate of the number of words appearing in well-known Dictionaries:—

Johnson's Dictionary, Todd's Edition	58,000
" " Latham's Edition	63,000
Webster's Dictionary (American) Early Edition	70,000
Worcester's Dictionary (American) and Supplement, recently published.....	116,000
Webster's Dictionary (American) and Supplement, recently published	118,000
The Imperial Dictionary, New Edition	130,000
The Encyclopædic Dictionary.....	150,000

8. The numerous pictorial illustrations which, although eminently artistic in character, are in no sense mere embellishments, but in every case help to elucidate the text.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL LIBRARIES.

AGNES MORAN: a Tale of Innocence and Experience. By THOMAS A. PINKERTON. 3 vols.

"Mr. Pinkerton's power of delineation marks him out prominently from the crowd of novel-writers. His group of boys and girls are real and consistent—they grow, but upon the lines the sketcher laid down for them; and although the plot which involves them is elaborate, it is clear and intelligible."—Daily News.

"The author has a real interest in his characters; some of them are hasty sketches; he seems to have lived with them all, and has succeeded in imparting an air of reality to them."—Academy.

TAY: a Novel. By the Rev. W. O. PIELE. 1 vol.

"A delightful story, and very far above the level of ordinary novels. The author has quick perception and a large fund of humour."—Whitehall Review.

"'Tay' has much variety, and is worth reading."—Academy.

THE JEWEL in the LOTOS. By MARY AGNES TINCKER. With 5 Illustrations, 7s. 6d.

"This novel has very considerable merit. It is a story in which there is a good deal of adventure, there is much of genuine feminine sweetness and tenderness, and the reader will not fail to be greatly interested in it. As a good story in one volume this novel may be strongly commended."—Scotsman.

LONDON: WM. H. ALLEN & CO., 13 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

NEW WORK BY MR. HENRY GEORGE.

SOCIAL PROBLEMS. By HENRY GEORGE, Author of "Progress and Poverty." Crown 8vo. cloth, 8s.

"A new work by the author of 'Progress and Poverty' is certain to secure a very large number of readers.....Mr. George is beyond all question a writer of very remarkable power. His style is rich, vigorous, eloquent, incisive.....No one can deny the fertility of literary resource, his extensive command of homely and apt illustration, his fervent social sympathies, his powers of vigorous invective, his capacity for indignant denunciation."—Times.

"Mr. George's new book will be read, and will make converts. He is an opponent of the existing social order who will have to be met. He is a poet and sees visions; he is an enthusiast and dreams noble dreams. He is full of the best feelings; possessed with the enthusiasm of humanity, and able to awaken it in his readers. He has a clear vision, too, for present evils."—Daily News.

EGYPT.

THE hopeless bewilderment with which even the best-informed and best-disposed foreign critics regard English policy, and the ludicrous blunders into which foreign critics neither well-informed nor well-disposed sometimes fall respecting it, have seldom been more fully excused than by current events in Egypt. Perhaps the actual moment furnishes the most striking justification of both. The extraordinary chapter of accidents which has led to that moment, the marvellous blundering of the English Government in reference to the Soudan, and the explanation—an explanation requiring a careful choice of courteously decisive adjectives to describe it properly—which Sir CHARLES DILKE gave of that blundering last week make up a total which from its utter want of verisimilitude may well puzzle plain men who are apt to judge others from themselves. Even the suspicion that there must be some nefarious and hidden design under so much apparent folly is not altogether degrading to human nature. By a series of chances, the exact character and sequence of which no two official authorities have yet recounted in the same fashion, a Government of non-intervention and justice to native races finds itself absolute master of perhaps the most coveted tract of the earth's surface—the tract which the experience of ages proves to be of most commercial, strategic, and political importance. Then this Government, like the base Judean, does everything it can to throw the pearl away. The nation which of all nations of the world has most experience of the utter incapacity of Oriental peoples to achieve anything like representative government, gravely proposes to thrust representative government on the country which is perhaps of all Eastern countries least fitted for it. A fantastic kind of army is extemporized which is only required or allowed to do the duties of police, and a more fantastic kind of police which one fine day is called upon to do the duties of an army. English officials are thrust upon the country, but for months they are strictly forbidden to do anything except advise. Suddenly a great disaster happens and Egypt, paralysed no less by the beneficent protection of England than by the rather rough action which preceded that protection, is evidently helpless. England will not stir a finger. She will not send her own soldiers to put down rebellion or rescue loyalists; she will not allow Egyptian soldiers to go; she will not even take care that somebody, whether called soldier or not, does go. Weeks and months pass, and at last this coy adviser—this international Mr. VHOLES, who takes charge of Egyptian interests in a strictly professional character, and without the least assumption of responsibility—astonishes the world by insisting that Egypt shall throw away the larger part of Egyptian territory. The world is a little indignant, but consoles itself by reflecting that, after this frank abandonment of the coy-adviser attitude, something must be done. After a further interval the something is done. A single man, without an English sword but his own and his aide-de-camp's, without even an Egyptian escort, is sent into the wilderness, with forty or fifty thousand pounds in gold, to see what he can do. Also, it is to be observed that Egypt furnishes the forty or fifty thousand pounds in gold. Then the English Government modestly folds its hands, and awaits the praises of civilization for its action.

With regard to the probable results of General GORDON's mission not much can be said. It may be hoped that the sinister precedent of the PALMER-GILL expedition may not be repeated, though it must be remembered that General GORDON is in actual blood-feud with not a few Arabs of the Soudan, whereas no member of the luckless party whose fate tarnished the success of the expedition against ARABI had any personal ill-will to dread. The pecuniary bait is even greater in this case than in the other. Contrariwise it is said that General GORDON's luck and experience will carry him through. But it naturally seems strange to foreigners, and may possibly seem strange to some Englishmen, that an English Government should be reduced to trusting in the unaided star of a single man, whatever may be his antecedents. It would have been odd if NELSON had been dispatched with a purse of money, a captain's gig, and the blessing of the Ministry to look after VILLENEUVE; and though the MAHDI's capabilities of mischief are certainly not equal to NAPOLEON's in 1805, the parallel, relatively speaking, is a very fair one. It must, moreover, occur to any one who has even a glimmer of political common sense that the as yet unprovoked announcement of the abandonment of the Soudan cuts General GORDON's ground from under his feet. Without men he can only act by influencing the tribes, and how are the tribes likely to be influenced in favour of Egypt when Egypt is about to withdraw and leave them to the mercy of the first comer? The restoration of Darfur to the dynasty from which ZOBEIR—a rather degenerate but not uninteresting successor of those wanderers who cut themselves out kingdoms with their swords in old time—wrested it ten years ago, is a pretty project, and not in itself an impracticable one. But how is ABD-EL-SHAKOOR to maintain himself when he has been restored? The drawing in of the somewhat unwisely lengthened boundary of Egyptian influence and dominion is, as has been repeatedly granted, a very excusable or even laudable proceeding. But how are the worse devils of slave-dealing anarchy to be prevented from re-entering when the not very angelic presence of Egyptian rule is cast out? To all these questions there is but one answer, that General GORDON is already on his way across the Nubian desert, and that he has a goodly number of pounds Egyptian with him. If General GORDON would have gone months ago (it is worth observing that the scepticism expressed last week as to the accuracy of Sir CHARLES DILKE's account of his unwillingness has since been justified), it would have been all right then; as he has gone, it is all right now.

This, let it be repeated, indicates a singular attitude of mind for the governors of a great country, but it does not exhaust the singularity. For, even if it be granted that wherever General GORDON shows himself his Quas ego will be sufficient to charm or awe the unruly Soudanese into submission, it is self-evident that he cannot show himself in all parts of the Soudan at once. It is no less self-evident that many things may happen before he can show himself in any part. He does not expect to be at Khartoum itself till Monday fortnight, and yet it is well known that matters at Khartoum are in a very bad condition, which only needs a little audacity on the part of the enemy to become worse. Moreover, his choice of the Nile and desert route has rendered it hopeless for him to exert whatever influence he can exert for the benefit of the Eastern Soudan garrisons till months have passed. It is the state of these garrisons which, as has been again and again pointed out, is most utterly disgraceful to England. They lie but a few hours' march from the shore of the sea. On the left of that shore there is an English army of occupation but a day or two's steam off; on the right there is the English garrison of Aden still nearer. In front of it there pass weekly, daily, it may almost be said hourly, English men-of-war, huge English troopships, a single one of which carries almost men enough for a relief expedition, English packets and merchantmen travelling constantly between the barracks and arsenals of the English army in England and the barracks and arsenals of the English army in India. For months past England has had, and she has at last avowed, full responsibility for Egyptian action, and at any moment during the last three months a word from Downing Street would have secured the taking of measures, whether at Bombay, or at Cairo, or at Malta, the result of which would have been the certain safety of the garrisons. The time indicated by TEWFIK BEY, the gallant commander of Sinkat, as the utmost to which he could hold out is long past, and BAKER PASHA, owing to no fault of his own, has been hitherto powerless to take steps for his relief. The steps which he has at last taken are as hazardous as they are bold, and it will be due to luck rather than skill if they are successful even at Tokkar, while the painful reports from Sinkat show that success there is all but hopeless. Yet the English Ministry, out of prudery, out of parsimony, out of pusillanimity, out of fear of some of their own supporters, out of sheer reluctance to take action, or out of indifference to the result of inaction (there are motives enough for choice, and each one is more discreditable than the other), have neglected, and do neglect, to take the easy measures to rescue men, of whose blood, if it be shed, they themselves will be surely and unpardonably guilty. Very rarely has any Opposition had such a theme to descant on, and the present Opposition, despite the mechanical majority arrayed against it, will be strangely unlucky if it does not make the descant with some effect. Yet the Conservatives are asked to postpone the exposure of this crime of omission because it would be "not quite patriotic" to expose it. The confusion between patriotism and devotion to Mr. GLADSTONE's interests could not well be carried further.

OUR UNRIVALLED ARMY.

THIS year's annual battalion dinner of the Artists' Volunteer Corps last Saturday was made particularly interesting by a speech from Lord WOLSELEY. The distinguished General has seldom given a more remarkable example of the fine tact which controls all his dealings with the general public and his Parliamentary chiefs. His choice of subject was judicious. He might have confined himself to the Volunteers and given them praise and good advice, and no man would have had a right to complain. Lord WOLSELEY, however, is well aware that the country is more concerned about the army than about the Volunteers, and that Ministers are much more likely to have difficulties about the former than the latter. Therefore he spoke about the army. His method of dealing with the subject was no less excellent than his choice. No Whig politician on a Radical platform could have served two masters with a better grace. The Adjutant-General had to show the War Office that his principles are sound, but he had also to be careful not to allow his critics a good opportunity of saying that his eyes obstinately shut to obvious facts. Lord WOLSELEY adopted are a most efficacious method of satisfying the Parliamentary element in the War Office, for which alone the prudent soldier is bound to have much regard. He is well aware that the one thing necessary for the scientific soldier, according to Secretaries of State for War, is that he should believe in short service. It is not necessary that he should believe in it very much. He need not strain his conscience by pretending to believe that it does all it professes to do; but it is an article of faith that by short service and at the present rate of pay we get a sufficient number of men who are quite good enough to do the work. Therefore Lord WOLSELEY praised short service, and that right heartily. He defended himself against possible critics by a general acknowledgment of the painful fact that the army is not strong enough. That might, it is true, be an awkward concession under some circumstances. If the country were at all frightened, Lord WOLSELEY's words might be used with effect against the Ministry. For the present, however, the country is apparently tolerably easy in its mind as to the numerical force of the army; and so Lord WOLSELEY may be sure that his words will pass as a professional commonplace. It is only decent in a general to hold that the British army is never as strong as it should be; and Lord WOLSELEY may say so much without disturbing the SECRETARY of STATE for WAR or the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, who have heard it all before.

Believers in the merits of short service were, indeed, in no small need of such encouragement as Lord WOLSELEY can give them. A few months ago the army was avowedly far below its proper strength. The ranks are now better filled; but there are still doubts as to whether the deficiencies have not been made good by the merest makeshifts. There are excellent reasons for believing that such is the case. The sudden fall in the number of men enlisted was notoriously due to what the Times called "the difficulties placed "in the way" of recruiting by Mr. CHILDERS, under the "doubtful influence" of military advisers. In vulgar English, this means that Mr. CHILDERS not unnaturally thought that, as we keep our men for a very short time now, we should try to get them of a reasonable growth to begin with. If the army scheme of the day were only half as good as its framers and the Times believe, it ought to tempt respectable men of the working class to enlist. The consequences of Mr. CHILDERS's weak surrender to the sinister influence of military advisers have soon shown that it does nothing of the kind. Well-grown men would not come forward, and so Lord HARTINGTON has had to undo the mischief caused by Mr. CHILDERS's ill-timed wisdom by accepting boys again. To the Times, but probably to nobody else who takes any interest in military affairs, this has been highly satisfactory. The country, if it thinks about the matter at all, and has not given the army up as a hopeless muddle, will probably be of opinion that it is very bad economy to turn our barracks into hospitals for weedy lads, who must be well fed and clothed for three years before they are fit for work, and who will then be just finishing their service with the colours if Lord CARDWELL's plan is honestly carried out. Lord WOLSELEY, who knows how to seize the psychological moment as well as any man in Europe, comes forward to soothe our anxieties on this point by proving that the short-service system gives us not only men enough, but gives us a very superior quality of man. His speech was in the most approved style of after-dinner oratory on the army, including even our veteran French friend, who said the British infantry was the best in the world, but that fortunately, &c. &c.—it is needless to finish so stale a quotation. His statistics were also used in the most approved official fashion. "At the present moment," said his Lordship, who had brought his figures in his pocket, "of all the "men in the army, including the 33,000 who enlisted last "year, 91 per cent. are over 20 years of age, and 20 per "cent. are over 30. Fifty-eight per cent. stand 5 feet "7 inches high, and 83 per cent. are 35 inches round the "chest. Seventy-eight per cent. have more than two years' "service." After drawing this imposing picture, which shows that in the British army there are a hundred and one men in every hundred, Lord WOLSELEY went on to insist that it represents a much better state of things than obtains in any Continental force. To a less hopeful mind these figures do not appear particularly encouraging. Lord WOLSELEY doubtless forgot in the hurry of the moment that nothing can be more absurd than a comparison between our army and that of any Continental Power. All of them count their men by thousands to our hundreds. As for the statistics of height and chest measurement, they would be very creditable to a Spanish or Portuguese force, but in England they represent a body of small and ill grown men. It would be interesting to compare them with the returns for the navy. If Lord WOLSELEY expected his proofs to be accepted by anybody except the more genial of his hearers after dinner, and a small clique of military journalists on Monday morning, he should have explained how far the results he is so proud of have been obtained by throwing the Reserve overboard. How many of the minority of well-grown men who just save the general average from looking absurd have been tempted to stay on after they have completed their service with the colours? Defenders of the short-service system persistently overlook the fact that it must do something more than keep the ranks full if it is to fulfil all the engagements made for it by political godfathers and godmothers. It was to supply a good reserve, to tempt a high class of men, and to raise us above the disgrace of seeing our military organization thrown into confusion by every petty war. There would be a gross absurdity in asking how far these promises have been kept. The answers are only too obvious. Five men have turned out failures for every one who has gone into the Reserve. The moment a decent standard of size and age was fixed by Mr. CHILDERS, recruiting threatened to come to a stop. The War Office is calling in the police to save the army. Finally, we could not send an Army Corps to Egypt without calling out ten thousand men of the Reserve, which was never to be used except in the hour of great need.

Reading Lord WOLSELEY's speech by the light of these facts, it is not difficult to decide as to what is the most important part of it. It is the ending which contains the confession that the army is too weak. Whatever may be the merits of short service, it is not the less a fact that the country gets a very inefficient fighting force for its sixteen millions. We have pointed out again and again that there is only one possible remedy for this—to wit, better pay. The Times is probably right in saying that a return to long service is impossible. An historical force can be pulled to pieces easily enough, but it cannot so easily be restored. It is, therefore, only the more necessary that the consequences of short service should be loyally accepted. That system makes it absolutely necessary that the ranks should be filled with men who can be rapidly turned into efficient soldiers. It is little short of insanity to go on taking mere boys, as we could afford to do in times when they gave the country half a lifetime of service in return for their first three years of nursing.

THE BIRMINGHAM MEETING.

MR. BRIGHT and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN have added nothing to the arguments on the Reform Bill controversy. One of many evil results of the great increase of platform oratory is the exchange of debate for one-sided declamation. Parliament is now the only place in which a hearing is given to more than one side of a political question. The majority of Birmingham Radicals prefer the twentieth or thirtieth repetition of Mr. BRIGHT's well-known speech or the bold threats and prophecies of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN to public discussion; but among thousands of eager partisans there must be some intelligent politicians who would be anxious to hear the reasons on the other side with or without attempts at confutation. In the early part of this century, and even down to the time of the Reform Bill, contending parties occasionally appealed to the judgment of county meetings; and at a later period candidates confronted each other on the hustings. With the increase of toleration and enlightenment oral controversy has been discontinued because a popular audience would inevitably hoot down the utterance of any unpalatable opinion. Orators are no longer checked by the fear that they may be answered, and they seldom or never attempt to confute their adversaries. A Birmingham audience will never discover that the objections to a wide extension of the franchise are founded on reasons which, even if they are insufficient, affect the foundations of society. That all property, all institutions, all personal freedom should depend on the absolute will of the poorest class in the community is a startling paradox. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has more than once declared that great social and political changes are impending, as the natural consequence of an equal and uniform suffrage. Even a comparatively temperate Liberal such as Mr. CHILDERS announces innovations greater than any which have been introduced in two hundred years. Mr. BURT, a professed representative of the working class, speaking on the day of the Birmingham meeting, recommends the reduction of the franchise as an instrument for depriving landowners of a portion of their property. It is neither wise nor honest to treat such considerations as mere proofs of the perverse and invincible obstinacy of the Tory party. Probably half the Liberal majority in the House of Commons, and the heads of the Cabinet, secretly share the doubts and fears which are ridiculed by their uncongenial allies. The issue between the two parties is now, as formerly, whether the franchise is an ultimate and inherent right or a means for securing good government. To some minds universal suffrage seems one of the absurdest contrivances for the purpose.

Mr. BRIGHT repeated his popular performance, with even less deviation than usual from the authorized version. The wicked Tories opposed the repeal of the Corn Laws. Mr. COBDEN negotiated the French Treaty, which has now disappeared. Mr. BRIGHT was always in the right, and therefore he cannot now be in the wrong. It is not quite certain that his careful avoidance of novelty indicated entire satisfaction with the forthcoming measure. The Bill may possibly have been at least superficially modified since Mr. BRIGHT repudiated the title of Radical, and declared that new changes ought to proceed on the old lines of the Constitution. If Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's statement is intended to be taken seriously, Mr. GLADSTONE must at last have declared himself in favour of moderation in the words, if not in the spirit, of the Bill. The only part of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's speech which can be regarded as an official revelation may, perhaps, have been merely ironical; but if he was in earnest, the great measure of the Session is after all "a "modest little Bill." No one except Mr. BRIGHT, who tenderly remembers the large faggot manufactory conducted by Mr. COBDEN and the rump of the Corn Law League, is likely to remonstrate against the abolition of faggot votes; and, according to Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, the Government will interfere as little as possible with existing arrangements. He added, perhaps with a covert sneer at his veteran colleague, that the Government would proceed on the old lines of the Constitution. The statement may not be worth much, but it contrasted oddly with the rest of the speech. If the right of voting on account of property is to be nominally preserved, and at the same time made dependent on the condition of residence, the pretence of adhering to the Constitution will be altogether illusory. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN is probably entitled to repeat the statement which has often been made that the Liberal party within and without the Cabinet is united. In other words, the dissentients are not prepared to resign office or to lose their seats.

Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN and some other zealous partisans waste their energies in protesting against the formation of a "Cave." The word, which is due to the ingenuity of Mr. BRIGHT, represents the conscientious objection of a scrupulous section to innovations proposed by the leaders and the majority of their party. There is no probability of any similar secession among the delegates of the Caucus. As Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN truly remarks, not a few inhabitants of the Cave of 1866 lost their seats at the next election. Mr. LOWE himself would not have been a member of the House of Commons or of the Cabinet if the University of London had not provided him with an independent seat. Under the new and uniform system, academic constituencies may possibly be disfranchised, on the ground of superior intelligence and of comparative exemption from party prejudice. The members of a Cave necessarily incur great risk in the discharge of their duties. They have forfeited the favour of their own election managers, and they can scarcely rely on the cordial support of the Opposition. In the coming Session the Liberals will vote with as total a disregard of the public interest, and in many cases of their own private convictions, as Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN or Mr. HERBERT GLADSTONE could desire. The little rifts in the Radical lute will be easily covered with a coat of temporary varnish. Irish supporters of the Government will affect to rely on Sir CHARLES DILKE's audacious assurance that redistribution will be so manipulated in Ireland as not to represent numerical proportion. Scotch members, on the other hand, will remember that Mr. GLADSTONE promised them ten more seats, with a possible addition to be granted in consideration of their remoteness from London. If any incipient malcontent objects to the disfranchisement of owners, he will be silenced by the offer of votes to freeholders if only they are, as resident householders, independent of the property qualification. A few modest dissentients will attempt in vain to stipulate for the protection of minorities. If they attempt a division they will be summarily outvoted, and from that time they will acquiesce in the decision of the party.

If differences of opinion as to proposed methods are easily smoothed over, it will be wholly unnecessary to reconcile the conflicting reasons and motives which will induce Liberals and Radicals to vote for any measure which Mr. GLADSTONE proposes. In a humorous story published long ago a set of jovial boon companions apologize to one another for taking a dram. One of them takes a glass of brandy because the day is sultry, and another because he has felt unusually chilly all morning. Only one out of half a dozen confesses that he takes his dram because he likes it. The proportion of those who like the coming Reform Bill will perhaps not be much larger, but there will be no lack of excuses for conformity. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN avowedly hopes to disestablish the Church, to introduce payment of members, and in some indefinite way to mulct the richer classes, and especially the landowners, for the benefit of the poorer. On these grounds he supports household and eventually universal suffrage and equal electoral districts. Mr. FORSTER desires to maintain the Church Establishment, and it may be presumed that he disapproves of all Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's revolutionary measures; but he likes a dram because the day is chilly; or, in other words, he also supports a uniform and low franchise and equal electoral districts. There can be little doubt that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN judges more accurately than his less violent ally of the future consequences of democratic despotism; but many politicians have, like Mr. FORSTER, accustomed themselves to regard the diffusion of electoral power as an ultimate object. Mr. FORSTER himself passed the Ballot Bill, which has done more than any other measure to destroy the influence of the upper and middle classes. When the work is completed by the impending Bill, he will perhaps regret the destruction or insecurity of the best national institutions.

The representation of interests will be entirely disregarded. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN indeed contends that agricultural or mining and manufacturing industry will be represented in exact proportion to the number of persons employed; but the supposed interests of the workmen are, in mining cases, directly opposed to the interests of the employer, as in the instance of a strike. The Socialists of England demand the expropriation of landowners; the Socialists of France and Germany propose to divide all capital amongst themselves. The same fallacy is involved in proposals for distributing representation according to a compound ratio of population and of wealth. The votes would be conferred, not on the owners of the wealth, but on the working population. Mr. GLADSTONE would, perhaps, object to the whole scheme, that wealth and cultivation were in themselves disqualifications. After the last election he described the Conservative success in the City of London and in Westminster as unimportant, because one constituency was the richest in the world, and because the other contained the largest proportion of residents belonging to the higher classes. The recognition of wealth as a reason for conferring political privileges is the less probable because it would diminish the proportionate representation of the lowest class of Irish. As Sir CHARLES DILKE explained, the Government is bent on devising some plan by which the scheme of redistribution is to be so manipulated as to secure Ireland against any electoral loss.

If neither Mr. BRIGHT nor Mr. CHAMBERLAIN threw any direct light on the questions of the franchise and of redistribution, both of them in their second speeches announced their opinions on a more important subject. Mr. BRIGHT boldly denounced Mr. MILL'S sophistical theory of the unearned increment; and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN professed doctrines which are scarcely distinguishable from those of Mr. GEORGE. The scandalous injustice of confiscating landed property, and at the same time securing to the owner the full amount of any personalty which he may possess, would be still more flagrant than at present if it were likely to be perpetrated. The capitalist will assuredly share the fortunes of the landlord; and, indeed, he is on the Continent the chief object of the hostility and cupidity of Communist agitators of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's school. Mr. BRIGHT deserves full credit for his manly protest; and it would, perhaps, be unjust to take the opportunity of suggesting that the opponents of popular suffrage long since discerned the peril which he now desires to avert. The active Socialist and the veteran Free-trader stand side by side on Birmingham platforms to promote measures which cannot produce the antagonistic consequences of which they respectively approve.

THE WOES OF MR. BRADLAUGH.

THE announcement some week or so ago that Mr. BRADLAUGH was meditating a refutation of Mr. GEORGE may possibly have suggested to some weak-minded but charitable souls faint visions of a Bradlaughian Apocatastasis—a return of the junior member for Northampton to orthodoxy and decent views on religion, monarchy, population, and other subjects. A relation of the honourable, but as yet unsworn, gentleman has confided to the world that he himself does not despair of such a result, and though it is quite possible to imagine other reasons for Mr. BRADLAUGH's antipathy to Mr. GEORGE than creditable ones, charity once more pleads for neglect of them. Indeed, a good-natured man might on more accounts than one feel nearly as "wae" for Mr. BRADLAUGH as BURNS was for the more celebrated personage in whom Mr. BRADLAUGH does not believe. He is certainly a person of ability, and it must be very terrible for a person of ability to find himself condemned to the society of the Reverend SHARMANS and the Reverend HEADLAMS, the Doctor AVELINGS, and the various interesting gaol-birds who are from time to time liberated from their congenial cages and breakfasted at the expense of the Secularist faithful. He is certainly a good man of business, and authority for which it is impossible to vouch calls him a whist-player. Surely a decent day's work in a respectable office, and a comfortable rubber before dinner, must be more agreeable (to say nothing more) than mornings spent in composing and afternoons or evenings spent in delivering arrangements in political and religious unorthodoxy to hit the taste of the riff-raff of England. Then there are the political woes of Mr. BRADLAUGH. If anybody was ever much worse treated by his own party (from Mr. GLADSTONE, who can only spare him a quotation from LUCRETIUS and a misquotation from VOLTAIRE, to anonymous Liberal M.P.'s who write to Liberal newspapers requesting him to get out of "the way and not be a nuisance), that hapless person is unknown to Parliamentary history. Mr. BRADLAUGH is a staunch Radical, he is longing to be at the House of Lords, he brings to Mr. GLADSTONE a ragged but resolved regiment of out-and-out reformers, and his party back him up with a painful faintness. They vote for him after a fashion, but with no heartiness or zest. Mr. LABOUCHERE takes him up only too obviously because it is fun to Mr. LABOUCHERE to do so; Sir WILFRID LAWSON approves of him because the great majority of rational folk do not. But Mr. BRADLAUGH is a person extremely unlikely to be satisfied with the devotion of Mr. LABOUCHERE and Sir WILFRID LAWSON. Even if next Monday week a hardy band of Secularists were to carry off Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE and leave him gagged and bound in a garret somewhere down by Millbank, to get Sir HENRY TYLER sent off in a special train with orders to the driver not to stop till he reached the furthest station on the line, and in other ways to dispose of the wicked majority, Mr. BRADLAUGH would be very little better off. A majority can let Mr. BRADLAUGH take an oath, but it cannot, or at least it will not, associate with Mr. BRADLAUGH on equal terms. Ungrateful people hugging the chains of Christianity, monarchy, and large families, what sorrows does not Mr. BRADLAUGH bear for you!

This vein of thought may be considered to be sentimental. But the letter above referred to ought to melt the heart of a stone. Who the brutal Liberal member may be who was honoured with large type in the Daily News of Wednesday probably few people know, and certainly nobody cares. His act has led to a pathetic remonstrance (which occasionally rather wonders from the point) by the victim himself, to an interesting politico-theological homily by that eminent divine Mr. LABOUCHERE, and perhaps to an arrangement between Mr. LABOUCHERE and Mr. ROWLAND WINN, which has since been reported, and which is irresistibly suggestive of the P.R. If Mr. LABOUCHERE will take his man away, Mr. WINN will take his man away on the opening day of the Session; and the Fancy are informed that Monday the 11th, at half-past four, is the new fixture. This is practically important; and, if the Liberal M.P. had anything to do with it, he is to be thanked. Mr. LABOUCHERE's opinion that the Conservatives are "hypocrites who pretend that they are actuated by religious motives in subordinating the rights of electors to a vague theme which has nothing in common with Christianity" is not quite so practical. Mr. LABOUCHERE will perhaps oblige the compilers of the new English Dictionary with his notions of the meaning of the word "theme"; and it is interesting to know that he is an expert on the question of what has and what has not something in common with Christianity. But these are details. The main point is the extreme and brutal frankness with which the Liberal M.P. tells the elect of Northampton that he is simply an intolerable nuisance. He does more. Mr. BRADLAUGH probably thinks (or thought) that the electors of Northampton returned him because he was Mr. BRADLAUGH, from admiration of his personality, agreement with his opinions, or something of that kind. Nothing of the sort, says the Liberal M.P. The electors of Northampton returned him "instead of a Conservative to aid in passing the County Franchise Bill and other like measures." It may be observed in passing that, if the electors of Northampton so much as thought about the County Franchise Bill at the election of 1880, they were probably the only constituency that did so. But that is by the way. What should be chiefly noticed is that the Liberal M.P. speaks of Mr. BRADLAUGH as if he were a kind of useful but clumsy voting machine. It was a wicked Tory, if we remember rightly, who expressed, or was represented by treacherous opponents as expressing, his willingness to elect the parish beadle or the parish pump if the parish beadle or the parish pump could be trusted to vote straight. Mr. BRADLAUGH, according to the Liberal M.P., held in the estimation of Northampton no higher place than this. And so he, the Tribune of the People, the evangelist of the future, the patriot, the reformer, the man with a mission against pensions and piety, is told to move on and not bother. O these Whigs! these Whigs!

It is difficult to say whether after this bad treatment the conduct of divers comic papers in representing Mr. BRADLAUGH as a white elephant is likely to have been an aggravation or a relief to his sufferings. But it may be modestly suggested that the caricaturists have got hold of the wrong man. Unless they mean to draw a parallel between Mr. BARNUM and Mr. LABOUCHERE, which would be distinctly rude, it is not easy to make it out. Now (though we disclaim all intention of ourselves drawing it) if any one were to draw a parallel between Young Taloung and Mr. BRADLAUGH'S revered leader, there might be something to be said for it. There are some people who hold that Young Taloung is a venerable, a grand, a holy beast, and some who hold very much the contrary, which contrast of opinion reproduces itself with regard to Mr. GLADSTONE. It has been hinted that the white elephant is a very dear bargain, and some have said much the same of the English PRIME MINISTER. Young Taloung is fond of standing on his head in public, and Mr. GLADSTONE is fond of cutting down trees in the presence of excursionists. The white elephant has a suite of seedy and dubious priests who perform unclassified services (of song and otherwise) in his honour; and this also is the case with the member for Midlothian. Young Taloung's backers declare that there is nobody in the elephant world like him; so do Mr. GLADSTONE'S, with the omission of the word elephant. And though one approaches the climax of the comparison with a kind of shudder, it has been hinted that Young Taloung is a Humbug, and—but the completion of the thing is too horrible. Only for the sake of doing justice to a much-injured man by showing that the pictorial barkings of Funny Folks, and Punch, and the other little comic dogs, might be more suitably addressed in another quarter, could the parallel have even been suggested. Enough must have been said to show that the process of working itself into sympathy with Mr. BRADLAUGH is quite possible to a mind possessed of imaginativeness and sensibility. It is such a new and amiable light in which to regard him that the mind of imaginativeness and sensibility cannot be otherwise than pleased. The brutal frankness of the Liberal M.P. and the mistaken identity of the comic paper white elephant have invested Mr. BRADLAUGH, at least the Mr. BRADLAUGH of fancy, with the Dignity of Sorrow, and he is so much more interesting and agreeable in this novel guise, that sense, coming to the aid of sensibility, suggests that it would be a thousand pities to deprive him of his grievances. A full-fledged member of Parliament, frequent at Mr. GLADSTONE'S councils and convivial assemblies, potent in debate, capable of being "run" for the first Cabinet vacancy, Mr. BRADLAUGH would cease to be interesting, except perhaps to some Liberal M.P.s, who would then be as polite to him as they now are candid. There are other reasons doubtless for objecting to his promotion and extraction from his present limbo, but for the present it is unnecessary to dwell on these.

PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION.

THE periodical attack on the system of Private Bill legislation has been resumed in a letter or article communicated to the Times either by the member who has undertaken the conduct of the movement or by some ally who shares his opinions and his speculative mode of dealing with statistics. Mr. CRAIG SELLAR, though he is an able and experienced partisan, probably found on entering the House of Commons that almost every department of agitation was already occupied. That his selection of the topic of Private Bill legislation was not suggested by any previous knowledge of the subject was proved by the wild statements contained in his last year's speech. Some part of his materials consisted of unauthenticated gossip, and his figures sometimes represented transactions which had been separated by periods of ten, twenty, or forty years. The writer in the Times is equally indifferent to minute accuracy, though his remarks are professedly founded on Parliamentary returns of expenses incurred by railway and other Companies during eleven years. Having quoted, perhaps correctly, the returns of various large payments, Mr. CRAIG SELLAR'S zealous supporter doubles or trebles the total sum by a bold guess that the cost of Private Bill legislation in the last ten years is not less than 25,000,000*l.* "That this is not an "excessive estimate may be inferred from the fact that the "Corporation of the City of London spent 13,000*l.* on a "single gas Bill, while the ordinary yearly expenditure of "the Metropolitan Board of Works on Parliamentary "schemes is 8,000*l.*" The last-mentioned sum bears but a small proportion to 25,000,000*l.* The Board of Works represents a population of nearly four millions, and it constantly exercises a special privilege which it has acquired of having a locus standi in opposition to any Bill which affects the metropolitan district. According to the careful statistician who speaks of a term of ten years, the returns extend from 1872 to 1882 inclusive; but the difference between ten and eleven naturally appears insignificant in dealing with conjectural millions.

The expenditure incurred by promoters and opponents has undoubtedly been large, and thirty or forty years ago it was extravagant; but the result of Parliamentary inquiries has been the construction of the most complete system of railways in the world and an approximately equitable adjustment of the conflicting claims of private property and of public expediency. As might be expected, the writer in the Times repeats the cuckoo cry that the decisions of Committees have been inconsistent, and that they seldom admit of being anticipated. In other words, judgments on complicated issues of fact have been determined by evidence and by argument, and neither by caprice nor by the application to different circumstances of one arbitrary rule. The complaint that Committees have been hoodwinked by counsel as to the effect of the Bills, or overpowered by specious advocacy, might, if it were urged by an ignorant disputant, be thought to represent the vulgar prejudice against the impartiality of judges and the independent advocacy of counsel. The High Court of Judicature is necessarily exposed to the specious advocacy by which disappointed litigants think that the tribunal is hoodwinked. Committees are special juries of a very high order, with a competent chairman carefully selected to act as foreman. Although the chairmen are sometimes lawyers, it is not necessary that they should have professional knowledge, and they have no superiors as impartial and business-like arbitrators. Among the number of those who have commanded in former times universal respect and confidence may be mentioned the present Lord DERBY, the Duke of RICHMOND, Sir RICHARD CROSS, Mr. FORSTER, and the late Sir FRANCIS GOLDSMID. Those who demand that decisions should be uniform ought in consistency to object to the discrimination exercised by juries who find in one case for the defendant, in another for the plaintiff with nominal damages, and in a third for a large amount.

The assailant of cautious and conscientious inquiry has no hesitation in giving a judgment of his own on difficult practical questions of which he can know absolutely nothing. He asserts that, but for the cost of Parliamentary proceedings, "London and Brighton would long ago have been "connected by more than one line of railway; nor would "our (the Times) columns periodically teem with the com-"plaints of those who groan under the exactions and de-"ficiencies of the South-Eastern." Those who understand the subject know that it is extremely doubtful whether a competing line to Brighton would be for the public advantage; yet it happens that several years ago such a scheme was sanctioned by Parliament after a long contest in both Houses. The line was not made, nor was it begun, for the simple reason that the capital was not subscribed. In other parts of its system the London and Brighton Company has been compelled to submit to the competition of new lines. The writer seems to assume that the South-Eastern is in possession of a monopoly, though the London, Chatham, and Dover lines run parallel with it to almost all its principal stations. If an ill-informed amateur can settle such questions at a moment's notice, Committees of the two Houses may be trusted to arrive at a reasonable decision after full inquiry. The statement that "a big Gas or Water "Company is able to terrify competitors off the field" indicates the same unacquaintance with the practice and condition of such bodies. A town sufficiently supplied with water would be only incommoded by a competing Company; and, in fact, the parties to contests relating to gas and water are, in the great majority of cases, Corporations on one side and Companies on the other.

It is absurd to contend that it would be better that Parliament should "lay down once for all the principles on "which given classes of schemes should be settled than to "admit of a perpetual passing of privilegia." No principle can be applied to questions of public expediency conflicting with vested rights or interests. If it is in conformity with a principle that there should be two competing railways from London to Dover, no inference can be drawn in favour of a competing line from London to Brighton. If such a line is sanctioned, a third competitor would perhaps demand the extension of the same principle. The conflicts for the retention or acquisition of water supply in populous districts are still more difficult to determine. There is scarcely a stream or a square mile of gathering ground in the hilly region between Yorkshire and Lancashire which has not been the subject of contests among municipal bodies, Companies, and millowners. On the whole, substantial justice has been done, but only by laborious investigations conducted before highly competent tribunals. As the writer in the Times politely remarks of another class of topics, disputes for the possession of water "form admi-"rable topics for the bear-garden displays of Parliamentary "counsel." Mr. AUSTIN, Mr. TALBOT, and Mr. HOPE SCOTT were probably not conscious that their polished, subtle, and scholarlike advocacy could be compared to the amenities of a bear-garden. Any substituted tribunal, unless it is to act in total disregard of justice, must also listen to counsel, whose conflicts may be by prejudiced laymen described as performances in a bear-garden. References in cases of compensation and in other litigated matters are attended by counsel, who might with equal justice be accused of belonging to a bear-garden or hoodwinking the arbitrator.

Similar charges have been frequently advanced against the system of private legislation during a period beyond the memory of the oldest practitioner. The fact that no change has at any time approved itself to the judgment of either House suggests the probability that the existing practice is not wholly unsatisfactory. No light is thrown on the subject by vague invective which is also devoid of originality. It is true that the present time is favourable to innovation; and it is possible that recent alterations of Parliamentary procedure may render members less patient of the labour of serving on Committees. The Standing Committees, which may perhaps be increased in number, will occupy the time of many members; and by custom the members of the Government, lawyers in active practice, and to some extent the leaders of the Opposition, have always been exempt from service. The majority of the House is still available for Committees, and the Chairmen will probably for the most part think their arduous duties more important than participation in the work of the Standing Committees. No similar disability or inconvenience affects the House of Lords. The writer in the Times expresses an opinion which is popularly entertained that the Committees of the Lords are more highly qualified than those of the Commons. No invidious comparison is contained in the statement that the peers are not overburdened with work, and that young and intelligent members of the Upper House would gladly find additional opportunities of acquiring a knowledge of business and of rendering public service. If it is true that peers are better fitted for judicial functions than the House of Commons, their superiority is likely to increase. When the social standard of the House of Commons is lowered by impending changes, members belonging to a humbler class will not command the confidence which has been reposed in their predecessors. The paid members whom Mr. CHAMBERLAIN proposes to introduce into the House would be obviously unfit for judicial functions. The wholesale corruption of State Legislatures in America furnishes a warning against the control by democratic assemblies or their Committees of great pecuniary interests. The English system has not been cheap, but it has been absolutely pure and remarkably efficient. Its critics are ill advised in betraying their ignorance of its operation, and their indifference to considerations of judicial impartiality

MR. GOSCHEN AND LORD SALISBURY.

PROVERBS are not universally true, and in respect of speechmaking it is assuredly not the case that the night is darkest before the dawn. On the very eve of the opening of Parliament the abundance of talk on the part of public men is more abundant than ever. They may be public men as important as Mr. GOSCHEN, or public men as unimportant as Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD, they may talk solid wisdom or pretentious absurdity; but they talk as if their mouths were going to be sealed instead of opened for the next seven or eight months. Naturally the speakers of the type of the member for Salford vastly outnumber the speakers of the type of the member for Ripon. But, putting aside the Birmingham demonstration, it is not to be denied that various utterances of the present week have been contributions to the discussion of public affairs which are certainly not likely to be exceeded in usefulness by the more regular contributions made within the walls of the Palace of Westminster. Two in especial, the speech of Mr. GOSCHEN just referred to, and Lord SALISBURY'S at Hertford, may be singled out for comment without any injustice to some others of merit.

To read or to listen to Mr. GOSCHEN is at once a pleasure and a pain. It reminds the reader or hearer that the type of politician which more than any other has made England's greatness is not extinct among us, but it reminds him likewise that its individual examples are getting fewer, and that the direct tendency of recent and threatened political changes is to make them fewer still. It is impossible also not to see in the member for Ripon the faults as well as the virtues of the moderate man. The moderate man lends himself to the proceedings of the immoderate, until they begin to startle him—until also it is in many cases too late to leave off lending himself with any useful result. Almost everything that Mr. GOSCHEN said on Wednesday was full of political wisdom, except his expression of friendliness towards the Ministers who are responsible for the imminence of the state of things which he dreads and protests against. It is impossible to understand Mr. GOSCHEN'S promise to "abstain from worrying opposition" to a proposal which no man knows more certainly and which no man has shown with more convincing force to be mischievous than he. "While GOD'S champion lives "Wrong shall be resisted: dead, why he forgives," was probably not intended by Mr. BROWNING in a political sense; but it makes an excellent political motto. As long as there is one grain of fight left in a politician he should show it; but when he is on one particular point, and, metaphorically speaking, "dead," he may leave off fighting. The extension of the franchise, which Mr. GOSCHEN sees to be mischievous, and which he evidently fears may prove disastrous, is not yet an accomplished fact; and every one who sees what he sees and fears what he fears ought to strive to prevent its becoming an accomplished fact by day and by night, by hook and by crook, by all means that are fair in political war, and by all devices that are possible to political ingenuity. Those who make sure of a beating will pretty surely be beaten; but there is no beating so morally certain in matters political that courage and strategy and the chapter of accidents may not at least possibly avert it. A little more of this fighting temper, combined with his actual clearness of political sight, would make Mr. GOSCHEN a political leader of the first rank. His remarks on the ignoble Radical trick of using the London municipal reform scheme, for which country Radicals care nothing, and Londoners, Radical or not, still less, as a kind of trap for the House of Lords; his comments on redistribution; his explosion of the absurd argument that finality can be secured by a reckless Reform Bill; and, above all, the observations on class jealousy with which he closed his speech, can hardly be too much praised. The passage last referred to in particular deserves attention, though unfortunately it is to all appearance spoken too late. Measures in the past, of most of which Mr. GOSCHEN has been a supporter, have all but established the domination of one class; and measures in the future, which he declines to oppose except with philosophic calm, propose to establish it completely. The popular leaders of the party to which Mr. GOSCHEN nominally belongs lose no opportunity of stirring, feeding, and blowing up the fire of class jealousy and class greed. And so, after all, admirable as is much in Mr. GOSCHEN'S speech, correct as are many of his views, sound as are his general political sentiments, there is in the whole utterance something of that academic and unpractical air, that refusal to look at their own acts in the past, and the consequences of those acts in the present, which are the bane of a certain kind of moderate politicians, Liberal and Conservative alike. If we have got into the very unhealthy state in which Mr. GOSCHEN pretty obviously considers us to be, whose fault is it? If the State is so unhealthy, how can it be right to promise not to "oppose worryingly" attempts to make it still more unhealthy? These are questions which it would be rather difficult for Mr. GOSCHEN to answer, and unluckily they present themselves as a kind of running commentary all through his speech.

It is because in Lord SALISBURY'S speech at Hertford there was no undertone of this kind that it may be said to have been more satisfactory, without any reference whatever to the party colour of the two utterances. Both in regard to the particular question of the franchise and in regard to the general question of the conduct of the House of Lords, the dialectic advantage on the side of a speaker who can show himself to have been consistently opposed to extensions of the franchise, and to have a clear conception of the position of the Peers, is immense. Mr. GOSCHEN, indeed, is on this latter point perfectly sound. The matter could hardly be put more clearly or more fairly than he put it at Ripon. If England has come to the conclusion that a Second Chamber is undesirable, or that (in defiance of universal experience) a really efficient Second Chamber can be got together on the elective system, let England say so. But to quarrel with a Second Chamber for doing the work for which Second Chambers exist is at once unfair and idiotic. Thus far, except that he put it in more measured language, Mr. GOSCHEN himself went at Ripon, and there is nothing in his language there which is inconsistent—there is much that is consistent with the further step taken by Lord SALISBURY, the step of saying that it is within the province of a Second Chamber to demand that, when important changes in the Constitution are made in a Parliament tending towards its end, the mind of the country shall be consulted on the subject. The position that this is a strictly constitutional doctrine it would be hardy even for Radicals to attack directly, and they accordingly attempt to turn it by accusing the Peers of demanding a plébiscite. One is a little reminded of Mr. CARLYLE'S "And what if it were pot-"theism, if it be true?" But as a matter of fact it is not pot-theism. A plébiscite is a vote en masse, in which a single question only can be answered "yes" or "no." A new election is the constitutional and regular method of ascertaining the temper of the nation as to the general conduct of its affairs. No one probably would say that it would be constitutional in the House of Lords to force a dissolution in the first or the second, or even the third, Session of a Parliament, unless there were some extraordinary manifestation of popular feeling or the case were one of unprecedented urgency. But when a Parliament (as this Parliament will have done by the time any Franchise Bill can be sent up) has all but reached its grand climacteric, it is not only the right but the duty of the constitutional authority (which is in this case the Upper House) to consider whether the elected part of it may or may not be taken to represent the will of the electors, and the decision can only be taken by the means provided by the Constitution. It is ludicrous to speak of a reference to the people as being contempt of the people; absurd to represent the application for a fresh mandate as a proof of insubordination. Indeed there underlies all Radical argument on the subject a tacit confession of one main danger of democracy. According to those who exclaim beforehand at the supposed action of the Lords, the House of Commons is not representative but sovereign, not intermediate but plenipotentiary, not a means to an end, but an end in itself. That is not the doctrine of the English Constitution. And, despite ready-made Caucus resolutions, bolstered up by deputations of the kind that waited on Mr. GLADSTONE on Thursday—deputations consisting of the resolution makers in a fresh capacity, like the supers of a theatre—there is fortunately no sign that it is the opinion of the English people.

ANIMALS ABROAD.

IN an interesting little pamphlet now before us, Mrs. BURTON gives an account of her efforts to protect animals from ill-treatment in the town of Trieste. In few countries is the law for the protection of animals so stringent as in England, and in few is public opinion so strongly on the side of the law. The Englishman, as a rule, is merciful to his beast; partly, no doubt, because it pays to be so, but partly also because the form of brutality which the contrary implies is repugnant to his character. Even BILL SIKES was kinder to his dog than to his fellow-creatures; and probably few of the roughs who combine to beat and kick an inoffensive person in the streets would find an equal enjoyment in torturing a dumb animal. Enough, however, of the latter form of barbarity exists among us to render the penalties to which it is subjected in the highest degree desirable. But it is curious that in countries where the intercourse of human beings one with another is gentler, kindlier, and more polished than among ourselves, and where what is called in England only horse-play would be looked upon as mere brutal savagery, a hardness of heart should exist with regard to the sufferings of animals which seems to us incredible. We are satisfied that, though the inhabitants of this country do not enjoy as much happiness as belongs to nations of a sunnier temperament, the animals which they keep are much happier. Moved by the animal suffering which she witnessed in Trieste, Mrs. BURTON has formed a Society for its alleviation. Looking down the list of those who have contributed to it, we notice that nearly every name is English. There is nothing to be surprised at in this. Apart from the fact that Englishmen are accustomed to give their money freely to voluntary Societies of this kind, while foreigners are not, there remains the fact that, to the foreign eye, this form of missionary enterprise wears an air of meddlesomeness. English residents abroad are so much in the habit of preaching out of season to those among whom they live that, when they happen to preach in season, their exhortations are apt to be resented. A foreigner who has just been baited by a Salvationist or a rigid Sabbatarian is not in a mood to receive with meekness from English lips the assertion, true though it may be, that he misuses the dumb creatures who serve him. And the more pertinaciously we labour to convert him to our views, the more inclined he becomes to tell us to mind our own business.

The good that the labours of such Societies as this do is that they may induce the people of foreign countries themselves to take up the work. It is then only that it becomes really effective. There are instances given in this pamphlet, both horrible and comic, which show that there is much in need of amendment in Trieste. The mere fact of sensational cases of cruelty occurring is not a reason why any special Society should be founded to counteract them. Sensational cases of cruelty occur everywhere and can never be altogether put a stop to. But where cruelty is habitual, and is not felt to be cruelty, but is freely condoned by public opinion, there is nothing but the propagandism of individuals which can prepare the way for better things. There was a time in England when a proposal to prohibit cock-fighting or bear-baiting would have provoked as much derision as the proposal to prohibit fishing would now. Public opinion, however, has, through the agency of zealous individuals, been led to see that in the use that we make of the lower animals there are limits which ought to be observed. That these limits are not recognized with sufficient clearness is shown by the folly which is sometimes talked on the subject of vivisection; but that they exist and should not be transgressed is what no decent person would now deny. The general recognition of this truth is of recent origin among ourselves. But elsewhere it seems often not to be recognized at all. There is no case more in point than that of horses. A horse can be maltreated, it is true, in private: but the incitements to maltreatment chiefly occur in public; and as the horse is kept for outdoor use, the evidences of maltreatment become clear to all the world. Any one who crosses the Alps from Switzerland to Italy can see in the condition of the horses on both sides clear proof of the different way in which the Swiss and the Italian regards his beast. For ten fat and well-kept horses on the north side he will only find one on the south. Yet in all the little mutual offices of human life the Italian, rich and poor, is kindlier and pleasanter than the Swiss. At Trieste, as Mrs. BURTON observes, most of the cases which come under the notice of the Society are cases of habitual, but not remarkable, cruelty; but others of a more flagrant kind are also reported. Thus, within an hour's distance of Trieste, we read of a rich farmer "who buys up half-"dying horses for a couple of florins, works and starves

"them, and in winter turns them out in the cutting wind "and snow to pasture on nothing." Another case, or rather habit, for which the police and the public are clearly responsible is told as follows. There appears to be in Trieste an official known as the Schinder. This gentleman drives round the city every day with two or three companions in a cart, armed with a lasso made of supple iron wire. When a dog is seen without a muzzle on, the lasso is deftly thrown round his neck, and he is hoisted into the cart with the risk of strangulation and the certainty of acute pain. At the end of forty-eight hours, if the master has not claimed the dog and paid the fine, the valuable dogs are sold and the rest are killed. Things are certainly better managed at the Dogs' Home at Battersea. It seems that Mrs. BURTON arranges that for these forty-eight hours the dogs have proper food. A curious instance, both painful and ridiculous, is quoted as showing the way in which the system works. One evening, at nine o'clock, the cart of the Schinder passed the barracks. The regimental dog happened to be outside and was lassoed by the occupants of the cart. But a regimental dog is not as other dogs. It is as much a point of honour to defend him as to defend the colours or the colonel. The soldiers rushed out; but their zeal outran their discretion, and, while the Schinder had the poor brute by the head with his lasso of iron-wire, the soldiers had him by the feet with their hands. In the struggle the unhappy creature was pulled in pieces. It is satisfactory to right feelings to learn that "somebody," at least, is to be punished: and it may be hoped that a case which must have been locally so conspicuous may lead to the abolition of a brutal and absurd system of torture.

Trieste is a half-Italian city; but in Italy itself both the cruelties to animals and the protests against these cruelties have been of late often brought before public notice. It is strange and ludicrous to see the sympathy which the Italian, naturally the reverse of brutal, will even extend to the creature whom he tortures. At the gates of Florence the following scene might be often witnessed. As the baskets of fowls were brought in from the country the birds were there and then, as usual, subjected to the municipal tax. This inconvenience, it is true, fell on their owners; but another, of a very different kind, fell on themselves. They were taken, one by one, out of their baskets, their mouths were forced open, a funnel was inserted into their throats, and hot water was poured into them. The bystander who might ask the reason of this singular performance was told that it rendered the flesh of the birds more sweet and more tender. The quantity of water injected into them, it may be added, also made them seem plumper and weigh heavier in the market, where they were, before all the public, first feathered and then killed. The perpetrators of these cruelties would, in the very act of torture, sympathetically exclaim "Povere "bestie!" to which the spectators would, with equal tenderness of heart, rejoin "Povere bestie!" It was in Florence, we believe, that the first association for the protection of animals was formed, mainly, if we are not mistaken, through the means of English and American residents. Other associations of the same kind have been formed elsewhere. They are now largely composed of Italians, and enjoy the special favour of the QUEEN, who is undoubtedly the most popular personage in the country, and whose influence may serve to make the protection of animals fashionable.

FRANCE.

SINCE the operations of Admiral COURBET in Tonquin were suspended a few weeks ago, for some reason which has not yet been given to the world, the politics of France have sunk into a state of most promising dulness. M. FERRY has his hands very full of work, and administrative questions of no small importance are being debated. These things, however, are very tame in comparison with the issues which have occupied the attention of his predecessors for much the better part of a century. There has never until quite recently been a time when a more or less open fight has not been going on over the form of government. Whether or not the Republic is destined to endure, it is certainly safe for the present, if only for the sufficient reason that there is nobody to upset it. M. FERRY has scarcely even a possible rival for the post of Prime Minister. Even the foreign relations of France, which appeared to be about to develop dangerous complications a few months ago, have been smoothed down to a condition of at least superficial quiet. M. PAUL BERT may take advantage of his freedom from responsibility to indulge in noisy patriotism at Châteaudun; but the paper war with Germany has been a paper war and nothing more. His speech will probably produce the usual crop of angry articles in German newspapers; but Prince BISMARCK, though he thinks it well to remind France of certain painful facts at frequent intervals, may be trusted to estimate this eloquence at its proper value. The wonderful flourish of trumpets which the Parisian press indulged in almost daily over M. FERRY's spirited policy has been quieted in the most surprising manner. From the moment when the capture of Sontay had shown that the French fighting power in Tonquin was strong enough to punish all attempts to oppose it, the Republic has apparently made up its mind that the time has come for concluding some such arrangement as China will be ready to accept. It is not likely that the Chinese Government will prove very impracticable if once it is thoroughly convinced that it has to deal with an enemy who can and will fight vigorously.

In this political backwater the attention of M. FERRY's Ministry has been called to the condition of France question. Under ordinary circumstances no more dangerous subject of debate could be started for any French Government, and particularly for a Republic. It is not, however, by any means improbable that M. FERRY's Ministry may come out of the discussion stronger than ever. His numerous assailants seem likely to discover that they are so far from having gained anything by trying to make capital out of the distress of the country, that they have given him another opportunity of proving to the peasants and the bourgeoisie that he is the only statesman in France capable of offering an effective resistance to the Radical parties. The longer the debate on M. LANGLOIS's motion lasts—and it has gone on for almost a fortnight—the clearer does it become that the question was opened by the Opposition for purely party reasons, and is being conducted in the most captious spirit. French agriculture has been in no very flourishing condition for some years, and there is very real distress in some of the towns. It is especially severe in Paris, where it is most dangerous. If the various leaders of the Opposition, from M. CLÉMENCEAU to M. PAUL DE CASSAGNAC, had confined themselves, or had been allowed to confine themselves, to the general statement that all this trouble was due to the unrepublican character of the Republic, or to the mere existence of that form of government according to their point of view, they might have succeeded in discrediting M. FERRY's Ministry. Frenchmen have always a tendency to think that a Minister who cannot make business flourish is unworthy of the confidence of an industrious country. The untimely zeal of M. LANGLOIS has made the easy course of carping impossible for the Oppositions. He has called upon the Government to show cause why the workmen of Paris should not be in the receipt of regular wages; and so the whole question has had to be threshed out in a prolonged and apparently aimless discussion. M. LANGLOIS could scarcely have done M. FERRY a better service. When once the matter was brought to this test, it became obvious that his critics had no effectual remedy to offer, and that such remedies as they did propose are much worse than the disease. It was a comparatively minor advantage that M. FERRY was able to show that his Ministry was not responsible for the phylloxera or for the inevitable consequences of over-speculation in the building trade of Paris. As much as that was obvious to the minority who take the trouble of considering the facts of the case with any degree of impartiality. The great advantage which the debate has had for him is that it has served to drive this truth into the heads of the large majority, which can realize nothing but what is forced in as with a nail and a mallet. One after another the spokesmen of the Opposition have got up and proved to demonstration that their only complaint against M. FERRY is that he governs a Republic which they cannot upset or else make as Radical as they would like. The Royalists point out that things were never as bad as this under LOUIS PHILIPPE, or what is still worse for their own cause, they insist that France would again flow with milk and honey if it would only return to sound Catholic principles. In the course of their arguments they have contrived to show that they are still widely divided among themselves. The Bonapartists have given their version of the Royalist view in their own peculiar style. The workmen of Paris, on whose behalf the whole question was started, were not likely to be very grateful for help of this kind, but the arguments of their own men have done them even less good. The Radical speakers of various shades of red who have had their say on the subject have one and all proposed remedies which are not only particularly likely to terrify the peasants and middle class, but have been already tried, and have failed. From M. BRIALOU, the workman's candidate, who amused the Chamber by haranguing as if he was in a club, to M. CLÉMENCEAU, who talked empty commonplace, they have all either said nothing to the point or have given France fair warning that they aim at carrying out just such a policy as ruined the Republic of 1848.

Pitted against adversaries of this sort, M. FERRY should be sure of an easy victory. His version of the Republic may not be a very noble form of government. He has inherited the reckless financial policy of M. DE FREYCINET, and has not been energetic in correcting it; but he does give the country a tolerable administration. The distress on which the Opposition dwell so much can be shown to have been grossly exaggerated as regards the provinces; and in Paris, where it is very real, it is the manifest result of the folly of builders who have invested an immense capital in building hundreds of costly houses for which they can find no tenants. If he is upset, there is nobody to take his place—nobody, that is to say, whom the great mass of Frenchmen are prepared to accept. The Royalists are avowedly waiting till the nation comes to its senses—an attitude which a majority of Frenchmen appear to consider little else than impertinent. The Bonapartists are not only divided against themselves, but are led by a species of political Squires of Alsatia. The Radical Opposition has nothing to offer beyond condemned nostrums and Socialist experiments which France is the last country in Europe to try. M. FERRY offers the country a Republican Government such as the great majority of middle-class Frenchmen can appreciate. It has not a very high ideal. It has a decidedly mean envy of every kind of personal and social superiority. Its foreign policy is avowedly inspired by principles which are both timid and selfish. Its financial policy is to a great extent a politique de pourboire for the constituencies; but it is towards such a Government as this that France has been tending ever since the Revolution, and if M. FERRY plays his cards with ordinary discretion, he may feel reasonably confident of ruling for some years over an industrious dead level. A very high-minded statesman would scarcely be content with so little; but Europe has, perhaps, no cause to complain.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE ON EVERYTHING.

AFTER lecturing, with great acceptation, on Nothing, Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE has addressed the students of Edinburgh University on Everything. He talked to his young constituents, as he himself said, "in a friendly and "desultory way." Some Lord Rectors would weary their flocks with solemn disquisitions on Education. Some would preach them a sermon more appropriate to the College chapel, if the College happens to have a chapel. Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE preferred to show a lively example of the pleasure which a man gets out of study. Like the founders of the old Universities whom he described, the new LORD RECTOR had a touch at omne scibile. He did not quote BURNS, or at least he did not quote him so much as an English speaker usually does when he addresses a Scotch audience. But he spoke of ARISTOTLE, ARISTOPHANES, ALEXANDER the Great, Sir ALEXANDER GRANT, DANTE, the Complaynt of Scotland, VIRGIL, Œdipus of Colonos, the Sage CHILON (not to be confounded with the Captive of Chillon), WORDSWORTH, HORACE, ALCIBIADES, Lycidas, "the Thyrsis of THEOCRITUS," ROGER BACON, Dr. MONRO, THUCYDIDES, and, if he had only thrown in MONTEZUMA and SAKYA MUNI, we might almost have been reminded of the omniscience of the Daily Telegraph. However, all Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE'S great names came naturally into their places, and decorated a friendly talk which, on the whole, was a panegyric of liberal studies. The LORD RECTOR may or may not have been aware of it, but it is true that only a small minority of his undergraduate audience is ever likely to share his pleasure in reading ARISTOPHANES. The mass of the students at no University acquires the power of studying ARISTOPHANES with comfort. When Sir STAFFORD comes home from the House and refreshes himself with the Knights or the Clouds and perhaps is reminded of certain opponents or allies by CLEON and the Sausage-Seller, he is diverting himself in a way never likely to be common. The great Mr. COBDEN can never have enjoyed this recreation, or he would have abstained from his famous remark, recalled by Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, on the comparative merits of the Times and "all the works of THUCYDIDES."

The LORD MAYOR, Mr. GLADSTONE, and Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE appear to be the chief Grecians of modern politics. In Scotland, no less than in England, the study of the classics needs all the help Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE can give it. The intelligent public, North and South, is wakening to the truth that Greek is of little use in dealing with French bagmen or German waiters. To the corollary that Greek should be disendowed it is but a short step. "How much should we lose," said the new LORD RECTOR, "of the pleasure and advantage with which we read the "poetry of our own land and of other countries if we had "not at hand, or in our minds, the poetry of early ages "from which it has been so largely borrowed, or by which, "at all events, it has been so largely inspired." Perfectly true, but not a good argument with a reforming Edinburgh Baillie, who thinks BURNS (as the Philistine in THEOCRITUS thought HOMER) poet enough for all the world, and all other bards superfluous. It is the custom for the LORD RECTOR to offer a prize to be competed for by the students, and Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE might have devoted his gift to the encouragement of classical studies. But he preferred to aid and abet historical pursuits. No doubt he was well advised. The University of Edinburgh has lately produced a few students of really wonderful proficiency in Greek and Latin scholarship. But, by the nature of things, these scholars must be few, and an historical prize will bring together a much larger "field," and encourage a wider emulation. As Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE went on to praise the study of original documents in history, and to defend ALEXANDER the Great, by the evidence of DEMOSTHENES, against assailants like Mr. PALGRAVE, perhaps he means his prize to encourage "ancient history" rather than the modern history into which party spirit, more or less, must always enter.

Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, according to Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, is a pleasing example of that moderation in party spirit of which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN himself sets so singular an example. Sir STAFFORD told his young friends that he would rather see a trifling exaggeration of party spirit among them than an entire absence of interest in politics. The truth is that every one who cares for politics at all is a party man. "Every little infant wot is born alive is a little "Liberal or a Conservative," says a poet, whom we quote from memory, almost as artless as the minstrel lately quoted by Sir JOHN ASTLEY. Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE'S constituents, though Scotch, are by a big majority Conservatives, as they proved by electing him. Whether or not they will take his advice about moderating their party spirit we do not know. The Liberal peers and Liberal orators, being "in," are all in favour, at present, of sweet reasonableness in discussing the character of opponents. Four years ago the Liberals were "out," and the reasonableness of Mr. GLADSTONE, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, and Mr. BRIGHT was less sweet than might have been desired. The leaders of both parties are precisely like cricketers who want to "no-ball" throwing when they are at the wicket, and who throw as hard as they can, and at all parts of the batter's body, as soon as they are in the field. How often has Mr. BRIGHT stigmatized the Tories in general by the pretty popular name which has a prominent place in the polemics of the slum and the discussions of the cab-stand! Was it a Liberal or a Tory disputant who habitually brought the word "con-"victs" into his arguments? Was it a Liberal journal which declared that a certain Tory statesman was "stained "with blood and smirched with lusts." And is the same periodical now vastly shocked by Tory license of language? Oh! parable of the kettle and the pot, when will politicians take thy mild wisdom to their hearts? Perhaps the students who elected Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE read the local Liberal print, the Scotsman. If they do, what a Rabelaisian library of political proprieties they may collect from its refined columns. Take a recent effusion on Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, a statesman for whose works and ways we have never expressed a high esteem. Lord RANDOLPH recently said that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN was not a very consistent person. He declaimed against persons who neither toil nor spin, and then he allied himself with a young nobleman whose lack of industry and whose love of the dramatic art unfitted him, Lord RANDOLPH thought, to be the companion of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, that austere toiler. We are not at all inclined to defend the language (which partook of the nature of slang) in which Lord RANDOLPH exposed the inconsistencies of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He also hinted that Mr. GLADSTONE was not unacquainted with the arts of Mr. CRUMMLES. "Who puts these things in the papers, I can't think," said Mr. CRUMMLES, when he was made the subject of what is technically known as "a friendly par." Certainly Mr. GLADSTONE gets a great many "friendly pars," pairs of trousers, walking-sticks, axes (presented in one case by an excited person from Birmingham), and similar testimonials. News of these things, and of all that Mr. GLADSTONE does, appears in the papers. We can't think who puts in those things any more than Mr. CRUMMLES. Moreover, Mr. GLADSTONE is not alone in having all his deeds and sayings proclaimed on the house-top. The movements of poets, professors, actors, are chronicled almost enthusiastically in prints devoted to these distinguished men, and so, not long ago, were the remarks and performances of Mr. OSCAR WILDE. All this is part of the modern system of advertisement, and Lord RANDOLPH dared to apply the general truth to the particular case of the PREMIER. Now if one wants to rebuke the language of ill-temper, flippancy, violence, one should set an example of better style and taste. Here is how the Scotsman set about replying to Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL; we merely extract the plums from the haggis:—

> Shameful mis-statements,
> Absolute fal-choods,
> Gross personalities,
> Malignant libeller,
> Wretched work,
> Saying the things that are not.
> Vilest of lampoons,
> Vulgar libeller,
> Vilest falsehoods,
> Barest accusations.

And the Scotsman ends by calling its victim a "fellow" in the sense which nearly caused bloodshed between Mr. TUPMAN and his revered leader, and by mouthing about "horse-whipping." Is it not clear that the youth of Edinburgh have here a very bad example before their eyes? Will they not be apt to associate political discussion with the style of the intoxicated Newhaven fishwoman? Obviously the young men require the example of Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE'S urbanity and courtesy. It is so easy to make things uncomfortable for an opponent without calling him a "blackguard," a "liar," a "wretch," a "malignant libeller," and so forth. No one is much harmed by this palæolithic style of invective—a style peculiarly out of place when an enemy is being reproached with rudeness and violence.

FIGURE-SKATING.

IT is scarcely more than half-a-century since figure-skating became an art in England. The earliest of the clubs devoted to it was formed in 1830; and although before that time there were a few men, at the Universities and elsewhere, who could skate gracefully and well, still the figures they cut were mostly crude and irregular; and of concerted movements, in which more than two men could join, they had only the most vague and imperfect idea. The cramped "8's" and stunted "3's," and other poor little figures which they laboriously accomplished on long-toed, flat-bladed skates, were hardly more deserving to be called the products of an art than the woad-stains on an ancient Briton would be entitled to the name of artistic paintings. But since 1830, when "The Skating Club" first pitched its tent on the banks of the Serpentine, the craft and mystery of skating has been developed with amazing rapidity. Originating in England, it spread very quickly to Edinburgh, and soon afterwards to Canada, whence it has much more slowly found its way to the United States. The chief impediment which has retarded our home skaters is the lack of that most important accessory, the ice upon which to skate. For a quarter of a century past the average of skating winters has been about one in five. The Northern counties are a little better off in this respect than London; but, as compared with any country having the same longitude, Great Britain and Ireland are absurdly handicapped, and enjoy not more than one day's skating for every eight or ten of the Germans, Russians, and Americans. Attempts of various kinds have been made to remove these grievous disadvantages and put our skaters more on a level with their rivals in other lands. The most notable of them was, of course, the introduction of roller-skates, which for a time were thought likely to do away with the necessity for ice. But experience has shown that this sort of skating is not capable of the same high development as the other, and that it is likewise wanting in that vivacity and ease of motion which is one of the chief charms of the art. The best men have not taken kindly to the new practice, and have not found that it assists them much, though it does to some extent, towards excellence on the ice. A much more successful and promising expedient is the formation of rinks made of real ice artificially produced. There is one of these rinks, as we believe, still in existence at Southport; and it is largely frequented by the more ambitious and energetic English skaters, many of whom have by means of their practice there far eclipsed their equals of 1880, who took no such pains during the last two years. Still it is only men who have a good deal of leisure and spare money who can go to Southport on such an errand. What is wanted is that a similar rink should be started in London; and it would not be a bad mode of employing the large surplus funds of "the Skating Club" to devote them to originating or promoting a plan of this kind.

In spite of all the disadvantages which have thus interfered with skating in England, it must be admitted that the art has within the last half-century made extraordinary progress. We shall see presently that, in the opinion of many good judges, some of the London skaters can hold their own even with the cracks of the Canadian and American rinks. On those rare occasions when the English ponds and rivers are frozen hard, the people both great and small rush to the ice with a zeal that nothing seems to subdue. The most hard-worked business-men are seen with their skates on at sunrise; and while they are at it, they lose no time in idling or fooling about, but grind away at their figures with all the serious earnestness of students who are solving an astronomical problem or composing an epic poem. The science of skating has, moreover, quite lately been developed in a masterly and almost perfect manner. It is now just nineteen years since an article appeared in this Review suggesting the idea of reducing to a set code the rules of elegant skating, and describing on paper the figures most admired in this country. There was, indeed, at that time a book on the subject, written by a Scotch skater of high merit; but it is no discredit to him to say that this first attempt was incomplete, and in many respects harmonized badly with the accepted views of the English clubs. Our hint was, however, not long in producing its effect. In 1869 appeared the first edition of what is now the standard work on figure-skating, edited with immense care and complete success by two of the oldest and most accomplished members of the London Club. The work has since been re-edited with large additions, embodying many of the results achieved in the winter of 1870-1 in the way of new figures; and it may now be affirmed that the theory of artistic skating lies clearly defined, and needs only to be practically worked out by those who aspire to excellence in it. Two magnificent skating winters have since been enjoyed in England; but all that they have done is to confirm the views adopted by the editors of this book, and to show that, as they said, the leading principles, once understood, are capable of indefinite extension in the way of practical results. It would be hopeless to attempt any detailed explanation of the figures now established as favourites amongst English clubs; but an idea may be very easily formed of their variety and difficulty. The four leading movements—forward and backward, on the outside and inside edge—are combined most naturally in one of two ways; either by means of a "three," which entirely reverses the movement, as from outside forward to inside back, or by a "change of edge," which only reverses the poise of the body, as from outside forward to inside forward. When both changes are made within a short time of one another, the result is a "Q"; when either movement is repeated the result is either a "double," "half-double," treble turn, &c. in the one case, or a "serpentine" line in the other. By interspersing "Q's" with "doubles" an endless complication of movements is obtained; and, as the first-rate skater is able to continue his work upon one foot for an almost unlimited time without any new impulse, we are landed at once in an art capable of infinite development. There remains, however, to be still mentioned another turn, the most difficult of all—which seems to complete the series. This is the celebrated "rocking turn," by which outside forward is converted into outside back, and so on with the other edges, thus doubling at once the whole number of combinations. "Loops" are only an extreme development of simple edges; and so are "cross-cuts" of "half-doubles." But it is needless to penetrate further into the mysteries of technical terms. It will be more interesting as well as more simple to refer to some of the new principles which modern skaters have established.

Of these undoubtedly the most remarkable is the rehabilitation of the inside edge forwards. For near forty years after skating became an art this particular movement was tabooed as ungraceful, and excluded almost entirely from set figures. The skating confraternity is indebted to few persons so much as to the ingenious wight who boldly affirmed that there need be nothing ungraceful in it. A new attitude, arrived at by merely keeping the "off" foot in the rear, was found to remove the chief objections to this edge; and skaters of the first rank are now seen bravely careering along upon it, perpetrating without fear and without reproach that which twenty years ago would have been deemed an unpardonable heresy. Many of the other changes which have most enriched the modern art are indirect results of this revolution in taste. The "Q's" have by reason of it attained an immense accession of strength. The "serpentines" have benefited still more. Thus "continuous" 8's on the forward edge were formerly unorthodox, since one-half of the figure must needs be done on the inside edge. They are now quite orthodox, and have become a necessary qualification for the good skater. Some other innovations are of much more doubtful merit, and more especially the introduction of two-foot figures, adopted from the American school. The best English masters continue to speak with disapproval of them; but their practice is found occasionally to accord little with their preaching; and the "grape-vine" and other Yankee abominations may be seen forcing their way into the very sanctuary of high-class skating in the Toxophilite grounds.

English skating retains still, however, its wholly distinctive marks, which continue to be regarded, and probably with good reason, as peculiar excellences. Chief among them is to be mentioned the unbent knee—first and most rigidly exacted essential of a good English figure-skater. Almost all the best Transatlantic skaters offend against this rule, which, indeed, they contemptuously ignore; but our own traditions, and, we may add, our own ideas of what is graceful, are as unbending in this matter as the joint in question is expected to be. Another rigorous principle is the exclusion of small circles and narrow curves. Foreign skaters probably see little to admire in the wide, sweeping strokes prescribed by our clubs. And possibly where "pace" is no object, and "time" has not to be regarded, there may be no great merit in them. But for the purpose of concerted figures, in which these two things are of vital moment, those rather grandiose movements, instinct with what our clubmen regard as the poetry of motion, are not only the most useful, but quite indispensable. It is in this matter of combined or concerted figures, after all, that our country claims to hold undeniably first rank. There are not, indeed, wanting those who, even here, regard them as silly and worthless. But such is not the view which we believe will ever prevail. Those men who own them will be found almost invariably to be wanting either in physical strength and condition, or else devoid of that notion of harmony required for the success of such figures. It is more rational to believe that exercises which require so extraordinary an amount of esprit de corps, and try so severely the individual judgment of pace and time, will always carry off the palm in England, just as cricket is always likely to be more popular than racquets, and an eight-oared match than a sculling race. In order to understand what is meant by a concerted figure, in the truest sense of the word, it is necessary to imagine eight first-rate skaters standing at the corners of a large octagon. A. and B., who stand facing north and south, open the ball by crossing one another closely in the centre of this space, and skating outwards in the first stroke of a complicated movement which is to bring them back face to face with one another. A., who started in a north-west direction, will return to the centre facing to the south-west; B., who started towards the south-east, will return facing north-east. But, meanwhile, immediately after they have passed the centre, C. and D., who stood facing east and west, will have likewise started on their corresponding course, and close after them will come E. and F., who stood facing north-west and south-east, followed lastly by G. and H., who faced the other two points of the compass. Now each and all of these pairs as they swing round the large outer circle—now on one edge, now on another; now backwards, and now forwards—are bound to keep exactly opposite one another, and to make each change of movement exactly at the same instant. As the whole set of movements comes to an end, in rush the several pairs to the common centre again, passing one another shoulder to shoulder as they start on the other foot to execute the reverse movement. Let us consider for a moment what all this implies. It is not so much the actual difficulty of the individual figure described on the ice which tests the skater's skill, as the power of so timing his twists and turns that all shall go harmoniously together, and that he shall at the supreme moment find himself exactly where he should be, prepared to cross his partner without the mistake of a fraction of a yard or a fraction of a second. As the men converge together they must avoid chances of collision which look to the spectator inevitable. As they shoot out again, like balls discharged by a catapult, they have to steer equally clear of those who are coming in. The slightest miscalculation or mistake either of head or limb will bring the whole set to grief and make an ignominious example of the offender. Estimate the influence of this fear always impending over the head of each performer, with the consciousness that a "gallery" of critics has its eyes fixed upon him, and you have a fair idea of the excitement which attends such a performance. But then there must be added to this the unavoidable "exaltation of nerves" caused by the rapid motion as each difficult turn is made, the sounding ring of the ice as the eight men swing quickly along, the tension of muscles, the consciousness of success as the figure speeds on with increasing force, and in fine the general dash and "go" of the whole performance. With all these elements of excitement to stir the blood and animate the frame, English skaters may be pardoned for thinking that there is no exercise so enjoyable as a well-skated Club figure.

The headquarters of artistic skating in England are still at the rink of the "Skating Club," which amongst its 150 regular subscribers and a few ladies and other honorary members includes the pick of the national talent, both old and young. It must, however, be acknowledged that both the new Oxford Club—a worthy successor of its defunct predecessor founded in 1838—the Wimbledon, Crystal Palace, and some other clubs, make vigorous and meritorious efforts to rival the success of the older institution. It is said, and on the faith of certain documentary evidence too, that one at least of these younger clubs has heretical tendencies, and allows its men when skating in a set figure to vary the rule by which each pair is kept to its own bearings in the circle—that is to say, that a man who started facing north may find himself as he begins a fresh evolution facing diagonally east or west. But, as long as the divergence from "club rules" is no greater than this, there is no great fear of schismatic teachings; and, as a rule, the local societies maintain strictly enough the sacred traditions of the insular school. It is perhaps necessary to mention a movement which during the last three years has attracted to itself the notice of figure-skaters. An Association, soi-disant National, has been started with the avowed object of testing and certifying the relative excellence of different performers. It has offered "badges" of various grades to be worn by those who succeeded in displaying various degrees of proficiency. The wearing of these decorations does not at first strike one as a very happy or very "English" way of proclaiming a man's own capabilities, which would, as one might suppose, best appear by his actual performances on the ice. But the practice, if adopted, will be, at the worst, a harmless vanity; and if the Association can raise funds sufficient to pay for the badges and for the umpires to award them, no one will grudge it the satisfaction which it may enjoy or impart to the recipients of such honours. The example of some other sports would, however, seem to teach us that any attempt at more active competition for prizes in this department of skating would not tend to the credit or advantage of an exercise which has hitherto been essentially and purely of an "amateur" character.

CARDINAL NEWMAN ON INSPIRATION.

IT is almost a truism to say that the question of the inspiration and interpretation of Scripture—for the two are of course closely connected—holds a prominent, if not the most prominent, place among the controversies of the day, as well between different schools of religious thinkers as between Christians and unbelievers. The question indeed is not by any means a new one, though the rapid advance of physical and what may be called critical science during the last half-century has given it a fresh impulse and direction, and is no doubt regarded with exultation by many sceptics and with sincere alarm by many devout believers as having fatally or all but fatally discredited the evidences of Revelation. Not to speak however of the early apologists against Paganism or of Origen's allegorical scheme of hermeneutics, from the fourth century at least the scriptural difficulty came into dispute between Catholic and heretical writers, as may be seen from St. Augustine's treatises in defence of Genesis against the Manicheans; and it is noteworthy that he insists on a spiritual sense which accompanies, and may sometimes supersede the literal meaning. Nor was the Church of that age so imprudent as to commit herself to such theories as were propounded by the ingenious monk Cosmas Indicopleustes in the sixth century, whose Topographia Christiana rejects among other things the existence of the Antipodes as an unscriptural and unchristian error; and when two centuries later the Irish priest Virgilius asserted it, Pope Zachary—wiser than his successors in Galileo's time—refrained from condemning him though he was denounced by St. Boniface, and he became Bishop of Salsburg and was canonized. In the seventeenth century a French Protestant writer, La Peyrère, endeavoured to solve Old Testament difficulties by isolating Biblical history and maintaining that Adam was the father not of the human race but of the Jews only, while the rest of mankind lay outside the sphere of revelation, and he also denied the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, and in various ways restricted, without at all intending to repudiate, the miraculous element in Scripture. It was the scarcely disguised purpose of the later German school, of which Lessing and Kant may be called leaders, rather to wrest the Bible into conformity with views independently acquired than to ascertain the original meaning. Lessing expressly tells us that no doctrine should be accepted as scriptural which is not in harmony with "reason," by which he must be taken to understand the general scope and tendency of modern thought, and Kant's language is still more rationalistic. In our own day however, as was implied just now, the controversy has assumed larger proportions, and it concerns equally, if not in precisely the same way, all sections of Christians. When Chillingworth declared that "the Bible only is the religion of Protestants," he meant that they would accept no doctrines they did not hold to be contained in the Bible, but he knew that Roman Catholics also profess to find their doctrines there, and that, if the inspiration of Scripture were denied, it would be very hard indeed for the Church of Rome to make good her teaching or her claim to teach. In some ways, as will presently appear, the difficulty may even be thought to press more heavily on Rome than on Protestantism. Be that as it may, the question is one of common interest, for, apart from some subordinate details about apocryphal books and the like, the ordinary belief of what are called orthodox Protestants about inspiration does not very materially differ from that of Roman Catholics. Both alike therefore may be expected to turn with interest to a paper on the subject from the pen of the greatest living Roman Catholic divine, Cardinal Newman, just published in the Nineteenth Century, the more so as it is, we believe, the first serious attempt in our own day to grapple with the question by any representative of that communion. A short paper of Cardinal Newman's about it written for private use was printed two years ago with his permission at the end of an article of Mr. Regan Paul's in the Century, but it only dealt, very briefly and partially, with certain points on which his opinion had been asked. In the present essay he discusses the general bearings of the question as a whole with his accustomed clearness and precision, though there remain some points, by no means unimportant, on which we are left in doubt as to his judgment. When we bear in mind the subtlety of intellect and marvellous mastery of language characteristic of the essayist, we shall best do justice to his treatment of the subject by expounding it, as far as possible, in his own words. It may further be due to him to add that he ends by "unreservedly submitting what he has written to the judgment of the Holy See, being more anxious that the question should be satisfactorily answered than that" his "own answer should prove to be in every respect the right one." We may take it however as tolerably certain that the perfect soundness of his theology will not be called in question by the authorities of his Church.

The Cardinal, as is his wont, goes at once to the root of the matter—by explaining that the alleged difficulty he sets himself to examine is that "we Catholics demand of our converts an assent to views and interpretations of Scripture which modern science and historical research have utterly discredited"; and he refers especially to the charge formulated in M. Renan's recently published Souvenirs that "the Roman Catholic Church insists on its members believing a great deal more in pure criticism and pure history than the strictest Protestants exact from their pupils or flocks," so that a convert to Rome "will find the little finger of the Catholic Church thicker than the loins of Protestantism." The question therefore is on what does the Church "insist," or in other words, what does she oblige her members to believe on pain of forfeiting communion with her? The general answer is that the Church thus enforces only "the matters contained in that Revelation of Truth, written or unwritten, which came into the world from our Lord and His Apostles," and which Councils or Popes speaking ex cathedrâ have declared to be such. This does not include particular opinions about the authorship or date of this or that book, or inferences drawn even by high authorities like St. Jerome or St. Augustine or St. Thomas. To this a proviso is added that sometimes a new opinion may be so startling and unsettling to ordinary minds, although it may prove in the end to be true, that "there is a duty of silence when there is no obligation of belief." That is quite an intelligible view in itself, but how far it will serve historically to explain the decrees of the Holy See in "Galileo's case"—to which the Cardinal applies it—is another question, far too wide for parenthetical discussion and on which, as it does not directly affect the present argument, we need not enter here. To proceed to what is obligatory and de fide, we are told that there are two such dogmas, one concerning the authority of Scripture, the other its interpretation; as to the first, "we hold it to be, in all matters of faith and morals, divinely inspired throughout; as to its interpretation, we hold that the Church is, in faith and morals, the one infallible expounder of that inspired text." The Council of Trent enumerates the Canonical books, the Vatican Council adds, under anathema, that "the entire books, with all their parts, are divinely inspired." And whereas the Florentine Council declared that God is "unus et idem utriusque Testamenti Auctor," the Vatican more explicitly defines that the separate libri of each Testament "Deum habent Auctorem." But here it must be remembered that the Latin Auctor is not equivalent to the English "Author"; its proper sense is "originator," "inventor," "founder," "primary cause." And now follows the very important question "in what respect are the Canonical books inspired?" We give the answer in the Cardinal's words:—

> It cannot be in every respect, unless we are bound de fide to believe that "terra in æternum stat," and that heaven is above us, and that there are no antipodes. And it seems unworthy of Divine Greatness, that the Almighty should in His revelation of Himself to us undertake mere secular duties, and assume the office of a narrator, as such, or an historian, or geographer, except so far as the secular matters bear directly upon the revealed truth. The Councils of Trent and the Vatican fulfil this anticipation; they tell us distinctly the object and the promise of Scripture inspiration. They specify "faith and moral conduct" as the drift of that teaching which has the guarantee of inspiration. . . .
> But while the Councils, as has been shown, lay down so emphatically the inspiration of Scripture in respect to "faith and morals," it is remarkable that they do not say a word directly as to its inspiration in matters of fact. Yet are we therefore to conclude that the record of facts in Scripture does not come under the guarantee of its inspiration? we are not so to conclude, and for this plain reason:—the sacred narrative, carried on through so many ages, what is it but the very matter for our faith and rule of our obedience? what but that narrative itself is the supernatural teaching, in order to which inspiration is given? What is the whole history, traced out in Scripture from Genesis to Esdras and thence on to the end of the Acts of the Apostles, but a manifestation of Divine Providence, on the one hand interpretative, on a large scale and with analogical applications, of universal history, and on the other preparatory, typical and predictive, of the Evangelical Dispensation?

The Bible views facts in a way in which no Greek or Latin historian, or modern writer, such as Niebuhr, Ewald, Grote, or Michelet, can view them. In this sense "it has God for its Author, even though the finger of God traced no words but the Decalogue," and thus "Scripture is inspired in all its parts which bear on faith, including matters of fact"; miracles, we are bidden to note, are "doctrinal facts." The writer goes on to infer from the "multiform and copious" contents of the inspired record, as distinct from a code, or a hymn, or a creed, the necessity of "a formal judge and standing expositor of its words," that is of an infallible teaching Church, as well on à priori grounds as from the experience of the last three centuries. "How are private readers satisfactorily to distinguish what is didactic and what is historical, what is fact and what is vision, what is allegorical and what is literal, what is idiomatic and what is grammatical, what is enunciated formally and what occurs obiter, what is only of temporary and what is of lasting obligation?" The Church accordingly is the one and sole divinely guided interpreter of Scripture, but from this again it follows that "till the Infallible Authority formally interprets a passage, there is nothing heretical in advocating a contrary interpretation"—with one proviso however, which illustrates that deep reverence for patristic authority Dr. Newman has consistently exhibited alike in his earlier and his later career. A certain interpretation of a doctrinal text may be so strongly supported by the unanimous consent of the Fathers as to be "virtually or practically as dogmatic as if it were a formal judgment" of the Church, for, "though the Fathers were not inspired, yet their united testimony is of supreme authority." The general result then is that the Roman Catholic scholar is bound "never to forget that he is handling the Word of God, which, by reason of the difficulty of always drawing the line between what is human and what is divine, cannot be put on the level of other books, as is now the fashion to do, but has the nature of a Sacrament, which is outward and inward, and a channel of supernatural grace." This is of course to allow that there is in Scripture a human as well as a Divine element, though it is often difficult to distinguish them.

The essayist proceeds to apply and illustrate in detail the broad principles he has laid down. It is sometimes asked whether the books or the writers are inspired, and the true answer is, both; "the books are inspired because the writers were inspired to write them," and hence it is natural enough that there should often be "a double sense" in the text, literal and spiritual, nor is it at all necessary to assume that the writer was always conscious of the spiritual meaning, or even conscious of his own inspiration. Some prophets did, and others did not, understand the higher and divine sense of their own words. When David composed under inspiration the Miserere (Psalm 51) he may have had no further thought than "that he was personally asking forgiveness and spiritual help." We can hardly suppose the author of Ecclesiasticus would apologize for his style or the author of the Second Book of Maccabees for the imperfection of his matter, if they knew themselves to be inspired. It follows again from the recognition of human agency in the matter that an inspired book may be composed, wholly or in part, of "outlying materials" collected from uninspired sources, as the second book of Maccabees is professedly an abridgment of the five books compiled by Jason of Cyrene, and St. Luke tells us that he made careful inquiry of others before beginning to write his Gospel; and "Moses may have incorporated in his manuscript as much from foreign documents as is generally maintained by the critical school." But still the books as we have them, from whatever sources derived, "have passed through the minds and from the fingers of inspired penmen," and that is enough. A book may be accepted as inspired, though not a word of it is an original document, which according to a learned writer in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible (Dr. Westcott) is the case with the first book of Esdras. So again "the Chaldee and Greek portions of the book of Daniel" (which appear under different names in the Anglican Apocrypha) may be written by penmen inspired in matters of faith and morals, though not by Daniel, and the Psalter has notoriously many authors besides David, whence the Council of Trent purposely calls it Psalterium Davidicum, not Davidis; all that is wanted in such cases is "an inspired Editor."

And so again, whether or not the last verses of St. Mark's, and two portions of St. John's Gospel, belong to those Evangelists respectively, matters not as regards their inspiration; for the Church has recognized them as portions of that sacred narrative which precedes or embraces them.

Nor does it matter, whether one or two Isaiahs wrote the book which bears that Prophet's name; the Church, without settling this point, pronounces it inspired in respect of faith and morals, both Isaiahs being inspired, and, if this be assured to us, all other questions are irrelevant and unnecessary.

Nor do the Councils forbid our holding that there are interpolations or additions in the sacred text, say, the last chapter of the Pentateuch, provided they are held to come from an inspired penman, such as Esdras, and are thereby authoritative in faith and morals.

From what has been last said it follows, that the titles of the Canonical books, and their ascription to definite authors, either do not come under their inspiration, or need not be accepted literally.

It is no matter of faith that the Epistle to the Hebrews was written by St. Paul, or Wisdom or Ecclesiasticus or Ecclesiastes by Solomon.

All this is clear enough so far and sufficiently meets certain plausible objections, but we are left in doubt as to whether—apart from all disputes about date or authorship, which are put aside as irrelevant—it is necessary to accept as canonical and inspired, in spite of all critical difficulties, whatever is contained in the received text, say of the Vulgate. Cardinal Newman implies that the disputed passages in the Gospels of St. Mark and St. John—which have in fact a vast, if not preponderating, weight of critical authority in favour—must be accepted as such; but would he say the same e.g. of the famous passage about the Three heavenly Witnesses, which the general verdict of modern criticism—we are of course aware that there are still respectable authorities on the other side—rejects as spurious? And where would he draw the line? What place in short may be legitimately assigned to criticism in fixing the sacred text? He speaks of "the multitude of various manuscript readings" as a matter still sub judice; but if it is permissible to discuss the relative claims of various readings, it seems to follow that the claim of disputed passages to a place in the inspired text must also be open to critical discussion. Or does he hold this to be excluded by a rigid interpretation of the integri libri cum omnibus suis partibus of the Tridentine and Vatican decrees—a phrase pretty certainly devised to secure the canonical authority of what Protestants had consigned to the Apocrypha? It would be difficult to reconcile such a view with the numerous recensions of the text of the Vulgate itself, involving several thousand alterations, which have taken place since the Council of Trent under papal sanction. The point is at all events one on which the essayist leaves his readers in doubt. On another point he is more explicit; there are "obiter dicta" in Scripture about matters of fact, which do not come within the sphere of its inspiration, "since they can otherwise be perfectly well known," and thus it is not matter of faith that Nebuchadnezzar was King of Nineveh, as stated in the book of Judith, or that Tobias's dog wagged its tail. Our aim throughout has been rather to exhibit Cardinal Newman's treatment of this grave question than to criticize it, and we should be precluded by limitations of space, if by no other reason, from discussing it on its merits here. It will be observed however that his theory of scriptural inspiration allows considerable latitude in handling such portions of the text as do not concern "faith and morals"; its application to the scientific and historical difficulties urged in our own day, e.g. as to the creation or fall of man, would largely depend in each case on where the line is drawn between mere fact and fact held to have a doctrinal significance.

M. MASSENET has had the good luck to be most ably seconded by his librettists in his latest production, and we are not far from believing that he has found in the joint work of MM. Meilhac and Philippe Gille one of the most remarkable operatic poems which has hitherto been put before the public. The idea of seeking for a subject for the lyric stage in Manon Lescaut is by no means a new one; and, until the present time, it has never been so successfully dealt with. It has naturally been found necessary to make many and important changes in the story in order to fit it for its present purpose; but these alterations have been made with rare skill, and we must add that the essence of the original has been preserved to a remarkable degree. M. Massenet has on his side done his utmost to put himself in sympathy with the personages and the epoch of which he treats; but we find in him an unfortunate resemblance to Mr. Dick in David Copperfield, King Charles's head in this case being represented by Le roi de Lahore. In the overture, in which we are introduced to the principal motives on which the opera is built, and in which M. Massenet shows, we think, a distinct advance in knowledge of orchestration, we find ourselves face to face with the gravest defect that is to be met with in his score—a very fatiguing alternation between the piano and the forte, the change being almost invariably brusque, and the effect produced being, as far as we can ascertain, wholly uncalled for by the dramatic action of the opera. The curtain rises on the inn-yard at Amiens; the coach arrives, and a crowd gathers to see the travellers. In the chorus which follows M. Massenet has gone far towards spoiling a very effective piece of writing by his undiscriminating use of the cymbals—a fault from which few modern French composers are free. But before giving any analysis of this work, it may be worth while to give some short account of the story of Manon, which is, as we have already said, somewhat different from the novel in which the librettists have sought their inspiration. When we first meet Manon at the inn at Amiens she is under the protection of Lescaut, who, in the hands of MM. Meilhac and Gille, becomes her cousin, instead of being her brother, as in the original story. At the inn she meets De Brétigny, De Morfontaine, and Des Grieux, with whom she escapes to Paris. In Paris Manon, tempted by De Brétigny's great fortune, connives at the violent arrest of Des Grieux by his father's agents; but, on hearing that her former lover has entered the church, her passion for him revives, and she succeeds in luring him back to her. We afterwards find them together at the "Hôtel de Transylvanie," where she persuades him to play, while Lescaut presents him with cards which have been "packed" without his knowledge. He plays with De Morfontaine, and the fraud is detected. Manon and Des Grieux are arrested. In the last act Manon dies in his arms on the road to Havre at the moment when he has succeeded in liberating her, owing to the timely bribing of the soldiers under whose charge she was to have been transported. Every scene is skilfully arranged, and the libretto throughout displays those rarest of qualities in such compositions—thoroughly well-written verse and great simplicity of language.

To return to the music. M. Massenet has evidently started with the intention of setting aside the machinery of Italian opera, with its duets and trios and other conventionalities; but he has by no means succeeded, and these old friends are continually starting up in the score of Manon, with the thinnest attempts at putting on new faces which could well be imagined. The practice to which he has resorted of accompanying spoken dialogue by the orchestra, which has been referred to in some quarters as being an innovation, has been employed before—notably by Mozart in Zaïde. It is in some of these passages that M. Massenet has, to our thinking, obtained his happiest effects. In the first act, Manon's air—which follows her throughout the opera, calls for special praise; it is very charming, and thoroughly in character. Lescaut's reply to it is somewhat heavy, and in one passage suggests a comparison with Offenbach, which is not wholly to M. Massenet's advantage. The scene which follows between Manon and Des Grieux is fresh and original; although the accompaniment, in which the bassoons predominate, is rather noisy, and perhaps unnecessarily complicated. At the end of this scene they start for Paris in De Morfontaine's carriage, which has been previously put at Manon's disposition. In the next scene, in which Lescaut falls upon De Morfontaine, who is ridiculed by the crowd, there is nothing which calls for special notice. The following act takes place in Paris; and, although much of the music it contains reminds one far too much of Le roi de Lahore, it is here that we find one of the most striking numbers in the opera. The occasion for the introduction of this delicate melody is furnished by Manon's reading of the letter Des Grieux has just written to his father—

Ah! mon cousin, excusez-moi;
Je suis encore tout étourdie—

On l'appelle Manon; elle eut hier seize ans.

The accompaniment for horns and harps is admirable, and the development of the motive throughout the scene displays M. Massenet's talent in the most favourable light. The entry of Lescaut and De Brétigny is, however, less happy; and we remark generally throughout his latest work that M. Massenet's attempts at violent contrast are apt to be heavy and weak. Manon's song, "Adieu, notre petite table," is a feeble piece of sentimentality, of which the disagreeable effect is enhanced by an irritatingly commonplace violin accompaniment. The scene which follows, at the end of which Des Grieux is carried off, is not wanting in dramatic force; and we must pause to dwell upon the admirable skill with which throughout the act the writers of the libretto have avoided representing Manon in an odious light. She is made to appear under the influence of an irresistible impulse, which is, for the moment, stronger than her love for Des Grieux.

The third act takes place at Cours la Reine, where a "fête populaire" is taking place. The prelude is largely written; but in the chorus which follows King Charles's head—we should have said Le roi de Lahore—becomes painfully evident again. Manon, on her entry, sings a bravura, "Je marche sur tous les chemins," ending on a high D, which is, from beginning to end, suggestive of an air composed for a musical-box, and which is, moreover, thoroughly out of character with the rest of the score. The dialogue which follows between Manon and Des Grieux's father is thoroughly well arranged; and, although the orchestration does not offer any striking originality, it is not the less very effective. It is in this interview that Manon learns that Des Grieux is at St.-Sulpice. The minuet which is danced in this act has been completely ruined by M. Massenet's unaccountable overlaying of the score with brass and cymbals—one of the most intolerable manifestations of false taste of which he has ever been guilty. In the fourth act the scene is laid in the "parloir" of St.-Sulpice. The act opens with an elaborately written chorus, which seems designed to show off M. Massenet's powers as a contrapuntist, and which severely tries the chorus, who do not come out of the ordeal as well as they might. The chorus is followed by a scene between Des Grieux and his father, which is a miracle of wearisomeness, and to this succeeds one of the "clous" of the opera—the scene in which Manon wins her lover back. The situation is admirably worked up to; but it seems to us that M. Massenet has thrown away his opportunity. The duet between Des Grieux and Manon, in spite of the dexterity with which it is written, leaves one cold, and it must be added that the scoring throughout the scene is terribly monotonous. We have noise and vehemence enough, in all conscience, but of real passion not a note. As in all other work of M. Massenet's with which we have become acquainted, we feel the presence of a remarkable talent, polished by careful application, but we find no hint of true emotion or inspiration.

In the fifth act, in which we come to the Hôtel Transylvanie, the abuse of the brass and the instruments of percussion becomes intolerable, the cymbals are hardly quiet for an instant, and the scoring throughout the earlier portion of this act seems to us to be a hopelessly vulgar imitation of Berlioz at his worst. Lescaut's song, "C'est ici que celle que j'aime," has, however, a certain character of its own, and seems to us, despite the great success obtained by a waltz sung by Manon and her friends, to be the only number in this act which calls for any approbation. De Morfontaine detects the fraud of which Des Grieux has been unconsciously guilty, and rushes out vowing vengeance. Shortly afterwards a knocking is heard at the door—the gamblers attempt to fly in all directions, and the Count des Grieux enters accompanied by guards and an officer of the law. The curtain falls on the arrest of Des Grieux and Manon. In the following and final scene M. Massenet has completely failed to grasp the opportunities provided for him by MM. Meilhac and Gille. The scoring throughout this scene is exasperatingly commonplace. In this scene we find Des Grieux and Lescaut together watching for an opportunity to deliver Manon from her escort. The occasion soon presents itself, and Des Grieux and Manon are left alone on the stage. Here we have further reminiscences of Le roi de Lahore, and, after a sufficiently wearisome duet has been sung, Manon dies and the opera comes to an end. It will have been seen from this account that Manon is a work of very unequal merit containing many striking numbers; but all M. Massenet's dexterity and elaborate juggling with the motives he has assembled together cannot save him from the charge of monotony, and we may add that he appears to us to have yet much to learn as to the use of brass instruments in the orchestra. Considered as a spectacle, Manon must be looked upon as one of the greatest successes of the last few years. From beginning to end the mounting of the piece and the grouping of the costumes is well-nigh perfect. Neither can M. Massenet find any fault with the interpretation of his latest work. Mme. Heilbron is a perfect Manon; her acting is not far from being as good as her singing. We may select her treatment of the difficult second act as being especially admirable. It would be difficult to praise M. Talazac's interpretation of the part of Des Grieux too highly; he has made astonishing progress in his art in the course of the last few months, and the faults of style which were observable when he created "Gerald" in Taklano have completely disappeared. He no longer forces his voice or resorts to the tricks which are so unfortunately prevalent on the French operatic stage. His acting is passionate and natural, and his performance throughout the opera seems to us to give promise of the highest kind for the future. M. Taskin is excellent as Lescaut, and sings and acts with admirable entrain. The performance of the orchestra is remarkable, and would attain to a very high order of merit but for the fact that it occasionally plays too loud. Altogether we have never seen any work so thoroughly well executed and put on the stage at the Opéra-Comique, and we can only regret that the admirable talent displayed on the part of all those concerned in the success of Manon should not have been devoted to a finer work.

THE COMPANY OF AUTHORS.

A "PRELIMINARY Prospectus" announces the formation of a Society of literary men under the style and title of The Company of Authors. Its aims and objects, as set forth in the Prospectus, stripped of all but the essentials, appear to be fourfold. Thus, the question of International Copyright is placed in the front, and the Company pledge themselves to take action—but of what kind we learn nothing. The only line of action which seems likely to be effective, after so many abortive attempts, is to awaken the whole American people as a body to a sense of the national iniquity in continuing to permit the piracy and robbery of English writers; but in order to effect this object, there will be needed something more effective than the occasional cry of indignation and wrath which from time to time escapes from an injured author. On this point we await further information, and shall be glad to hear what the Company propose to attempt. The second of their objects is the promotion of a Bill for the Registration of Titles. The present position of things, especially for novelists and poets, has grown intolerable; the search after a good title which has never yet been used becomes daily more difficult; all the short proverbs in the language are used up, all the better known poetic phrases have served in their turn; and an incredible number of names have been invented and combined. If registration were made compulsory in order to secure a title, there are so many thousands of titles in which it would be mere waste of time and trouble to maintain any right that an immense relief would be immediately felt. The grievance is really greater than it seems because, rightly or wrongly, the tribe of novelists attach so much importance to the title.

The next point is the position of the Company towards publishers. This, we are pleased to observe, is by no means one of hostility, but quite the reverse. The prospectus insists that the interests of authors and publishers are identical, and points out that the author is, in many cases, to blame in any disputes which may arise between himself and his publisher; and this from sheer ignorance of everything connected with the trade of publishing. It is devoutly to be hoped that the efforts of the Company to "maintain friendly relations" between author and publisher may be appreciated on both sides. Lastly, the Association will advise and assist the inexperienced writer in many useful ways. The Company is not apparently intended for trading purposes at all, and does not propose to establish itself as a publishing house. The prospectus, in fact, points to an experiment which is entirely new in the history of literature—the combination of authors for the advancement and protection of their own interests. We shall watch its development and progress with considerable interest.

TRAPPED HARE COURSING.

LAST week a yelling mob of men took possession of Kempton Park, and the roads and railway stations between London and the little village were infested by the most unpleasant set of human creatures that the world has to show. About three ladies on the average attended each day, and the rest of the company was made up of the loud-mouthed, loudly-dressed persons who never come to the surface of our society except when they are shaken up from their natural haunts by the petty convulsion of a race-meeting. Many people imagine that the grotesque horror of certain faces drawn by Hogarth is exaggerated and unreal; those people should see a Kempton crowd when the men are thrown off their guard by excitement. Any spectacle so cruel, so sordid, so vulgar, would be hard to find. The Kempton Park Company give five hundred pounds of added money to a sixty-four dog stake, and the winner receives a thousand pounds, so that some of the finest greyhounds in the country have been brought out and enormous sums have changed hands during the week. Ever since last September hares have been collected from the Wiltshire Downs and Norfolk, and turned down in batches at different points of the Park. The arrangements made to ensure the comfort of the little creatures are so complete that any right-thinking hare should be grateful. Bushy shelters are provided, oats are laid down in great quantities, constant silence is ensured, and well-trained keepers strike terror into poachers. The hares have a wide range of ground, and they often grow stout and strong. But there comes a day when all this secluded luxury must be paid for at a heavy price. The keepers drive the hares in flocks from the open ground, and pen them up in an enclosure where some hundreds of tiny bowers made of furze offer shelter. When a hare is wanted, one of the attendants creeps among the covers and drives her gently towards a wicket; a silent and watchful keeper lifts a swinging trap-door and lets it fall, and the hare is bound on her perilous journey. She runs down a narrow lane which measures about a quarter of a mile in length, and takes matters generally in a very unconcerned way until she reaches the open end of the lane; then she strikes out on to a broad expanse of grass land, and sees that there is not a scrap of cover for half a mile or more. The slipper is crouched behind some low shrubs at the end of the long narrow path, and the hare cannot see her enemies as she goes past toward her distant refuge. The dogs catch sight of her as she shoots past their ambush, and puss soon knows that her life depends on her speed of foot. The dogs plunge at their collars and go straining forward for a few yards; then comes the splendid rush of the fierce, serpentine beasts; then one of the greyhounds draws ahead by imperceptible degrees, and there is a loud crash of exulting profanity from the crowd as the hare makes her arrowy swerve; then roar upon roar as turns and wrenches follow each other in quick succession; and last of all a deafening howl if the hare is snapped up or if she shoots under the line of hurdles.

When once puss has passed the curtain of furze no greyhound can catch her, for she runs through close shrubs which unsight the dogs, and then she has her choice of a hundred little holes by which she may creep into a large plantation. After she has got over her terror the full range of the Park is open to her, and she may have all the delights of oats and police protection until her turn comes to make once more that wild journey from cover to cover. The hares at Kempton have been lovingly termed "demons" by idiomatic writers for the sporting press, and indeed the poor things have run desperately all the week. The whole of the stock kept in the Park seem to be powerful and healthy, and the finest greyhounds in training were beaten again and again after courses that lasted longer by far than the average trials at Altcar. Naturalists say that the hares on the Downs have, by the action of natural selection, grown larger and stronger during the last two score years, and there would really seem to be some truth in the saying. The dogs called London and Nancy Macpherson—both cracks in their way—were nearly beaten to a standstill by a very vigorous hare which took them all over the ground and got through the hurdles with a lead of twelve yards. Even such amazingly swift animals as Hotspur and Ballangeich were baffled, so it is quite evident that the game in the Park is well looked after. But there is something cold-blooded about the very care which is bestowed on fitting the hares to run for their lives. To the imaginative observer every course carries unpleasant suggestions of an execution. The stealthy movements of the keepers, the grim coolness of the slipper, the terrified rush of the creature which finds that its doom has all but come, the cruel yells of the crowd—all these things remind an outsider in a whimsically horrible way of the scenes that used to take place long ago beside the Old Bailey. It may of course be said that the hare really gains by being trapped and brought to Kempton. If she remained on the Downs she would be pestered by deadly lurchers that would chase her for a mile at a stretch; the shepherds' dogs would steal on her unawares; the stoats would break her heart with fear as they began their slow, staunch chase; and the foxes, those inventive fiends, would hunt her with new devices. When she is put down in the Park she is secure of weeks, perhaps months, of calm and plenty. No poacher dare molest her, no sudden noises alarm her, and she feeds on good oats and carrots to her heart's content. She pays for her board and lodging by enduring ten minutes of agony for the amusement of betting men; and certain robust reasoners argue that the bargain between puss and the Kempton Park directors is a fair one as things go. A humorist might ask whether any director would accept a long course of Richmond dinners if he had to pay for them by running for a quarter of a mile in front of a brace of active and uncompromising boarhounds; but this question would rightly be deemed flippant.

The real truth of the matter is that trapped hare coursing is only kept up for the benefit of a rather vile class of men, who care for none of the healthy excitement of sport. Fat and bloated fellows who could not walk a mile over a fallow can easily stand in an enclosure and make wagers; they care for nothing else, and they do nothing else. Of the thousands who go to Kempton, not one per cent. abstain from betting; and a couple of days spent in the grounds will give any decent person an appalling idea of the demoralization wrought by the betting ring. Public-houses all over the country are the outlying ganglia of the villanous system which has its central ganglion at Kempton. To talk about the racing having any effect on improving the breed of dogs is sheer nonsense; neither dogs nor men are improved by the various exhibitions which take place. The dogs are converted into instruments for gambling, and the men do not think about the physical development or the instincts of the brutes; they watch the courses, yell, and consult their betting-books; further than that their interest does not extend. Any man who walks about among the mob in the enclosure will soon learn that the people who carry on the betting might just as well be tossing with halfpennies. They do not know one dog from another, and they pay so little real attention to the racing, and to the action and style of the greyhounds, that they rarely make a good guess as to the winner of a course. An ordinary farmer from the shires, or a pitman who has really seen the true sport of coursing, is very seldom bitten by the greasy capitalists who "make books"; but silly clerks who come down for the day, and who do not know very clearly the difference between a hare and a rabbit, are the betting men's legitimate prey. The foolish lads who stake half a week's wages on a course know, perhaps, as much as the bookmaker about the qualities of the animals which they back; but the bookmaker has capital, and he takes care to secure a margin of profit on every stake. He does not know one dog from another, but he treats them as symbols, and bets upon them just as he would bet upon the entries for the Autumn Handicaps. In short, the bookmaker has no "opinion"; he only has his system; and his income is taken from the pockets of the great silly public who back names, and who do not choose to see that the roaring vulgar fellow who takes their money rarely allows himself to risk any loss, while they must, on the doctrine of chances, lose in the long run. The bookmaker lives in luxury; the people who enable the bookmakers to keep fine houses and fine horses usually come to grief. To watch the faces of the "new hands," and compare them with the coarse assurance, the loud blackguardism of the professional bettors, is melancholy and significant. Lord Beaconsfield called the Turf "that vast institution of national demoralization." He was right at the time when his words were written, but since he died another institution has suddenly sprung up, which is likely to supplant the Turf as a poisonous agent in society. The old fashion of coursing is passing away; our gamblers cannot be content to walk in the free air and see three or four courses to the hour. They want race to follow race swiftly, like the whirling of the ball at roulette; they want to risk their money at close intervals; and thus the beautiful greyhounds are treated like dice, and the "bottled-up" hares can hardly be turned out fast enough to satisfy the feverish excitement of men who degrade sport, and degrade our common race.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY ELECTION.

ON Wednesday evening last the members of the Royal Academy met to elect an Associate in the place of Mr. Frank Holl, the painter, who was promoted last year to be a full Academician. The election was a very hotly contested one, the number of members present being unusually large. On the same day of 1883, on the 30th of January, the members met to perform the same office, and gave the title of A.R.A. to two of the most brilliant and gifted of the young artists of the day—to Mr. Robert Macbeth and to Mr. E. J. Gregory. We wish that we could congratulate them on an equally fortunate choice this year, but Mr. Colin Hunter is very far from being the ideal man for the place. It is no secret that he has stepped in where better men should have preceded him. He is young, and finer artists of an older generation competed with him vainly on Wednesday night.

The Royal Academy has once more had the opportunity of selecting from the ranks of the outsiders a good landscape-painter. It might have secured the services of Mr. A. W. Hunt, or of Mr. Albert Goodwin, of Mr. Henry Moore, or even of Mr. Frank Walton. It has turned aside from these men to present the liberty of the guild to Mr. Colin Hunter. This is a fresh sign that, even within those sacred ranks, the common popular gifts of violent realism, loud, crude colour, and total absence of sentiment are preferred to tenderness, imagination, and style. We do not wish to be severe on the productions of the new A.R.A. His work has at least the merit of individuality. When we see it we know it to be his, and if it is a long time since we have looked upon the sea, and if no better marine paintings are near it, we may even notice it with pleasure. But let a Brett, or a Wyllie, or a Moore approach it, and its knell is sounded. Last year Mr. Colin Hunter was, oddly enough, selected to be one of the British representatives in the International Exhibition in the Rue de Lèze. With Mr. Watts and Mr. Whistler he was allowed to emphasize the versatility of British art for the wonderment of the French nation, which did not appear to greatly appreciate the exaggeration of its own worst mannerism.

We are glad to pass from Mr. Colin Hunter. As he fills up the vacancy caused by the promotion of Mr. Frank Holl, R.A., so the next member elected will fill up the place of Mr. Francis Holl, A.R.A. The distinguished engraver, who died on the 15th ult., would have belonged to the body but one year if he had lived one other day. He was elected in old age, in broken health, after all his work was over. It is said that he never touched the burin after his election. With all respect to this particular artist, we venture to think that his career as an A.R.A., however honourable to himself, reflected but little distinction on the Royal Academy. If the body considered him worthy of membership, it was absurd to delay his election until the honour was practically posthumous. We would express a strong opinion that no man who is past work, no man even whose powers are declining, should be received into the Academy. The act of election should be considered as one which brings duties with it as well as honours. The new member should be, not a decrepit personage who has been unjustly overlooked in the past, but a man in the full vigour of life, ready to take his part in the schools, to lecture, to guide the students, to hold office on the Council.

Another crying reform which is called for in the rules for electing Associates is that of the written or tacit regulation which opens the doors of the Royal Academy to line-engravers and mezzotinters—that is to say, to workers upon steel—and closes them to workers upon wood and copper. We hear much, and yet not too much, about the decline of line-engraving; and yet the hide-bound practice of the Royal Academy closes distinction to all other branches of what the French call gravure. Why should a wood-engraver like Mr. J. D. Cooper, or an etcher like Mr. Seymour Haden, feel that membership with the body whom Cousins and Bartolozzi honoured is hopelessly shut out from them?

E. T. W. HOFFMANN.

LES Contes d'Hoffmann, a collection of short tales translated from the German, was better known to the last than to the present generation of general readers. Indeed, we may almost say, as far as England is concerned, that it was hardly known to either generation, for although the French can boast of a respectable translation of the more famous stories, we have had to content ourselves with a version of some half-dozen of them which, with the exception of one that engaged the attention of Mr. Carlyle's indefatigable genius, are all more or less feeble efforts at translation. Thus this singular fact presents itself, that while Hoffmann had achieved a considerable popularity upon the Continent, in England his works were well-nigh unread, and certainly unappreciated. The cause of this, we are inclined to think, was the early publication of his perhaps most ambitious, but certainly weakest and most disagreeable work, Elixiere des Teufels. The success which had attended the production of Matthew Gregory Lewis's Monk at an earlier date may have misled some over-enthusiastic admirer of Hoffmann to present the insane ravings of Brother Medardus to the English public, with this result, however, that lasting damage has been done to the fame of an author of almost unique imaginative power. It was in his short, vigorous, fantastic pieces, of which he wrote an extraordinary number, and which he collected together under the titles of Fantasiestücke in Callot's Manier, Serapionsbrüder, and Nachtstücke, that Hoffmann was at his best; and we have evidence that he himself set no value on those works which called for more sustained effort, for he never liked the Elixiere des Teufels, and never completed Lebensansichten des Kater Murr ("Tom Cat Murr's Philosophy of Life"), which, though a masterpiece as far as it goes, we cannot doubt the author felt himself unable to finish. These short pieces, originally written for no other purpose than to replenish a chronically empty purse, are full of most exquisite humour, brilliant wit, and trenchant satire. At times, it is true, he deals in horrors which are rather apt to disgust than attract the reader; but in the tales with which we are at present concerned this fault is scarcely to be detected. There are many persons, doubtless, who will fail to see the beauties and eagerly point out the blemishes of these extraordinary tales; but that is only natural where so many are incapable of appreciating genuine humour and prone to resent anything but commonplace situations in fiction as the greatest of crimes. Our advice to all such is to abstain from an attempt to understand Hoffmann, for certainly he did not write these tales for such readers.

To the due appreciation of Hoffmann's works some account of his life and character would seem necessary, although his life exhibits no particularly romantic situations and is chiefly marked as one of a somewhat Bohemian type, whilst a strong feature in his character is the not uncommon one of a rooted aversion to bores. It was this, in fact, that drove him from the tediousness of the Berlin literary tea-table to the more lively company at the tavern, and finally to his ruin and death. He was born at Königsberg, in Prussia, on the 24th of January, 1776, and was reared under the roof of his maternal grandmother, since, owing to some unfortunate matrimonial misunderstandings, his father deserted his family when our author was only three years old. His early education was undertaken by his uncle Otto, a man little calculated to attract a quick child like the young Hoffmann, for he was a rigid, methodical, and pedantic man. The pupil, however, seems to have suffered but little from such ungenial tutorship; for we find that when he proceeded in due course to the Reformed School he gained the approval of his masters as a boy well grounded in elementary knowledge. As a schoolboy Hoffmann gave decided proof of his love of music and drawing, and, with his uncle for a subject, he made great progress in the art of caricature, an art which he developed to such perfection that it cost him dearly in after life. To the University of Königsberg was his next step in life, for the purpose of studying law, a profession which was considered as hereditary in his family. While there the young man fell desperately in love with a girl to whom he was giving music-lessons. Her parents, however, objected to the alliance, and he had to solace himself with the thought that his heart was broken. This did not apparently interfere with his studies; for, whatever may be said to his discredit, idleness was not one of his faults, as he passed the necessary examinations with success, and at the age of nineteen entered the profession as Auscultator, a sort of articled clerk. Königsberg, after the love episode, being a somewhat uninteresting place for him, he obtained an appointment under another uncle, who was a lawyer of some standing at Glogau in Silesia. Here he remained for two years, and in the summer of his last year he went to Dresden for a holiday. At Dresden he was induced to gamble, and his success was so great that he was quite horrorstruck, and determined thereafter never to touch a card during his life—a vow which, be it said to his honour, he stedfastly kept. His experience on this occasion and the feelings of horror which seized him are undoubtedly the groundwork of one of his most dramatic pieces, called Spielerglück, which he afterwards placed in the Serapionsbruder Collection. When he came back to Berlin in 1798, he passed the "examen rigorosum" with such honours that his examiners recommended him for immediate employment under Government, and finally in 1800 he was appointed Assessor in Posen in Poland. At Posen Hoffmann found himself somewhat lonely at first, as he was to a great extent cut off from the society of the artists who were his friends at Berlin and Glogau, but he set to work assiduously at painting and music, in the latter of which arts it was his particular ambition to shine. The tedium of the humdrum life at Posen, however, began to pall upon him, and, finding his companions and society in general excessively dull, he took to criticizing them in a manner most likely to give offence. No one likes to be satirized, be the satire ever so witty, but to be caricatured under the most ludicrous yet unmistakable aspects, was an offence hardly to be pardoned. Yet Hoffmann, from sheer deviltry, and from a desire for anything which would rouse the society at Posen from its dead level of respectable inanity, persuaded a friend to aid him in perpetrating an outrageous practical joke. His coadjutor appeared disguised as an Italian hawker at a masquerade attended by the élite of Posen, and distributed Hoffmann's too evident caricatures to the company assembled, taking care to place them in the hands of those who would be most willing to make use of them. The joke was only too successful, and the consequence was that news of it was sent to Berlin, and, instead of receiving a patent as Rath at Posen, as had been intended, Hoffmann had to content himself with the same position at Plozk, which to him meant exile. At Plozk, however, he found a wife, and in a short time he was transferred to Warsaw. At the Polish capital Hoffmann was in his element. His talents, especially in music, soon gained him many acquaintances, and he here met Hitzig, who became his most intimate friend; in his leisure hours he undertook the superintendence of a musical institution, which he named a Ressource, busying himself with arranging the rooms of an old palace which was hired by some of his admirers, and painting designs for the walls and ceilings thereof. The Ressource was a complete success. Concerts, in which Hoffmann took the leading part, were given, and it seemed to him as if he had reached the zenith of his ambition—a public recognition that he was a master of his best beloved art. The battle of Jena, however, put an end to all this, and by way of a crowning misfortune he was prostrated by a severe attack of fever. When he recovered he found himself in very straitened circumstances, with a wife and children to support, and in despair he hastened to Berlin. His intention was to live by art, but art at that time was at a discount, and he eagerly embraced an offer to become the musical director at the Bamberg Theatre. Here, too, mischance after mischance befell him, and he left his post in disgust. Almost destitute, he determined to write to the editor of the Musicalische Zeitung, at Leipsic, enclosing a specimen of those stories which he afterwards collected as "Fantasiestücke in Callot's Manier," and which so delighted Jean Paul Richter that he wrote a preface for the collection. These pieces deal chiefly with music, his special art as he thought, and he little fancied at the time when he wrote them that they would give him a place in literature as a brilliant and singular writer. From this time, however, he was unremitting in his labours, and produced his fascinating stories with incredible swiftness. In 1813 he again attempted to conduct theatrical music at Dresden and Leipzig, and again failed owing to the state of the country and Napoleon's cannons. He never despaired, however, and, though sadly light of purse, he was always light of heart. Having found the pursuit of a livelihood by means of theatrical enterprise, a blank he returned to Berlin, and by the interest of his friends was reinstated in the legal profession as Rath in Berlin. He now devoted himself to writing with that industry which was so characteristic of him, and for seven or eight years produced with comparative ease those marvellous tales which made him in Berlin the wonder of his day. We have already hinted at his partiality for the tavern, and his dislike of the dilettanti tea-table. In this, as in everything else, Hoffmann showed a sublime contempt for all conventionality and semblance of respectability. His friends endeavoured without success to allure him from the baleful influence of the wine-house; but the most they could get him to do was to consent to a convivial meeting once a week at his own house, when he read them one of his stories which appeared under the title of "Serapionsbrüder." For some months before his death he was attacked by creeping paralysis, but he would not, even when it reached his hands, forego the pleasure of exercising his marvellous imagination, and on the 24th of June, 1822, he died whilst endeavouring to dictate to his wife the conclusion of his last tale, "Der Feind."

Hitzig's description of Hoffmann is very much such as might be expected. He was a man of diminutive stature, with a sallow complexion and dark, almost black hair, which grew far down his forehead. His eyes were grey, with nothing strange in them while he was quiet, but when excited they would assume an extraordinarily cunning expression and twinkle with mischief. His nose was finely cut and aquiline, his mouth somewhat set. His physique, in spite of his nimbleness, appeared strong, as he had for his size a deep chest and broad shoulders. In fact, he was a mischievous, though not an ill-natured, elf. Vain past belief and of an uncertain temper, he was capable of strong affections and true friendship, and, though naturally shy, was the best of companions when he was not bored. Such was the man whose contemporaries thought it not exaggeration to describe on his gravestone as "ausgezeichnet im Amte als Dichter, als Tonkunstler, als Maler."

Of the individual tales comprised in his three collections, it is difficult to point to any one as excelling the other; but we are inclined to give the first place to "Meister Martin der Küfner und seine Gesellen," a quaint story of Nürnberg life in the middle ages, which for graphic description of old-time manners is equalled by few and surpassed by none. "Der Goldne Topf" is already familiar to English readers in Mr. Carlyle's excellent translation, as well as "Das Fräulein von Scuderi," and others which have also been translated, but which are not now easily to be procured. "Der Sandmann," "Rath Krespel," and "Das Majorat" are amongst the most weird; whilst the exquisite humour of "Signor Formica," an imaginary episode in the life of Salvator Rosa, is of the rarest order. Those in which music takes a large share are such as "Don Juan," "Ritter Gluck," "Die Fermate," &c., and we have already mentioned the powerful tale entitled "Spielerglück." A mere catalogue of these tales would take up too much space, so that it is not possible to do more than indicate the names of those which recur to us as most remarkable. It is much to be regretted that "Tom Cat Murr's Philosophy of Life" was never completed. Hoffmann's names were Ernst Theodor Wilhelm; but the last is suppressed, and Amadeus substituted, in all editions of his works. Some have thought that this arose from his love of Mozart, whose name was Amadeus; but one of his biographers assures us that it happened simply from misprinting A. for W., and that, when it was pointed out to Hoffmann, he refused to alter it, and immediately took the name of Amadeus as a good omen. It may be interesting to note that, when the tales are taken in chronological order, it is found that the wildest and most extravagant are by no means the result of a brain suffering from the effects of excess, but that they were written at a time when he was little given to debauch. The more natural, and, we are bound to say, some of his best, were written, on the contrary, during those sad years when he was accustomed to preside as king of the topers in the Berlin tavern. Perhaps the best proof of the subtle fascination of his stories is the fact that three such men as Richter in Germany, Gautier in France, and Carlyle in England have all testified their enthusiastic approval of them.

It was not as a literary man, however, that Hoffmann desired to be known, but as a musician; and his performances in this branch of art are by no means contemptible. He wrote no less than eleven operas, one of which, Undine, was enthusiastically reviewed by Karl Maria von Weber; incidental music for three plays; a ballet; a requiem; two symphonies, and other orchestral and choral pieces. Of his musical views we hope on another occasion to have something to say; but it is sufficient to point out that two of the greatest musicians of the age entertained a high opinion of his musical genius—namely, Karl Maria von Weber, and Ludwig van Beethoven.

SATANELLA.

THE revival of Balfe's Satanella; or, the Power of Love, at Covent Garden on Saturday was an interesting event. Produced here in 1858, under the Harrison-Pyne management, its success was almost as great as that of The Bohemian Girl, though it did not, like that remarkable work, make the tour of the world. In spite of its popularity, it is very inferior to that cosmopolitan opera and to many others of Balfe's compositions. It is a one-air opera; but its one air, "The Power of Love," proves as fresh and entrancing as ever. The admirable use the composer has made of this air, without in the least exhausting its enthralling power or enfeebling its dramatic significance, is but one proof, among many, of his skill. It is something that it should have survived many years' base servitude to the organ-grinders and retain its old force and witchery. Whatever Balfe's sins against art and taste may be, and they are not slight, there must be something in music of such universal allurement that has escaped the analysis of those who treat of the music of the future. "The Power of Love" is utterly distinct from that large class of melodies that leave the ear titillated and evoke no emotion; its value is far higher and its effect more com-pensive. It is true that if detached from the opera the collapse of the work would be certain; but this is no more than saying if you withdraw the motive power the machinery would be at a standstill; and though much of the remaining music is trivial or bombastic, it never degrades the central theme with its own weight. The secret of this lies in Balfe's genius, which triumphs over the incredible bathos of his libretto and his own perilous facility. Many of the airs and concerted pieces in Satanella are of the most ephemeral value, and one song, "Oh, would she but name the day," is just such a ditty as the serio-comique loves and the music-hall applauds; but mere dulness and that pretentious heaviness which marks the absence of lyrical inspiration were foreign to Balfe's genial spirit and marvellous fecundity.

The libretto is a deranged version of Le Diable Boiteux by Messrs. A. Harris and E. Falconer, not without indications of other sources of inspiration. Some of its verses are as defiant of sense and grammar as the famous song "When other lips," which still exercises the ingenuity of commentators. It is not an uninteresting book and very entertaining, being a survival of the wonder-working scribes who imitated Lewis and Maturin with their tales of Gothic times. There are a ruined tower, a Gothic and very facetious knave, a mediæval Panglos who, by precognition, is full of the Eton Latin grammar, a reckless nobleman, a haughty lady, a distressed damsel with a silent sorrow, much necromancy and blue lightning, besides demons and pirates and the indispensable Arimanes. The Count Rupert is detected by his betrothed, Stella, in the act of kissing his foster-sister Lelia, who, though she never tells her love, exercises other blandishments. The offended Stella faces the Count at the gaming-table, and by means of the primitive dice-boxes gains the whole of his possessions save one ruined tower. To this the Count flies with his faithful tutor and servant, and by means of a childish formula, extracted from a book of magic, summons the dread fiend. Arimanes appears with Satanella, as a page, only to find Rupert in a trance, from which he does not revive till Arimanes departs. Satanella ensnares him through a dream, in which she appears as a beautiful woman, and sings the fascinating "Power of Love." In the next act the pirates carry off Lelia and Stella to the slave-market at Tunis; they are followed by Satanella and Rupert. Lelia is rescued by the former, on condition that Rupert forfeits his soul. Stella is no more seen, and was either forgotten in the excitement of these events, or sold as a slave. Once more in the old castle, Satanella repents and destroys the fatal bond, so that Rupert and Lelia may be united, and for this act is about to suffer the vengeance of Arimanes, whom she is saved by a rosary given to her by Lelia; the baffled demons crouch in the foreground, the nuptials of the happy pair are witnessed behind, Satanella floats on a cloud upwards in triumph, while an invisible choir sings "The Power of Love."

This extraordinary farrago is sufficient to daunt the heart of any other composer than Balfe. Always able to make the most of his dramatic opportunities, he was never deterred from his purpose of writing pretty airs by any amount of fatuity in his libretto; he never forgot his singers, and his knowledge of the stage was eminently useful in emergencies. Hence it is not difficult to assure adequate representation to Satanella, which at Covent Garden was certainly good. Mme. Rose Hersée was distinctly successful in the chief character. Her delivery of "The Power of Love" in the first act was charming; while the sprightly "Sultana Zulema," and the rather exacting finale of the third act, were sung with brilliant execution. Scarcely less noteworthy was Mme. Hersée's singing in the scene where Satanella divulges her love to Rupert, previous to the trio in the last act, where she displayed deep feeling. The Stella of Miss H. Armstrong and the Lelia of Miss Emily Parkinson were fully acceptable, though want of stage experience was too frequently apparent in the acting of the latter. Mr. J. W. Turner was excellent as Count Rupert, and Mr. Fox sang the spirited song, "Rovers, rulers of the Sea," very finely, and was well supported by the chorus. The spoken dialogue that so absurdly delays the musical movement in the first act was rendered more than endurable by the humorous acting of Mr. C. Lyall, as Karl, and Mr. H. W. Dodd, as the tutor Hortensius. The orchestra was admirably conducted by Mr. Betjemann; Mr. Clinton's execution of the clarionet solo in the second act, and Mr. Barrett's refined performance on the flute, received well-merited applause.

COMEDY AND TRAGEDY.

BEFORE the production of Comedy and Tragedy Mr. W. S. Gilbert had never succeeded in impressing audiences with any of his serious dramatic essays. In his own peculiar domain of Topseyturveydom it has long been acknowledged that he rules supreme. His quaintness of fancy, always set forth in the most effective theatrical style, his odd humour dressed with a literary skill his contemporaries do not approach, has given him a place apart since in Trial by Jury the judge descended from the Bench to marry the plaintiff. But his works with a higher purpose have always lacked something essential; nor is the very remarkable little drama which first saw its light at the Lyceum a week ago free from faults. It may be granted that a dramatist who takes an historical subject is allowed some latitude in dealing with history; but Mr. Gilbert claims and exercises too much. He has strangely distorted facts, and has besides introduced absurdities. In Comedy and Tragedy we find the Regent of France, the Duc d'Orléans, going to supper at the house of an actress of the Théâtre Français, attended by the Abbé Dubois, there to be challenged and "wounded to the death" in a duel with the actress's husband. Now in the first place the Duc d'Orléans was not killed or wounded to the death in a duel. He was struck by apoplexy, never recovered consciousness, and died in December 1723. In the second place, it is preposterous to suppose that the Regent of France, the head of the State, would have fought a duel under any circumstances, and especially under such circumstances as those here depicted. In the third place, it is out of the question that Dubois could have accompanied the Regent to the house where he thus met his death, for the excellent reason that the Cardinal died more than three months before the attack which proved fatal to the Regent. It is difficult to suppose that Mr. Gilbert can be ignorant of such well-known facts; yet he would seem to be so, for no dramatic purpose is served by introducing Dubois. The part is allotted to a minor player, and is, by the author's scheme, totally without distinction. Any anonymous personage would have answered the purpose. There is so much admirable work in this drama that these disrespectful perversions of history are to be regretted. As regards the construction, facts apart, Mr. Gilbert weakens his story when he makes the heroine a party to—the inventor, indeed, of—an ignoble plot. The high-minded Clarice would not have consented thus to decoy her persecutor by a device the issue of which must have been, moreover, exceedingly doubtful. So much must be urged against Mr. Gilbert's play. There is very much, on the other hand, to be said on behalf of it. The character of Clarice the actress is an exceedingly powerful one. In it a competent representative would find the opportunity of exhibiting the most varied emotions, which always stand out from a highly impressive background. The piece is well named, for the height of comedy and the depth of tragedy are to be touched by Clarice—if only Clarice knows how to reach to either. It is too late in the day to recapitulate the plot in detail. In brief, Clarice, during the year of her married life, has been sought by the Duc d'Orléans. Her husband, formerly an officer of the Guard, now, for her sake, an actor, has vainly challenged the Duc. In order that he may be driven to accept the challenge, Clarice invites him, with several of his companions, to a supper at her house, so planning that her husband, D'Aulnay, shall witness her interview with her visitor, and shall render his continued refusal to fight—as the dramatist would have us believe—impossible. All falls out as arranged. Still the Regent refuses to meet a statutory vagabond and a social outcast. "If a scullion were to challenge me, I should so far recognize him as to have him flogged. An actor is entitled to no recognition at all," is the Duc's reply. D'Aulnay then tears up his engagement, vows he will never more set foot on the stage, and the challenge is at length accepted. The combatants retire to the garden, Clarice undertaking the task of keeping the attention of her visitors engaged till the issue is known.

Up to this point the actress has been provided with several chances of minor effect; but of none of these did Miss Anderson, who as Clarice is something more than the head and front of play, take full advantage. There was no ring of true tenderness in her voice when she met her husband; she received the Regent's friends with a free and easy air of banter—yet stiff and constrained withal, nor wholly devoid of commonness—which sat ill on the assumption of Clarice's high-minded modesty, and made one wonder at the Duc's determined pursuit. She flirted with him after the fashion of stage flirtation; one looked in vain for some point of merit throughout these earlier scenes and found nothing. But the grand opportunities are yet to come. Can the American actress rise to them? The question does not long remain unanswered, and the answer is an unequivocal negative. By way of holding the attention of her visitors, who presently return, while the duel to the death is being fought in the garden beyond the room where they stand, Clarice at her visitors' request improvises. Before they can find a theme for her, the clashing of swords is heard. She must perforce maintain a cheerful face, vow it is nothing, that a little surprise is in preparation, that all will be spoilt if any one enters the garden. Then she starts upon her task. She is a strolling player, she—that is, he—enters a tavern, is asked to describe himself. One look, one gesture, one intonation of the voice, as Clarice conquers her fears and volubly begins to recite, would have done everything for this truly dramatic incident; but nothing of the sort is forthcoming. Miss Anderson speaks to the ears, never to the heart. Her poses are as statuesque as her brocaded gown will admit. She keeps her face carefully turned to the audience, but it expresses no trace of what should be there. The speech itself is wonderfully well written for the purpose of playing. "Who am I, gentlemen? I am Artaxerxes! I am Antony the Great! I'm a doge, a king, a councillor, a burgess, a lackey. I am the constable who seizes the beggar; nay, I am the beggar seized by the constable. I feast starving; I starve feasting. Beware of me, for I am a very rogue—a swaggering roysterer, with ragged elbows, hat a-cock and bilbo ready." Thus the speaker begins, and in like vein continues, very aptly imitating the personages she names, suiting the action to the word. Only this and nothing more. Miss Anderson gives, as it were, her entertainment. It is very clever, so far as it goes, but it does not go nearly far enough. The audience laugh and applaud. They do not think—Miss Anderson does nothing to make them think—of what the improvisation is done to hide. From this point Mr. Gilbert rises, and Miss Anderson falls. It remains for the actress to make what follows either profoundly impressive or a mere trick of the theatre. Unhappily at the Lyceum it is the latter. Clarice hears a cry as of a man desperately hurt. Her courage gives way, and she begs the one friend present, to whom she has given the key of the door which leads to the garden, to let her through. Her hearers, however, believe that she is still acting; nor in truth is this supposition unreasonable. There is little sincerity in the appeal of Clarice, and the friend who incurs the derision of the rest by the statement that she is not acting has slight justification that is apparent to the spectators. Miss Anderson is very energetic. That is all. Of real power, of the tragic intensity which the situation invites and demands, there is scarcely a sign. It is sad to watch so fine a scene so misused. Certainly Mr. Gilbert's Clarice has not yet been represented. Miss Anderson was, however, much applauded, but Denique non omnes eadem mirantur amantque. Mr. Barnes as the Duc d'Orléans did moderately well what was demanded of him, though this Regent by no means showed himself endowed with that charm of manner which is said to have recalled Henry IV. Mr. Alexander's performance of D'Aulnay was efficient. It will be seen that the chief situation of this play is nearly identical with the chief situation of Tabarin; but it is only just to Mr. Gilbert to say that his construction is different, and may fairly be claimed as original.

THE THEATRES.

AFTER a week's representation, Mr. Pinero's comedy was succeeded at the Globe by Our Regiment, a "farcical comedy" by Mr. H. Hamilton, produced originally at a Vaudeville matinée last winter. It was then more than suggested that the leading idea of the play was taken from a contemporary German drama—a fact which the value of Mr. Hamilton's piece renders quite unimportant. Since its appearance, we are told, it has met with much success in the provinces, which, indeed, it is eminently calculated to achieve. It is just the kind of drama naturally to be expected and qualified to succeed in the provinces—of British India and Equatorial Africa, or in any society where ennui requires an antidote, and all the talents of the neighbourhood, military and civilian, are requisitioned to that end. Its refreshing candour of speech, its amateurish indifference to construction and its impatience of natural evolution, its passion for distortion and caricature, appeal to the jaded spirits of unhappy exiles. The course of the play is foreseen to the untaxed intelligence, which is only mildly exercised by gentle speculations as to what form the familiar screen-trick will take (in the drawing-room) or how the not less pleasant summer-house trick (in the garden) will be worked. The most venerable jokes light up the dialogue with a gay senility which has too much of pathos to be reprehended; misunderstandings that are highly improbable in the frank society of Our Regiment lead to impossible complications; in the place of humour we have frolicsome pranks; for banter and sarcasm very current chaff; for wit smartness. Yet, with all these excesses against art, there is no denying that Our Regiment is amusing; its spirit is well interpreted by the actors; its rather rough and very ready fun is admirably rendered, and the piece moves with unflagging alacrity towards the desired end.

Mr. Hamilton's accurate description of his play is heartily to be commended, and is an excellent example for the times. The old dramatists would no more have thought of calling certain modern plays comedies that are so entitled than of styling Rule a Wife and Have a Wife a tragedy. With neither the directness and concentration of farce nor the finished art of comedy, Our Regiment is an amalgam in which the farcical material has somewhat "flown," leaving a solitary instance of its unfriendly ally in the love scene of the last act. The village of Mudborough is enlivened by a short visit of a detachment of lancers, who are warmly welcomed by enthusiastic admirers—to wit, Mr. Ellaby and his niece Maud Ellaby, Mrs. Dobbinson, her daughter Olive, and her niece Enid Thurston. Mr. Dobbinson does not share in this generous warmth, and his violent hatred of the military is contrasted with his friend Ellaby's equally unbounded admiration. The latter possesses also a hearty dislike to the clergy, while of course the former differs from him. The appearance on the scene of Captain Featherston and Lieut. Warrener coincides with the presentation of the Rev. John Talbot, their old college friend, to the curacy of Mudborough. Here are elements from which it is easy to divine the nature of an amusing imbroglio. The ladies determine on the campaign, Enid declaring her object to be Featherston; the curate falls in love with Maud Ellaby; Guy Warrener sits down before the heiress Enid, and commences a determined siege, while Featherston appears indifferent. Warrener presents himself to the young ladies with cool effrontery and a delightful presumption of victory, to which Featherston's frank manliness serves as an effective foil. The former discovers Enid to be a native of Jamaica, and instantly proceeds to study the subject, causing great amusement by his surprising knowledge of the island and his naïf confidence in his expedient; which of course only bores the heiress. The curate's procedure is not less entertaining. He has no liking for his profession, ruefully anticipates being "bowled out," feels "the old bird," as he irreverently styles "the old Adam," very assertive, and expresses himself with amazing flippancy. He visits Mr. Dobbinson, and endeavours to sustain his position by covert consultation of a conventional speech, conveniently written on a card, and which becomes inextricably mingled with the footman's colloquy with his master. The scene where he is recognized by his military friends as their old comrade at Oriel is highly extravagant; his bashful air and involved language, his attempt to impress the astonished Ellaby with his set speech, and his discomfiture when Warrener abstracts his "crib," are very laughable. As the play proceeds the fun becomes riotous and the situations more farcical. Much is made of the slight incident of a mishap by which Warrener falls into a lake in the gallant attempt to pluck some water-lilies for Enid. His reappearance in some scandalously ill-fitting clothes of his host evokes a burst of merriment; he mounts a chair, draws a screen about him, and descends only on the understanding that Enid will not look at him, and makes her an offer of marriage. All of which, and much more that needs no mention, is very tolerable fooling, if not very original or forcible.

Much of the favour with which Our Regiment was received is due to the spirited interpretation of what would be insufferably dull if not fairly well played. Mr. Gerard Moore succeeds in presenting the unabashed coxcomb, Guy Warrener, with praiseworthy consistency, considering the temptation to excess that the situations offer. His assumption is decidedly clever, but it would gain by a little repression of manner in the second act, where he is much too boisterous towards the close; his change of attire cannot be held responsible for the lapse he commits here. The curate is played by Mr. E. W. Gardiner effectively and without exaggeration. The bearish anti-military Mr. Dobbinson is well conceived and carefully represented by Mr. E. J. Henley, while Mr. Lethcourt as Featherston, and Mr. Young as Ellaby, are thoroughly adequate. The very unfeminine lady characters are well given by Miss Carlotta Leclercq (Mrs. Dobbinson), Miss Fanny Brough (Enid Thurston), Miss Abington (Maud Ellaby), and Miss Trevelyan (Olive).

Mr. Toole, at Toole's Theatre, has produced a "farcical comedy" called A Mint of Money, written by Mr. Arthur Law, whose name has been associated with pieces successfully produced elsewhere. We have already referred to the meaning, or want of meaning, of the descriptive label given to many pieces in this day; and perhaps it does not much matter what description is thus given to a play which is the fortunate vehicle for the humours of Mr. Toole and of the clever company of players which he has got about him. When the name of the piece is known, when it is further known that the part which Mr. Toole plays is named Kerosine Tredgold, and that the three acts are headed Captured, The Victim, and Rescued, the accustomed and ingenious playgoer may find some amusement in first guessing what the plot and the situations of the piece may most likely be, and then in comparing the piece on the boards with the piece of his imagination. This is a pleasure of which we do not propose to rob him in any measure, but we may tell him by way of encouragement that Mr. Toole is at his funniest in the situations cleverly contrived for him with the aid of cleverly composed dialogue, and that he is well helped by a company containing such capable actors as Miss Erskine, who plays a mesmerist with an intensity conceived in the true spirit of burlesque (called pro hac vice farcical comedy), Miss Emily Thorne, Mr. Billington, Mr. Shelton, and Mr. E. D. Ward, whose acting is always so good that one always wants to see what he could do with some more telling part of comedy or comedy-drama than generally falls to him. A Mint of Money serves its purpose very well in giving playgoers an occasion for the welcome which they are always, and rightly, ready to give to Mr. Toole on his reappearance, and it also serves to show that he is no less careful in the "staging" of his pieces than is, in another line, the distinguished actor-manager who is now winning golden opinions in America.

It might be wished, by the by, that the utterances of Mr. Irving to American interviewers were as well regulated as are his stage arrangements. It is, for instance, astounding to find it set down in print, and hardly possible to believe it the fact, that Mr. Irving considers the American stage superior to the French in the matter of tragedy, because France has no tragic actor. This amazing statement, according to the report of a Chicago newspaper, Mr. Irving supported by observing that, on the revival of Le Roi s'Amuse, M. Got played Triboulet, and did not play it with any convincing tragic power. Has M. Got ever been considered a tragic actor? Has Mr. Irving ever heard of M. Mounet-Sully? Has he ever heard that, granted all his faults, M. Mounet-Sully (who was hailed, by a discerning person, from obscurity to fill the vacant place of first tragedian at the Français) has ever since that hailing more and more proved himself to be an actor possessed of the rarest of all the gifts that an actor has—that of nobly interpreting the tragedy of noble poets? It would be odd if M. Mounet-Sully's completely deserved fame as a great tragic actor had not reached Mr. Irving's ears. We must hope that Mr. Irving's words have been incorrectly heard by the reporters through whom they reach us.

As we all remember, the common playwright, or dramatic hack, was one of the chief pests of Dickens's life. The great writer suffered from him infinitely; and the angry aversion in which he held the whole tribe was natural and honourable. A free and sincere artist, he had the artist's respect for his conceptions; to see them mangled and deformed for the stage, their humour coarsened and blurred, their pathos vulgarized, the reminder in them obliterated, and the individuality conventionalized and destroyed—was to him intolerable. The gutter-dramatists of his time were poison to him; and he hated them as bitterly and hit them as hard as a hard-hitting man of genius and a good hater could. Recalling this, one scarcely dares to imagine what he might have said, or how he would have felt, had he lived to see the "entirely new adaptation" of The Old Curiosity Shop now playing at the Opéra Comique. Nothing more offensive in the way of adaptation has been seen for many years. We can call to mind no rifacimento of a famous work in which the conceptions of the original author have been more hideously grotesqued, in which the ideas and imaginings of the original author have been more stupidly transformed. To have to say thus much is painful in no mean degree. But Dickens's work is a national possession, and Dickens's fame is a part of the nation's own; and we conceive that to protest against any wrong that is done them is the duty of every one to whom good literature and the memory of a great Englishman are dear.

In The Old Curiosity Shop, with something that is faulty and even bad, there is much of Dickens's good work. Two generations of English-speaking men have wept over Little Nell; and, if to austere and highly literary critics that much-enduring child is abominable, it must not be forgotten that to Landor she was almost heroic, and that to Mr. Ruskin she is (or was) a great and beautiful creation. Then there are the two Brasses—Sampson and Sally—types new to literature, completely apprehended and observed, and presented with unfailing energy and precision; there is Quilp, the dwarf—perhaps the most admirable expression of the true grotesque in English fiction; there are Codlin, and Short, and the Marchioness—all admirable after their kind; there are Kit, and Barbara, and Mrs. Jiniwin, and Mrs. Jarley, and Tom Scott—a world of wit and fun and invention; above all, there is Dick Swiveller, a piece of right humour, real yet touched with the true ideal—a creation in its way as generous in intention and as irresistible in effect as has been achieved since Walter Scott. To transport a book so rich in fancy and so full of life and fact to the stage is merely impossible. It contains a dramatic idea of singular strength and freshness; but rightly to adapt this idea to stage purposes, it would be necessary, as always in such cases, to forget the novel, make a clean sweep of the personages and their environment, and, approaching the matter from another direction and under a new aspect, begin again from the beginning. In the novel there is absolutely nothing after the play, save only the germinal idea and the rudiments of a situation—the situation in which it is embodied in a narrative form. Dickens wrote, not as a playwright, but as a novelist pure and simple; creating a peculiar atmosphere, inventing a peculiar set of developments, alternating dialogue with description as he thought fit, and relying for the production of some of his largest and best effects on the exercise of his unrivalled faculty of the picturesque. To the author of the "entirely new adaptation" with which we are dealing it has seemed good and right to transform The Old Curiosity Shop not into a species of play, but into a regular "variety entertainment"—a dreadful nondescript, smacking a little of the theatre and very much indeed of the music-hall; an opportunity for comic songs, and mimicry, and pantomime, and cellar-flap steps, and what are known to the profession as "lightning changes." There is some attempt at pathos, for Miss Lotta, "America's representative comédienne," is ambitious of distinction as a real actress; so that we are favoured with something of Nell and her grandfather, and Mrs. Jarley and the Waxworks, and a death-scene in the snow, among tombstones, and American angels, to the music of an unseen organ. There is also some attempt at romance and the picturesque; for we are honoured with frantic and unnecessary glimpses of Kit, and Quilp, and Sampson Brass and his sister Sally. But our real heroine is Miss Lotta as the Marchioness, our real hero Mr. Wyatt as Dick Swiveller. For their sake—principally, it must be noted, for Miss Lotta's—The Old Curiosity Shop has been turned into a framework for what may be defined as a music-hall entertainment tempered with playacting. In the first act we have the Old Curiosity Shop and the beginnings—vague and feeble enough, but real as far as they go—of a kind of play, with Miss Lotta as a far from plausible Nell, and Mr. Pateman as a loud and antic Quilp, and Mr. Calhaem (dotage personified) as Grandfather Trent, and Mr. Wyatt as Dick Swiveller, and Mr. C. Coote as a not unnatural Kit; we have Grandfather Trent disappointed and discovered, Nell plaintive and angelic, Kit loyal and sentimental, Swiveller ridiculous and unreal, and Quilp insulted and irate; we have a certain amount of character, a trifling amount of action, and something not much unlike a situation. In the next act everything is changed; we are presented to Miss Lotta as the Marchioness, and in the presentation we are plunged neck deep in a variety performance in full swing. The Marchioness appears like a person in a pantomime—tumbling through a suddenly opened door; she mops, she mows, she grins, she antics; she rejoices in "comic business" with Dick, and afterwards in more "comic business" with Sampson and Sally and a mutton bone; she sits on a high stool, and eats beef with both hands, and puts her feet on the table, and slaps her knife on her shoe; and she finishes the scene—the immortal banquet-scene!—with a pas de deux with Mr. Swiveller, a parody of a minuet and a comic cachucha. Worse remains behind. After an interval devoted to sentiment and Mrs. Jarley and the humours of Mr. Slum, she appears (with an enormous broom) in Brass's office, assists in the accusation of Kit, and takes part—still with the broom—in the sort of rally with which the "adapter" has thought fit to conclude the act. Then in the famous scene in Dick Swiveller's bedroom, we sound, with her assistance, deeps still lower. After confession and explanation, the Marchioness produces a brass whistle, and declares that that she could not pawn; Dick—only just recovered from brain fever be it remembered—requests her to start at once for Mr. Witherden's office, and breaks into a jig on the beautiful instrument she has placed in his hands; and she dances to his piping till her audience is weary of recalling her. Nor is this all. In the next scene, "A Country Churchyard," Nell makes her last dying speech and confession, while Mrs. Jarley looks on and sympathizes and holds her head; and when Nell has done, Grandfather Trent makes his last dying speech and confession, and expires beside her corse, even as Ruy Gomez expires beside the corse of Doña Sol, leaving Mrs. Jarley (in light summer raiment) to bury him and his grandchild both. Then, in Mr. Witherden's office, the Marchioness having challenged Miss Sally to mortal combat, and been removed by Mr. Swiveller, the Brasses are confounded, and Dick comes into his fortune. He instantly proposes to the Marchioness, who accepts him more Americano—with a grin and a piece of slang. "Sing that song I taught you in honour of the occasion," says the degenerate Richard; and the Marchioness instantly begins aping the works and ways of the operatic tenor, and after much mimicry, betakes herself to the dance, and Mr. Swiveller aiding, goes on until she can no more. Then, for Mr. Pateman's sake (Mr. Pateman being a kind of actor) there is a relapse into drama; we are presented with Quilp's wharf, and we hear Quilp roar, and we see Quilp tumble into the water. Instantly the gate is thrown down, the lights are turned on, and Mr. Swiveller and the Marchioness, followed by all the other personages of the drama, bound in upon the scene; the Marchioness, at Mr. Swiveller's request, delivers an American "tag"; and on a spirited pas de deux the curtain falls. Thus it is that the novel has been adapted.

Of the way in which this ignoble patchwork is acted there is little to be said. Miss Lotta is not an actress, in any sense of the word; she is what is called a "variety artiste." She has a curious apish talent for pantomime; she dances with uncommon quaintness and agility; she is a clever caricaturist; but of acting she does not know so much as the rudiments. As Nell she is merely tedious; as the Marchioness she is, if you can only forget your Dickens, decidedly amusing. It is something the same with Mr. Wyatt; he is only tolerable when he is, not acting, but dancing. His make-up is merely an apology; his Dick Swiveller has neither humour nor invention—has nothing, in fact, but a certain glibness and grace; he has taken so little trouble to compose his part that in his mouth the traditional and delightful "old man" becomes the commonplace "old man." It must be added that he and Miss Lotta in their parody of the minuet are really very funny, and that he dances throughout with great spirit and freedom. Mr. Pateman's Quilp is a good make-up, et præterea nil. The actor's opportunities are not many; but, it must be confessed, he makes but little of them. In his impersonation there is not a trace of impishness, not a touch of malignity; his voice is full and round and hectoring; there is neither humour nor snarl in any one of his intonations, neither devil nor fun in any one of his gestures; to those who remember the Quilp of the late J. C. Clarke his Quilp is merely non-existent. Of the minor parts the best played was the Slum of Mr. J. Phipps. It was a little spoiled by a bad exit; but it was vulgar, raffish, contemptible, and—up to a certain point—amusing in no mean degree.

THE LABOUR CRISIS IN PARIS.

THE distress of the working classes in Paris, which has occupied much of the debate upon M. Langlois's interpellation in the Chamber of Deputies this week, has its origin in causes partly economic and partly political. France, like the rest of Western Europe, has suffered for a series of years from agricultural depression. Her production of food has not been sufficient for the wants of her people, and she has had in consequence to import large quantities of grain. At the same time the phylloxera has destroyed the vineyards of large districts, and has inflicted great losses upon the population of the South. As France is essentially a country of small proprietors, the suffering has been serious enough to lessen the purchasing power of the bulk of the people. Even in England our landowners and farmers have endured very great losses, and similar losses in France must naturally have been felt still more by the peasant proprietors and farmers. There has in consequence been less saving, and wealth, therefore, has accumulated more slowly than formerly. Moreover, France has, like the rest of Continental Europe, fallen back on Protection. Her object has been to secure for her own producers her own markets, but, as other nations have done the same, her merchants and manufacturers have found themselves shut out from neighbouring markets. Lastly, the enormous taxation rendered necessary by the disasters of the war and by the economic and colonial policy lately adopted presses heavily on the producing classes. The taxation of the agricultural classes, for example, has been variously estimated by speakers in the Chamber and in the Senate this week at from 25 to 30 per cent. of the gross agricultural income. And though the taxation upon other classes is not quite so heavy, it is still exceedingly burdensome. For all these reasons the producing classes find themselves hampered, while the diminution of savings places at their command less capital than they need for the development of their business. So far as Paris in particular is concerned, a more serious cause of the existing distress, perhaps, is the great public works that have been carried on there for so many years. They were begun under the Empire to satisfy the working classes and prevent insurrection, and they have been continued under the Republic for the same reason. Since the semi-Socialist party have got into the ascendency in the Municipality, they have been carried on, too, in the desire to give effect as far as possible to semi-Socialist views. The great works carried on by the Municipality have attracted workpeople from all parts of France, from Germany, Belgium, Italy, and Spain. And this effect of the public works has been aggravated by the speculation in building that has been going on for the last five or six years. Here in this country speculative builders find the means to carry on their operations by borrowing chiefly from Insurance Companies and from solicitors who are employed by their clients to lend out money profitably. They draw, therefore, upon funds which seldom find their way into the market which supplies manufacturers and merchants with accommodation. But in Paris the builders chiefly get their loans from the Crédit Foncier, a great public institution that lends upon land and house property. The Crédit Foncier obtains the money which it lends to the builders by selling its own bonds, and these bonds are largely bought by the banks and credit institutions of all kinds. Consequently the builders in reality compete with merchants and manufacturers for the loanable capital available in the short-loan market. During the speculative mania that ended in the collapse of the Union Générale there was an extraordinary rage for building in Paris. In many cases prices of securities were multiplied many times. There are instances, for example, where prices between 1879 and 1882 were multiplied a hundred times. The speculators who found the shares and bonds they bought increase so enormously in market price looked upon themselves as rich, and increased their expenditure in consequence. They bought or rented fine houses, furnished them in luxurious style, set up carriages, and hired servants. In this way they not only created a great demand for new houses, but they also gave a great impetus to all the trades for which Paris is specially distinguished, and they thus raised wages, attracting more and more of the labouring classes from the provinces and from neighbouring countries. When the speculative mania ended in panic, the bubble fortunes disappeared in a day. Speculators were obliged to give up their houses, to sell their carriages, and to dismiss their servants. The speculative builders then found that they could neither sell nor let the houses they had built, and the furniture-makers and the manufacturers that minister to the luxuries of the rich also found the demand for their goods immensely fall off. There was thus brought about a compulsory stoppage of many works, workpeople were thrown out of employment, and wages necessarily fell.

It is difficult to ascertain how many people are out of employment in Paris at present. Count de Mun has asserted in the Chamber this week that there were as many as 80,000, but M. Ferry treated this statement as a flagrant exaggeration. Whatever the numbers may be, there can be no question that very many people have been thrown out of employment, and that wages have declined very considerably. It is true, nevertheless, that the decrease in building is not as great as might have been expected. Fewer houses were built last year than in the year before, and in the current month the preparations for building show further diminution. Still, the number of new buildings is exceedingly large. For the moment this is satisfactory, since there are no fewer than 120,000 workpeople employed in the building trade alone; and a serious falling off in building would, therefore, cause lamentable suffering. But the continuance of building under existing circumstances is a danger for the future. The builders, as already stated, obtain their funds from the Crédit Foncier, and the Crédit Foncier obtains its funds by the sale of its bonds. The price of the bonds has fallen very considerably during the past two years, and is likely to continue to fall. Under existing circumstances the builders are unable to sell or to let a large proportion of the houses they are erecting; and, if they go on adding to the number of untenanted houses, a day must come when they will be unable to meet their engagements; unless, indeed, there is a much more rapid return of prosperity than now seems probable. But, if a considerable number of builders were to fail, the Crédit Foncier might be involved in difficulties, and its difficulties would be a serious matter, for it is one of the greatest credit institutions of France. For the present, however, the falling off in building is not so serious as might have been expected; and, consequently, the distress is not as great as by many it is represented to be. But it can hardly be doubted that the building of new houses will go on diminishing, and the probability, therefore, is that more and more workpeople will be thrown out of employment. As already stated, the trades that minister to luxury are likewise depressed, and the workpeople engaged in them are also suffering. Another matter that is adding to the distress of the labouring population in Paris is the dearness and scarcity of lodgings. The public works constructed by the Municipality, and the erection of new houses by the speculative builders, have swept away whole quarters formerly occupied by the poor. Nearly all the new houses recently built are intended for the well-to-do, and the labouring classes, therefore, find the accommodation suited for them scarcer and scarcer as well as dearer. In all great cities this is the case. We have been of late rendered familiar with the wretchedness of the houses of the poor here in London. In Paris the house accommodation is at least as bad and the rents charged are exceedingly high. In fact, the measures adopted to give satisfaction to the working classes have to a large extent made their condition worse than it was before. The demolition of quarters where the workpeople formerly dwelt has driven them either to the suburbs at great distances from their places of occupation, or else into courts and alleys, where the air is bad, the tenements rickety and unsanitary, and where whole families are huddled together in a manner quite destructive of decency as well as health. At the same time the competition for even these wretched lodgings has raised rent so high as to go far towards neutralizing the rise in wages that has taken place. Nor is this all. The great public works carried on by the city have accumulated an enormous debt, the service of which requires a very large revenue to be raised every year, and one of the means by which this is done is the collection of high octroi duties. These duties, being levied upon articles of general consumption, have raised prices generally, and thus rendered the cost of living higher in Paris than perhaps in any other city of Europe. Municipal taxes, State taxes, and Protectionist duties, all combine to make the cost of living excessively dear; while the rage for building and other public works at the same time make house accommodation both scarce and costly. The result is that workpeople, even in good times, do not find their position greatly improved, in spite of the extraordinary rise in wages during the past ten years. And now that employment has become scarce and wages are falling, large numbers are plunged in dire distress.

There is another aspect of the question not less important. High wages and the high price of the materials of industry render prices in Paris excessively dear. Not only, as already pointed out, has the Protectionist policy adopted by so many European States closed foreign markets to French manufacturers; but it, with the octroi duties and enhanced wages, has made the cost of producing goods in Paris higher than in competing countries. At a meeting of the workpeople in the building trade some time ago it was stated that a ready-made window imported from Norway was cheaper than a window could be manufactured in Paris, the reason, of course, being that wages and raw material alike are so high in France that the cheap wood and cheap labour of Norway enabled the Norwegian manufacturer to pay the heavy import duties in France and yet undersell his French competition. And what is true of this case is true of various other classes of goods. Articles of which Paris had once the monopoly are now produced better and cheaper in Germany, and Paris shopkeepers find themselves compelled to import the goods from the latter country, neglecting the home manufacture. In other classes of goods, again, Paris manufacturers have been undersold by Belgian and Italian competitors. Thus, the manufacturers are threatened with the loss of the home market itself, unless they can in some way retrieve their position. The most effectual way, of course, would be to reduce taxation, both State and municipal. As regards the city, however, reduction is out of the question; for the debt charge is so heavy that the best that can be expected is some check to the growth of expenditure in the future. But it is difficult to see how expenditure can be checked at a time when there is so much distress amongst the workpeople, and such a loud outcry for public works. In the same way the State expenditure is growing every year, and there is really need for an addition to the taxation rather than a possibility of reduction. Under these circumstances the employers will be forced to reduce wages. Perhaps the measure, however regrettable for the sake of the workpeople, and however dangerous it must certainly be in their present temper, would be in the long run a benefit to the country at large, if not to Paris itself. The building mania and the public works of the Municipality together have attracted to Paris an excessive number of workpeople. Throughout the rural districts there are complaints of a want of labour, and many of the worst paid kinds of work are in fact discharged almost entirely by foreigners. The best workmen in all parts of France are attracted to the metropolis by the high wages there offered, and they are supplemented by a large contingent of foreign labourers. The economic and political results are alike injurious. It would undoubtedly be of advantage to the country if the influx of workpeople into the capital could be checked. That there is really a want of labour in France seems to be proved by the fact that there is a million of foreigners at present resident there, of whom about 200,000 are found in Paris. And this million up to twelve months ago was rapidly increasing. What is most significant is that the increase since the close of the war has been extraordinary. Nor is it only that Paris has been growing at the expense of the rest of France. It is also true that the Paris population is the least productive of all France. In Paris the death-rate is excessive, while the marriage-rate and the birth-rate are both below the average. In a country where the growth of population is so exceedingly slow, this is a matter of no little importance; and everything, therefore, that would check the influx of the rural workpeople into the capital would in the long run be a national benefit.

REVIEWS.

THE LORD ADVOCATES OF SCOTLAND.*

THAT an advocate should give the public a series of historical sketches and portraits of men who have ennobled themselves and their profession is perfectly natural. Lord Campbell set the fashion, and his example has been followed by others who have praised famous men and have shown how their forefathers contributed to the grandeur of the law. There is, of course, a vast space between such works as The Lives of the Chancellors and The Chief Justices of England, and the imaginary Lives of Sheriffs' Officers, which Thackeray somewhere said absorbed the leisure of one of his minor characters. In the two volumes before us, halfway between Campbell and Thackeray's heroes, Mr. Omond has treated of the public and private life of no less than fifty-two advocates who have filled that office, from John Ross of Montgreenan to Francis Jeffrey of the Edinburgh Review. Several of these persons may merit no higher praise than what is earned by plodding, conscientious, and successful lawyers. Not a few became Lords of Session, and some filled the office of Lord President of that Court. Others took a prominent part in State trials, remarkable prosecutions, or political episodes and national commotions. In some families legal ability descended like an heirloom. Several county families in the Lowlands owe much of their wealth and position to the eloquence and erudition of an advocate and Lord of Session, and here and there we come on a jurist or a statesman not unworthy to be ranked in the first class, either on account of the depth and variety of his attainments or of the influence which he exercised over the course of public events.

Ample stores of information, either in manuscript or print, have been here digested and sifted with praiseworthy diligence and accuracy. We are distinctly warned by the author that his "lives" are not complete biographies. He traces the descent and development of the office held rather than the private history of each successive holder. This entails a plethora of facts and dates, and here and there the style has that antiquarian flavour which would have delighted worthy Mr. Blattergowl, with his decreet of certification and his history of the teinds. But the arrangement and disposition of the materials is praiseworthy. There is a capital table of contents at one end and a good index at the other; and the careers of several of the most remarkable Lord Advocates naturally are closely connected with rebellions, revolutions, persecutions of independent thinkers, Jacobite plots, Whig proclivities, and all those outbreaks of Scotch feeling which Macaulay averred had always been characterized, even at the most stirring crises, by a sober and judicial gravity. It is scarcely necessary to add that 1737 and 1745, to say nothing of 1831 and the polling-booths at Jedburgh, send the critic at once to the Waverley Novels and to Lockhart's Life of Scott. Changes and improvements in the law as they affected witnesses, jurors, and prisoners are duly chronicled; there are little sketches of the state of manners and morals in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries; and, though we miss some characteristic anecdotes of Henry Erskine, of the brutal Lord Braxfield, and others, there are some good stories which enliven the narrative and repay perusal.

Part of the first volume is taken up with the origin and the functions of the Lord Advocate and of the Court before which he appeared. The Stuart kings of Scotland had endeavoured, with some success, to supplant the hereditary and feudal jurisdiction exercised by savage chiefs all over the country. And to James V. belongs the credit of having established the Court of Session, consisting of fourteen judges and a President, in the year 1532, which, with some modifications and one important interruption in the time of Cromwell, has come down intact to our own time. But, before that date, there was an officer known as the "King's Advocate," who at first appeared only on behalf of the Crown in cases of treason or blasphemy. Mr. Omond thinks that the idea of this office may have been imported from France by Scotchmen, who, in the alliances and treaties between the two countries, became familiar with the functions of the Procureur du Roi. Presently the King's Advocate appeared in civil as well as in criminal cases. In the beginning of the sixteenth century he combined politics with law; was employed in diplomacy, and took part "in the general business of the Government." In the reign of Charles I. the appointment was taken from the king and given to the Parliament, which exercised that right till the Restoration. Previous to this we hear of Advocate-Deputes and Joint-Advocates, and, about the end of the sixteenth century, the title of Lord Advocate was given to Sir Thomas Hamilton, the ancestor of the present Earl of Haddington. When he had been formally recognized as an important officer of State, he was made a Privy Councillor; it was contended by the upholders of kingly prerogative that he had a right to sit and speak in the House of Commons without election, in mere virtue of his office; he rose in dignity and importance when the post of Scottish Secretary was abolished, once in 1725 and again in 1746; his salary was doubled after the Union in 1710; and altogether, what with the comparative ignorance or indifference to Scotch affairs on the part of English statesmen, the extraordinary combination of political and legal duties in one and the same individual, and the conspicuous ability of men bearing the name of Dalrymple and Dundas, the Lord Advocate wielded a power and exercised a social influence which caused him to be described not merely in party reviews or pamphlets, but on grave and solemn occasions, "as the Privy Council, the Grand Jury, the Commander-in-Chief of the forces of Scotland, and the Guardian of the whole police of the country." The fluctuations and changes in the office, and the force of public feeling aroused by high-handed or ill-advised proceedings of its incumbents, are described with truth and fulness, and are interesting contributions to the questions now discussed in Liberal Scotch circles, of giving to that neglected and oppressed part of Her Majesty's dominion a separate Secretary or department.

Several of the early Lord Advocates have no more claim to the remembrance of posterity than some of Lord Campbell's obscure and early Chancellors. In a period of two centuries there is not much to be said for one Sir John Nisbet, except that he was the author of Dirleton's Doubts, he was raised to the Bench under that title, wrangled with his colleagues, and was of infamous character; for Fletcher, who was dismissed from office for bribery; for Colquhoun, who was unduly preferred to a far more able man, Henry Erskine, the brother of the Chancellor; for Craigie, a dull, plodding, but successful lawyer; and for Charles Hope, of whom it is recorded that, if he had not been a violent Tory, he must from sheer impetuosity of character have been a violent Whig. But the sayings and doings of other men are still quoted by the Scotch Bar, and of one or two others the marks are to be traced on the face of Scotch society to this very hour. Few men have ever wielded such power as Harry Dundas. And this power, though exerted on the side of personal and almost autocratic government, did not hinder him from being one of the most popular men of the day. Nearly eighty pages of Vol. II. are devoted to an account of Scotland under the Government of Pitt and Dundas; and, as regards the latter, we are reminded of his manly figure, his broad Scotch accent and provincial dialect, his occasional insubordination in Parliament, his acquaintance with the affairs of India, unsurpassed in that generation by any one except Burke, his powers of administration in high offices, his errors, impeachment, and acquittal, and his control over the Scottish elections which enabled him to send stout Tories to the House of Commons and to manipulate the list of representative peers. Something of this ascendency is due to the man's character and talents, but something also to the "anomalous" state of the constituencies. In 1790, we are told, the number of county voters in all Scotland was 2,624. Ayrshire, the largest constituency, had 220; and Cromarty, the smallest, only 6. There were 96 in Midlothian, "the premier county"; in nine counties 389 voters in all voted at nine elections, and in twenty others there was no contest whatever. The state of the boroughs was still more deplorable. The average of each constituency was nineteen, and the largest towns for electoral purposes were Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Selkirk, with 33 voters apiece. The electors were the Town Councillors in boroughs, arranged in fourteen groups, and they appointed delegates, who met at the chief borough and chose their member. Votes were easily manufactured for party purposes by the process of conveying pieces of land, in trust, to individuals; and though, from the beginning of the last century, laws were passed to prevent these abuses, they were easily evaded or coolly defied. Even as late as 1830 the boroughs, or burghs, as Mr. Omond spells the word, returned eleven Whig and four Tory members, and the counties seventeen Tories to thirteen Whigs. Two years afterwards the balance of parties was altered to very near its present proportions. Scotland returned nine Tories to forty-four Whigs. Before that epoch Paisley, Irvine, and Kilmarnock, with thousands of voters, were not represented at all. The impeachment of Harry Dundas, when made Lord Melville, is the last event of this kind in political warfare; and Mr. Omond, who wisely is not above noticing squibs and pamphlets on other occasions, might very well have given us a sample of the song to celebrate Melville's acquittal which was composed by Scott, and sung by John Ballantyne amidst rapturous applause at a public dinner given on the 27th of June, 1806. It may not rank very high as poetry, but Lockhart characterizes it as an expression "of some of the strongest personal feelings that ever animated his verse." The air is "Carrickfergus," and after a good deal about French politics, the loyalty of the volunteers, the weakness of the beer-tax, the shameful duty on pig-iron, rebellion, treason, and good claret, the song winds up with an allusion to the refusal of the town magistrates to illumine Edinburgh on account of the acquittal:—

> And since we must not set auld Reekie in glory,
> And make her brown visage as light as her heart;
> Till each man illumine his own upper story,
> Nor law-book nor lawyer shall force us to part.
> In Grenville and Spencer,
> And some few good men, Sir,
> High talents we honour, slight difference forgive,
> But the brewer we hoax,
> Tallyho to the Fox;
> And drink Melville for ever as long as we live.

The brewer is of course Whitbread, who figures by name in another stanza. With a trifling change the verses might easily be made applicable to the events of our time, especially when we are told that the army has had a slap, and that the "Cape is called a bauble unworthy of thanks." We must leave to the reader the other half-length or full-length portraits of Dundas's successors. The colouring of Francis Jeffrey seems to us laid on rather thick.

* The Lord Advocates of Scotland, from the Close of the Fifteenth Century to the Passing of the Reform Bill. By George W. T. Omond, Advocate. 2 vols. Edinburgh: David Douglas. 1883.

As a lawyer and a critic he showed very considerable powers. But it is going rather far to say that, amongst all the contributors to the Edinburgh Review, he has but one rival, the writer whose article on Milton appeared in 1825, just four years before Jeffrey retired from the editorial chair. In wit and humour and in actual mastery of English, the articles of Sydney Smith are surely far superior to Jeffrey's; while for variety and dignity of style, as well as for wealth of historical information, we should place some of the ecclesiastical essays of the late Sir James Stephen above anything that Jeffrey ever wrote. Yet we can read with pleasure the criticisms of Jeffrey on Scott's poems and novels, showing, it has been happily said, how the sun appeared to those who saw it on the horizon, and long before it had attained to its meridian splendour.

For some readers the incidental notices of cherished abuses, barbarous customs, queer ways, and primitive social manners will always have much attraction. As late as the beginning of the sixteenth century jurymen might be arraigned for the improper acquittal of a prisoner, before a great assize composed of twenty-five landed gentlemen, and, if clearly wrong, were liable to one year's imprisonment and the loss of their personal property. We should have thought that, as a consequence, the person wrongfully acquitted might be tried again; but this was not so. In 1606 some ministers of the Scotch kirk were summoned to an ecclesiastical conference at London. Those who went by sea reached the capital in ten days. The others rode and took some weeks. We are glad to learn that James I. treated them kindly, and that the Dean of Salisbury asked them to dinner. When the National Covenant, so familiar from Old Mortality and the graves of martyrs in the Western Lowlands, was pitted against the King's Covenant, several of the judges of sessions, though anxious to please King Charles, refused to sign the latter. In the massacre of Glencoe the author takes much the same line as Lord Macaulay, and remarks that outrages as brutal and treacherous on Non-conformists had passed unchallenged, and had been applauded in the reign of Charles II. At the time of the Union the Lord President's salary was raised from 350*l.* to 800*l.* a year; but the King's laundress lost her salary of 50*l.*, which she had drawn yearly for doing nothing. Of Duncan Forbes of Culloden, more conspicuous as Lord President than as Lord Advocate, though eminent in both capacities, it is stated that he was a capital hand at golf, and never lost his temper "unless any one was careless." When Highland regiments were raised in September 1745, the duty of disposing of the commissions of officers was entrusted to this judge, and it is much to his credit that he remonstrated with the Duke of Cumberland for his cruel treatment of the rebels, and was therefore not received with favour at Court. In 1748 Lord Kinnoul wrote to Lord Advocate Craigie that he had ridden from Edinburgh to London in a fortnight or three weeks, as we make out, at the rate of forty miles a day, with stoppages. He found the hills of Cumberland and Westmoreland nearly as bad as the wild country between Peebles and Moffat. We are not surprised to learn that twenty years afterwards the road from Edinburgh to Peebles was still so bad that a carriage could seldom go faster than three miles an hour. Montgomery, then Lord Advocate, got up a subscription to improve communication, gained the title of the "Father of the County," and reformed several of the abuses of the old and vexatious law of entail in the interest of landlord and tenant. Scotch farmers, at the present day, may derive a faint consolation from the fact that in the year 1816 every interest was depressed. In the middle of May the hills near Edinburgh were "white with snow." It rained all summer, and the harvest was a "total failure." At the time of the Union there were only three papers in Scotland, at least two of which were published at Edinburgh, the Gazette and the Courant. At the close of the war with Napoleon there were thirty or forty. The Scotsman was started in 1817, and, then as now, was conducted with singular ability. Into the State trials, followed too often by severe and savage sentences, we have no space to go. Lord Braxfield, then Lord Justice Clerk, outdid most judges in his charges to subservient juries, and we are reminded of an anecdote told of him by Scott, though not quoted in this book. In his judicial tour Braxfield used often to be entertained by a Scotch Laird, with whom he played chess. Subsequently the said Laird was arraigned for an outrage before his quondam guest and found guilty. When sentence of death was passed in the usual form, the Lord Justice after the solemn formula, "and may the Lord have mercy on your soul," dropped his voice, and said, with a chuckle, "And now, Donald, my man, I have checkmated you for ance." The trial of Burke on the evidence of Hare, though not political, convulsed Scotland in 1829. Hare, the King's evidence, was actually detained in prison after Burke's conviction in the vain hope that, though his life had been guaranteed, he might be tried on some new charge. It seems strange that a sheriff should have refused the prisoner his release, and that it became necessary to appeal to the Court of Session, which at once held that, however horrible was the revelation of the informer, he was not be sacrificed, the Lord Justice Clerk neatly said, to the vengeance vicium prava subentium. Hare was released, and it was never known what became of him. He was last seen making for England, after nearly being torn to pieces at Dumfries.

Readers of these volumes will do well to bear in mind the distinction between two kinds of burgh reform. One had to do with Parliamentary representation, the other dealt with the election of town councillors. Nothing could be more improper than the old system. At one period even the magistrates elected themselves, and it is just fifty years since the town councillors were similarly chosen. After various unsuccessful attempts, the close system was abolished, and this judicious reform was mainly due to the exertions and eloquence of the Lord Advocate of the day, who thus established a claim to the gratitude of his countrymen which may fairly vie with his services to them as editor of the Edinburgh Review.

M. QUANTIN is famous among contemporary publishers. From his shop in the Rue Saint-Benoit there have issued some of the comeliest, most desirable books of modern times. He has the instinct of numbered copies and choice impressions, the cultus of Whatman and Dutch and candid vellum, the sentiment of "states," the true feeling of the engraving hors texte. In his newest essay, the two noble quartos of M. Gonse's L'Art Japonais, he has surpassed himself. The binding, it is true, is not wholly satisfactory; the crude vermilion of the lettering and the staring contrast of the great red orb and the black bird in the top corner do not suit well with the yellow silk (as of a Chinese Jacket of Honour) which forms the groundwork and the general envelope. Apart from this, however, everything is matter for praise. The several papers are the best possible; the type is new; the printing, in text and illustrations alike, is perfect. The pages are excellently arranged and broken; the margins are broad; the effect throughout is irreproachable. Of woodcuts and process blocks there are upwards of eight hundred; and of etchings (monotinted and polychromatic), plates in héliogravure, chromo-lithographs, grisailles, and "aquarelles typographiques" there are sixty-four in all, each one of them an admirable work of art. There can be no doubt that the book (the issue of which is strictly limited to fourteen hundred copies) is incomparably the finest of its year, and one of the finest of its generation.

Nothing, indeed, exists on the subject which is at once so useful and so splendid, so complete in intention and so thorough and exhaustive in treatment. Many have written of the perfections and enchantments of Japanese art; none has written so much and so well as M. Louis Gonse. When Dr. Anderson has arranged his unrivalled collection for the British Museum, and finished the catalogue on which he has been at work so long, we shall doubtless have something to which, as our own, we can refer with proper pride, and from which the best "Japanists," English and foreign, may learn. But meanwhile we can go no further than the text of M. Louis Gonse. It is the outcome of years of labour—the result of a prolonged and passionate study, under circumstances exceptionally felicitous, of the finest and truest expressions of the Japanese genius. The subject is one of the most difficult and most complex, and, under certain aspects, one of the most inaccessible, in art. In all materials, and in every direction save that of pure beauty, the Japanese artists have for hundreds of years been working; and in all materials and in all directions save one they have excelled. For eight or ten centuries—from Kanaoka the Great, the Cimabue of Japan, to the incomparable Hokusai, who is its Leech, its Ingres, its Daumier in one—their activity has rarely slackened for long. The result has been such a world of achievement as is hardly to be equalled by that of any Western nation, not excepting Italy herself. With the greater part of this we are only just beginning to be acquainted. At Italian art we have been working for centuries; but with the manifold and surprising accomplishment of Japan we have been in direct and immediate contact but a few years. And during these, it must be noted, our opportunities have been none of the best. The materials on hand were extraordinarily multifarious, were costly when they were not insignificant, were always in admirable disorder. There had been no attempt at classification; the history of Japanese art in all its manifestations was a sealed book; most of the marks, legends, and inscriptions presented to our notice turned out to be undecipherable and incomprehensible to the Japanese themselves. Time was, in fact—and not so long ago, either—when the art of Japan was thought to be as higgledy-piggledy a matter as a common Japanese picture appears to the uninitiated, and its masterpieces—in lacquer, ivory, wood, bronze, porcelain, painted silk, printed paper—were all set down as "curios," and nothing more. There was no literature; there was a great jumble of matter; the theory and practice both were the antipodes of our own. Critics looked for balance and rhythm, for beauty of line and loftiness of ideal, for emotional expression and perfection of type; they found them utterly lacking; they concluded that art of this sort was neither more nor less than an "immense blague," like the fortune of the lady who became Mme. Robert Macaire. The mistake was pardonable—was less a fault than a misfortune. But that was before M. Gonse had written and M. Quantin produced the two volumes of L'Art Japonais. If any one goes on cleaving to the old error, his misfortune will be not less; but that it is so will be wholly his fault.

For M. Gonse has begun at the beginning. He is not content to take Japan as it stands; he does his utmost to discover how it came to be. It is not enough for him to note the presence of Chinese elements in Japanese art and civilisation, and to repeat that these are traditionally reported to have been intro-dated in a Buddhistic medium, through Corea; he shows himself keen on determining the exact quality of their influence, the why and wherefore of their absorption, the precise extent of the modifications they have undergone. He finds material for speculation and conclusion everywhere—in Turretini and in Kaempfer, in Reed and Dickson and Reclus; in the Empire Japonais of Matsmaïeff which dates from yesterday, and the Koziki, compiled for the Emperor Tenmou close on twelve hundred years ago; in Mitford's Tales of Old Japan and, the Zenken-Kojitsou of the inimitable Yosai; in the pasquinades of Hokkei and in the pages of Professor Morse. Art, legend, history, philology, anthropology, geography, are all pressed into the service in turn. In his first section, a "Coup-d'œil sur l'Histoire du Japon," he begins among the Kamis, the old primæval gods; he tells of the creation of the world and man by Isanaghi and Jsanami his sister; of the birth and disappearance of Hirougo, all-father of the barbarians; of the fortunes of Amaterassou, Goddess of the Sun, from whom proceeds the imperial race of Japan; of the career of Zimmou, her great-great-grandchild, son of Ninighi and the peerless Tamayori, the first Mikado in history, founder of the dynasty of Yamato; of the thousand years of war and conquest which followed his appearance; the seven or eight centuries of peace and Confucianism and the liberal arts that succeed and form the second stage in the development of Japan; of the growth of the Shoguns and the gradual obliteration of the Mikados; of the rise and fall of the clans of Fouzivara, Taïra, Minamoto, Hojo, Ashikaga, and Tokougava; of the heroic enterprise and governance of Yoritomo, the Napoleon of Japan, and of Yeyas, its Richelieu-Colbert, and so to the revolution of 1867, when the Shoguns were finally overthrown, the Mikados were graced once more with the reality of power, and Japan, thrown open to the foreigner, began to be the Japan we know—a Japan with a journalistic circulation of 29,000,000, and an interest in Listerism and Herbert Spencer, and a national debt that would not disgrace the most prosperous of European nationalities. In his second section—"Le Pays, le Race"—he treats not less minutely and carefully of the natural circumstances of the empire than heretofore of its history and its legends. He considers it geographically, philologically, anthropologically and zoologically, botanically and economically; to get at the secret of its art, he takes care to formulate exactly and completely the conditions which form the matrix of that art, and without which it could not have been at all. In his third chapter he treats of painting—from Inshiraga, in the fifth century, to its creation by Kanaoka in the ninth, and thereafter, through the stories of the rival schools of Tosa and Kano—Tosa the classic and heroic, and Kano the realistic and humorous—to Hokusai and Hokkei and Yosai, and the ruin under Western influences of one of the most admirable æsthetic traditions which the world has known. Painting M. Gonse regards as the foundation of all the arts. The chapter in which he deals with it is the longest, though not perhaps the best, in his book. He follows it up with so many more on architecture, sculpture, chasing and metal-work, lacquer-work, textiles, ceramics (by Mr. S. Bing), and prints and engravings. And it is hardly too much to say that the whole forms something like a cyclopædia of Japan and Japanese art.

In a review like the present it is impossible to do more than refer in passing to a few of M. Gonse's many wonderful illustrations. From first to last his book is crowded with pictures, most of them bearing directly on the text, and all with a quality of some sort to recommend them to our attention and regard. Hokusai, Yosai, Hiroshighe, and Hokkei are freely drawn upon, the first and last for their studies of life and manners, the third for his landscapes, the second for his pictures of heroes and famous men. They are mostly reproduced in black and white, and in the text; but of Hokusai, Shinsei, Shighenobou, Gakoutei, and others (especially of the first) there are a number of "squirelles typographiques," by Gillot, the merit of which is really extraordinary. Among the many admirable reproductions in héliogravure (by M. Dujardin) mention must be made of the several plates of netsukés and sword-hilts, and of those which show a landscape by Sesshiu, a landscape by Tanyu, and a picture by Zaïtiu of two adorable little bears in the snow. M. Guillaume's two typo-grisailles, in black and gold, are remarkable; and the lithographs, by MM. Coin and Lemoine, of Hizen, Kioto, and Satsuma ware, are among the best we have seen. Of the etchings the most curious, perhaps, is one by a native of Japan, reproducing, with exceptional delicacy and skill, a set of motives by Hokusai. The strongest and most graphic, however, are certainly those in which M. Henri Gudrard has set himself to reproduce the sentiment, the lines, the textures, of the several achievements in plastic art confided to his charge. One (there are four or five of them) represents a bronze bouquet-holder; it is in the form of a bulged and broken old creel, cast away long since, and sunk full fathom five; its tenant, a great red crab (in copper, "rouge laqué au feu") is crawling with all his might from a hole in the side; it is a very striking work. A second—a masterpiece of reproduction—shows a superb bronze dragon (in real life a harmless necessary incense-burner) all spikes and coils, with awful jaws, and the claws of a fiend, and the make and length and agility of a creature of hell. A third, printed in red and black, is some way the finest of all, is of an antique theatrical mask, a grotesque at once comic and horrible. It is a concept of singular freshness and imagination, and it is modelled with a vigour, an assurance, an apprehension of reality, that suggest the Greeks themselves. From these, indeed, the Japanese had in some ways nothing to learn. They were the Greeks of the ugly.

Of Mr. Audsley's magnificent enterprise there is not, at this moment, very much to say. As yet its publication has got no further than a first part—one half, that is to say, of one volume. It appears as a neat portfolio, inscribed with a Japanese legend, and figured with a flying dusk in gold, and the huge red circle of a sun. The contents include a brief introduction, some few illustrations in the text, and over twenty splendid chromo-lithographs—among the best M. Lemercier has done—and the descriptions appertaining thereto. Ten are of paintings of one sort or another, four of incrusted work, three of metal-work, three of textile fabrics, two each of lacquer and embroidery, and one of cloisonné enamel. The descriptions, we may note, are not quite worthy of the illustrations. Certain of the specimens selected for these latter are excellent. The first is a feeding crane (signed "Ozawa"), a kakemono painted on silk; in the second we have six scenes out of eight from a picture-book, a legend of battle and adventure and terror; in the fourth, the contents of a makimono devoted to a description of hell as it seems to the romantic of these latitudes—an ecstasy of fiends and flames and tortures and misery; in another, a wonderful piece of incrusted work, a goblin dream, an indigestion of imps and devils grotesque and hideous, and appearances suggesting Hoffmann and Breughel d'Enfer; and so to the end. A certain patchiness and scrappiness, a manifest incompleteness notwithstanding, the work is the most sumptuous and elaborate on the subject yet produced in English; and we shall, of course, return to it—as it appears, and in its completed form.

THE author of this pleasant little book "appeals," in the preface through her editor, "to her readers and critics to be indulgent to the effort which it has cost her much to make" in recording her memories of seventy years. Nobody could judge harshly one who writes so modestly of herself. She is sprung on both sides from a literary stock. Her mother's father was the learned, the eccentric, and the unfortunate Gilbert Wakefield, who, in the evil days that came upon England at the close of last century, was punished with a cruel imprisonment of two years for some rash and violent words. Her father's father was Dr. Aikin, who is now known more as the brother of Mrs. Barbauld than as an author himself. Yet his Evenings at Home—oddly enough called by his great-granddaughter, the editor of these Memories, "Evenings of Home"—is, we believe, still read with pleasure by young people. Of Mrs. Barbauld's genius it is not needful to speak. A woman who has written lines that have been the object of Wordsworth's envy is not likely to be forgotten. Crabbe Robinson has told us in his Diary how, when he repeated to the poet her beautiful stanza on "Life," he heard him mutter to himself, "I am not in the habit of grudging people their good things, but I wish I had written those lines." Her Early Lessons we are inclined to look upon as the best book that has ever been written for very young children. If it is not used in every infant school in the kingdom, there are infants who are defrauded of their just rights. The author of these "Memories"—we could wish that she had given us her name—thus writes of her early years and of those among whom she was brought up:—

> I feel that I ought to have made a better use of the atmosphere of science and literature by which I was surrounded in my childhood; but I had neither the talents nor the industry of either of my sisters, besides which I had very delicate health, owing, as I knew afterwards, to having been brought up in a close part of London, in an undrained house. No one thought or knew anything about sanitary matters then; it was long after that I discovered that the deaths of my mother and second sister a few years later on had been from this cause.
> As to the rest of my father's family then living at Stoke Newington, I certainly never saw any persons like my elder relations.
> Pure in their lives, of perfect integrity, free from envy as worldly ambition, affectionate in their family relations, they were satisfied to live in the most Spartan simplicity, truly
> "Content with science in a humble cell,"
> though without any coarseness, as their habits were refined as their manners.

We doubt whether families such as the one that is here described are so commonly found as they were in the early part of the century. At that time the wholesome part of Rousseau's teaching still bore good and even abundant fruit, and in perfect simplicity of life happiness was often both sought and found.

While we have read these "Memories" with pleasure, yet our duty requires us to point out that this book is very far from being faultless. Too much of it does not consist of "Memories" at all, but is made up of extracts from other works. Thus we have an account of Howard the philanthropist, who died more than twenty years before our author was born. It is true that he corresponded with her father; but this correspondence, as we are here told, had been already published. There are other pieces also quoted which are rather fit for swelling a volume than for catching the interest of the reader. However, we can well believe that to those who are unacquainted with the times and the people that are described these quotations may prove interesting. For ourselves, while we admit that a well-made hash is by no means bad fare, yet we are not altogether pleased when we come to it in the belief that it is a dish of fresh meat. So much censure as this we must pass on this book, and with so much we may be satisfied. Our readers shall not be able to complain that we have misled them. We have warned them that it is a work of very unequal merit, and we shall now turn to that part of it which is both original and pleasing.

One of the author's earliest recollections is of the pride of literature. Nearly all her elder relations were authors by profession. She herself and her little sisters "were always introduced as the granddaughters of Dr. Aikin and nieces of Mrs. Barbauld; sometimes as granddaughters of Gilbert Wakefield; all which," she adds, "must no doubt have been very bad for us." That she should have kept herself so entirely free from priggishness is much to her credit. "I remember with shame," she writes, "the contemptuous pity with which I regarded children whose relations had never written books, never seen their own names in print." This conceit was greatly nourished, no doubt, by the fact that her family belonged to a small and unpopular sect. Her aunt, Miss Lucy Aikin, has left on record how in her childhood she had been "persecuted by children for words, for names, of the meaning of which none of them had the slightest conception. I have sat," she writes, "a whole evening whilst others were dancing, because nobody would dance with a Presbyterian. I have been pushed, hunted, even struck, as I stood silent and helpless to the cry of Presbyterian." The modern Unitarians, we may remind our readers, are the descendants of the English Presbyterians. Mrs. Barbauld, even in her old age, was not safe from this intolerance. "A beautiful poem which she published after her husband's death provoked so savage an attack in the Quarterly that she was quite discouraged from writing again for the public." It is some slight satisfaction to learn that Mr. Murray, the publisher, told Crabbe Robinson "that he was more ashamed of the article on Mrs. Barbauld than of anything he had ever printed." The most famous writer on the Quarterly had been anxious to make her acquaintance. But when he was introduced to her, "Sir Walter only bowed and turned away." Some time later he again heard her name, and then exclaimed, "Is that Mrs. Barbold? I thought when you said Mrs. Barbo, it must be somebody else." He had not known that her husband had retained the French pronunciation of his name. Our author herself heard Scott tell Mrs. Barbauld a very interesting anecdote. He reminded her that when many years earlier she had visited Edinburgh, she had with her a manuscript copy of Taylor's version of Bürger's Leonora. This she had read to Dugald Stewart. "He," said Scott, "repeated all he could remember of it to me, and this, madam, was what made me a poet. I had several times attempted the more regular kinds of poetry without success, but here was something I thought I could do." Southey does not properly come within these "Memories." In his youth, whenever he was in town, he had been a constant visitor at the houses of our author's father and aunt. "When he changed his political opinions, however, he at once entirely dropped their friendship, never once visiting or writing to them again." Coleridge she first met on the staircase of the Mansion House, of all places—"a tall stout man, with thick white hair and fine dark eyes." She was once asked to the Gillmans' house at Highgate, at the time that he was living there, and she "listened with wrapt attention to his wonderful eloquence," as he spoke, "without any break, for more than an hour." When she saw Wordsworth he was suffering from the toothache, and scarcely said a word. Godwin she describes as "a little old man, with a clever, striking countenance and polite, almost cringing manners." His voice was as gentle as his manners. Walking one day on Hampstead Heath she saw a great crowd round a tree. "Going nearer, I saw a man preaching—a tall figure, with long black hair parted down the middle, fine features, but with a terrible cast in his eye.' He was the celebrated Edward Irving, the friend of Carlyle. . . . We could not get near enough to hear his words, but his action was impressive and graceful, and he was listened to with the deepest attention." Of a very different kind is another of her "Memories." Lord Denman had been one of Mrs. Barbauld's pupils. For him and for his companions she had written her Early Lessons and her Hymns in Prose. "He never forgot his early teacher, and would always in after times speak of her to us in terms of warm affection, saying that if he had any eloquence it was owing to his readings with Mrs. Barbauld." At an evening party at his house our author met Lord Brougham and his daughter. "Brougham seemed to doat upon her, and his eyes followed her about always as she danced. At the end of the evening a country dance was formed, in which the two great lawyers joined. All of a sudden Lord Denman fell down as if he had been shot; he had snapped his tendon Achilles." With Samuel Rogers the Aikins were on terms of great intimacy. "I never could understand," she writes, "the brutal jokes made upon his personal appearance. . . . His manners were polished and courteous, and he was most generous and benevolent to all who asked his help." The following anecdote of him she has never, she says, seen in print:—

> Going one night to the gallery of the opera, which he thought the best place for hearing, he noticed a respectable looking elderly man gazing at him very intently for some time. At last, between the acts, he left his seat, and placing himself in front of Mr. Rogers, said in a solemn tone, "Pray, sir, is your name Samuel Rogers?"
> Mr. Rogers, who always cherished the hope that his works were popular with the lower classes, replied most graciously that it was.
> "Then, sir," said the man, "I should be glad to know, if you please, why you have changed your poulterer?"

Crabbe she describes as "a gentle, courteous old man, almost painfully humble; he looked as if he had suffered much, which was indeed the case." Stothard also she had often met—"a simple-mannered man, with a kind, thoughtful face, and thick white hair." Malthus had been a pupil of her great-grandfather's. "When I knew him," she writes, "he was a polite, handsome, kind old man, tall and slender, with dark eyes." She heard a curious anecdote of Mrs. Inchbald from Miss Benger. This latter lady, whose name is now quite forgotten, had been anxious to obtain an introduction to the once famous novelist. Failing in all other expedients, "she bribed Mrs. Inchbald's servant to let her take her place at her lodgings in the evening. Accordingly, in cap and apron, she brought up the tea-kettle and tea-tray."

> I presume this led to an introduction, as she once told us, in illustration of Mrs. Inchbald's penurious habits, that she was spending an evening with her in very cold weather, when in spite of the delightful talk of her hostess, it grew so dreadfully cold that she rose to go. Mrs. Inchbald not being able to make up her mind to the extravagance of putting on more coal, but being equally desirous to enjoy the talk, exclaimed, "Oh, stay a little longer, and I will push all the fire to your side."

Of Joanna Baillie we got an amusing anecdote. She told the author how some of her old friends in Scotland had been shocked at the line of writing she had taken to. No doubt it was her plays at which they looked askance. "Have ye heard," wrote one of them, "that Jocky Baillie has taken to the public line?" Of a Miss Hamond, a lady who for many years lived with Mrs. Barbauld, some curious stories are told. She was so ignorant of common things that "if she had a hard egg she would send it down to be boiled softer. When her ear was syringed for deafness, she would hold the sponge to the opposite side of her head." Readers of Crabbe Robinson's Diary may remember the account he gives of the suicide of the brother of this lady. Among this unhappy man's papers Mr. Robinson, as he told our author long afterwards, had found one entitled "The Best Way of Killing Mrs. Barbauld." She, poor woman, had troubles enough in her own household, for her husband was a dangerous lunatic, and had once attacked her with a carving-knife. Him our author cannot remember. His good will towards her he had shown on the day of her birth by rushing out the moment he heard the news to buy a pound of barley-sugar for the new-born baby. Not long afterwards he drowned himself in the New River. In the touching lines which his aged widow wrote on his death, which are quoted in this book, we find a passage which bears a striking likeness to two fine lines of Dr. Garth's:—

> 'Tis not for thee the tears I shed,
> Thy sufferings now are o'er;
> The sea is calm, the tempest past,
> On that eternal shore.

Garth had said:—

> To die is landing on some silent shore,
> Where billows never break, nor tempests roar.

With one more story we must bring our notice to a close. Collectors of old china will sigh when they read it. The author had been told by her father that once when he was dining with Mr. Wedgewood's sister, Mr. Wedgewood, who was present, "perceiving a few cracks in the plates at the end of the meal, took out his pocket-knife and broke every piece of china on the table. The next morning his sister received from him a beautiful new dinner-service."

A NEW AMERICAN NOVELIST.*

THE fashion of anonymity prevails more in the United States than in Great Britain. It is true that an English author now and again chooses to hide himself for a little space. Lord Lytton's authorship of The Coming Race and of The Parisians was unconfessed until after his death. Mr. Charles Reade published The Woman-Hater in Blackwood without his name. Ready-Money Mortiboy bore no signature when it first came before the public, and Mr. Besant's later venture, The Revolt of Man, also made its mark unaided by its author's name. To this day Mr. Hamerton's Marmorne is unacknowledged in England, although it has been attributed to him by authority in the Tauchnitz edition. In the United States there are not a few single instances of unsigned novels, of which Democracy is the best known of late; but there are also two series devoted wholly to anonymous fiction. The first of these, aptly called the "No Name Series," has for its motto a quotation from George Eliot, "Is the gentleman anonymous? Is he a great unknown?" In this series have appeared the Marmorne of Mr. Hamerton, the stories of the young lady whose signature in England is "George Fleming," and two tales of a peculiar and weird power and fascination, Mercy Philbrick's Choice and Hetty's Strange History, besides many other novels of varying merit and success. And it is indisputable that the absence of names has stimulated public curiosity and got the stories more talked about than if they had been signed. But the public began to tire of the trick and to demand from an anonymous novel qualities which would repay the trouble and worry of guessing at the authorship. When the first number of The Bread-Winners appeared in the Century last summer it proved its right to the widespread criticism it excited, and the second and third instalments maintained this interest. The story was strong and the grasp of character firm, and the author showed the skill to seize on traits of American life and character hitherto neglected by novelists. He spoke as one having authority, and there was much question as to whom he might be. Plainly enough The Bread-Winners is not the work of a beginner in authorship, and equally plainly it is not the work of one of the recognized American novelists. There can indeed be but little doubt that there is a new American novelist, and that he has made his appearance in literature with one of the strongest and most striking stories of the last ten years.

The English publishers in their advertisement suggest that perhaps The Bread-Winners is by the author of Democracy. In the United States those who are best qualified to form an opinion incline to the belief that Democracy was written by a collaboration of three or four clever people, at least one of whom was a woman; and it may be that the author of The Bread-Winners was one of the authors of Democracy. But there can be no doubt as to the relative merits of the two books. In England Democracy was ludicrously overrated, was indeed accepted as a revelation; in America it was seen to be quite as superficial as it was clever—even its title was dishonest; it was as though Ginx's Baby had been labelled Aristocracy. The Bread-Winners is a story of another sort; it is quite as clever as Democracy, and it is much more than merely clever; while the merits of Democracy were fully summed up in the one word cleverness. The Bread-Winners is the work of a very clever man; it is told with many lively strokes of humour; it sparkles with epigram; it is brilliant with wit; but it has what Democracy had not—it has depth; and its author has what the authors of Democracy had not, or, at least, what they did not then reveal—it has both feeling and imagination. The characters of The Bread-Winners are rounded; those of Democracy are thin and flat. Stick a pin into the best character in Democracy—the Senator—and you can see daylight through him. Stick a pin into Mr. Temple or Maud Matchin, of The Bread-Winners, and they bleed.

This, indeed, is the prime merit of The Bread-Winners: the chief characters in it are actually alive; they are really flesh and blood; they are at once true and new; and they are emphatically and aggressively American. The anonymous author has a firm grip on American character. He has seen, and he has succeeded in making us see, facts and phases of American life which no one has put into a book before. He has attempted to handle certain of the problems of life in America, and his boldness and insight have been rewarded with success. Although the novel is called "a social study," it is not the less a story; it has a beginning, a middle, and an end; it has a plot, a catastrophe, a climax; it is not a mere echo of "the hum of the smallest of talk," without form and void. The Bread-Winners is a story; it is true that those who believe that all the stories have been said and sung already may consider that this is a twice-told tale. In fact, there is nothing very novel in the plot, although it is artfully evolved, and although it contains many ingeniously-contrived incidents. It may be conceded at once that the story begins better than it ends, and that its finish is hurried. That the comedy of the earlier chapters falls into melodrama toward the close of the book, and that this melodrama narrowly escapes vulgarity and does not altogether escape brutality, this also must be admitted. But the melodrama is never "sensational"; it never pandors to the unhealthy appetite for horrors; and it springs naturally from the situation.

The scene of the story is laid in a thriving young town on one of the Great Lakes; the author calls it Buffland, as though he wished to hint at both Buffalo and Cleveland; but there can be little doubt that Cleveland was the model from which he drew. "The Bread-Winners" is the name of a secret society of labour reformers, got up by a demagogue by the name of Offitt. There is a general strike in Buffland, stirred up by Offitt and his fellows. The hero of the story is Captain Farnham, a young millionaire, who has recently resigned from the army, after four years of civil war and ten years of Indian fighting. He organizes a squad of old soldiers, repulses an attack on his own house, and protects the house of Mrs. Belding, whose daughter Alice is one of the most beautiful and lovely figures in recent fiction. She is a noble specimen of womanhood, quite as typical of the American girl in one way as was Daisy Miller in another. Offitt robs and half kills Captain Farnham, whose life is saved by Alice Belding. Offitt is strangled by the man on whom he has tried to throw the blame of the murder. The "Bread-Winners" themselves play a subordinate part in the story, and one inclines to the belief that the author having planned a tale of the labour troubles, allowed the development of certain necessary characters to run away with him, and to push into the background the original motive, which is handled only hastily and in the last half of the book. It is to be regretted that the original motive was not wholly discarded, for the author has succeeded only in treating inadequately one side of the discussion between labour and capital. Had he abandoned it wholly, he would have been able to devote himself with singleness of purpose to harmonious elaboration of the little group of characters which give the book its permanent value, and which redeem the disappointment the reader is likely to feel at the discordance between the beginning of the book and the end. The real drama of the story lay in the contrast of Alice Belding and Maud Matchin, and in the development of their characters in consequence of their association with Farnham. This is suggested, but before it is worked out the author turns again to the brotherhood of the Bread-Winners, to Mr. Bott, the Inspirational Medium, to the riot, and the murder. These things are well done, but they have been well done before. And Maud Matchin and Mr. Temple had never been done at all; and they were well worth doing.

Even as it is, Maud Matchin is the unforgettable figure of the book, boldly projected, and standing firm on her feet. The daughter of an English carpenter, she was marvellously modified by her American environment. She left the high school unfitted for work, full of vague hopes and romantic visions, and conscious of her own robust and remarkable beauty:—

> She was too strong and well to dream much; her only visions were of a rich man who should love her for her fine eyes. She would meet him in some simple and casual way; he would fall in love at sight, and speedily prosper in his wooing; they would be married—privately, for Maud blushed and burned to think of her home at such times,—and then they would go to New York to live. She never wasted conjecture on the age, the looks, the manner of being of this possible hero. Her mind intoxicated itself with the thought of his wealth. She went one day to the Public Library to read the articles on Rothschild and Astor in the encyclopedias. She even tried to read the editorial articles on gold and silver in the Ohio papers.
> Her mind was too much filled with interests of this kind to leave any great room for her studies. She had pride enough to hold her place in her classes, and that was all. She learned a little music, a little drawing, a little Latin, and a little French—the French of "Stratford-atte-Bowe," for French of Paris was not easy of attainment at Buffland. This language had an especial charm for her, as it seemed a connecting link with that elysium of fashion of which her dreams were full. She once went to the library and asked for "a nice French book." They gave her La Petite Fadette. She had read of George Sand in newspapers, which had called her a "corrupter of youth." She hurried home with her book, eager to test its corrupting qualities, and when, with locked doors and infinite labour, she had managed to read it, she was greatly disappointed at finding in it nothing to admire and nothing to shudder at. "How could such a smart woman as that waste her time writing about a lot of peasants, poor as crows, the whole lot!" was her final indignant comment.

The character of Maud Matchin is presented with extraordinary vigour and boldness. The girl is cold in feeling and coarse in mind—what a French author would have done with her we all may guess; what the American author has done with her we all may read in these pages. The scene between Captain Farnham and Maud Matchin in the conservatory, in which Maud Matchin, knowing that she does not care for Farnham at all, asks him to marry her—this scene is set before us with a mingled boldness and coldness worthy of the highest praise. This scene is true; it happened—or at least that is the impression it leaves. (And here occasion serves to say that the other scene, at the end of the book, in which Alice Belding reveals her love for Farnham, is quite as clever—but it never happened; Alice Belding would not do what she is described as doing, and could not if she would.) The scene in the conservatory between Maud Matchin and Farnham is more than clever; and it has touches not unworthy of Fielding or Thackeray. With a warmer temperament Maud Matchin would surely go headlong to the devil, and we should expect to see her either in the Potter's Field at Buffland, or with the demi-monde in Paris. As it is, the final glimpse we get of her is admirable; she marries the man who killed Offitt. "We need not say," remarks the author, "how much of good or how much of evil was to be expected from a wedlock so ill-regulated and untrained; where the woman brought into the partnership the wreck of ignoble ambitions, and the man the memory of a crime."

After Maud Matchin, the most original and striking figure in the book is Mr. Temple, a quiet, pleasant, social, silent gentleman, fond of the best wines and the fastest horses, and gifted with a command over the damnatory clauses of the English language which would qualify him for the Professorship of Ornamental Profanity in any Western college. We have but a glimpse of Mr. Temple, for he is presented with great reserve; but he is a man to remember. His unfailing flow of American humour and American good humour, his hard sense and his clear grit, unite with other peculiarities in making him one of the best-liked characters in the book, and that liking is a high tribute to the taste and discretion of the author. For one touch, however, we must find space here. It is Temple who warns Farnham against the rioters and proffers aid, and when Farnham suggests that Temple's own house and stable will need all his care, Temple has to explain, with a blush, that the rioters will not touch him or his property. "They say a man who uses such good horses and such bad language as I do—that's just what they say—is one of them, and shan't be racketed."

We have no desire to overpraise The Bread-Winners, and we could do the author no worse service. The book is not without faults, frequent and evident enough. The basement is too big for the roof for one thing; the promise of the earlier chapters is not quite fulfilled; there are rankness and crudity; there are many signs of inexperience as a novelist; for, although the anonymous author is beyond all question a writer of experience, he is obviously enough a novice as a novelist. But, after making all deductions, there remains a substantial balance in his favour. The Bread-Winners is emphatically a book to be read. It is a very strong story, but its brutal force has no flavour of the muscular paganism of Ouida and her fellows; it is rather the reaction of a highly-cultivated gentleman familiar with camps and courts, and tired of the prettinesses and pettinesses of most modern fiction. The Bread-Winners is interesting; it is earnest, it is sincere, it is in many ways a very remarkable book; fine in its performance, and finer still in its promise.

THE HISTORY OF LIDDESDALE.*

SCOTLAND is an old country remarkable for the absence of vestiges of antiquity. While in England there is a venerable church, or a church venerable before it was "restored," in almost every parish, an ancient parish church in Scotland is a kind of miracle. There is usually either the barn-like building, of any date between 1700 and 1860, or there is the Neo-Presbyterian Gothic, of an age in which young Scotch ministers try to dress like the most extreme of curates. The rising red-brick National Zion near Prince's Ground and Hans Place is a good example of Neo-Presbyterian art. However ancient a Scotch town may be, it generally manages to look bleak and new. Probably the old towns were very combustible, and were frequently burned by the English. Whether this be the cause of the absence of old houses (except in parts of Edinburgh old town) or not, it is rare to meet a town house as ancient as the Battle of Philiphaugh. The new look of the old towns is, perhaps, most remarkable on the Border; but the Border is, after all, the happiest hunting-ground for the Scotch antiquary. If the ballads have disappeared (they were certain to do that as soon as they were printed), the towers of the old gentry remain. Sometimes the peel has been turned into a house for a keeper or head shepherd; more frequently it is an empty shell, with crumbling staircases, and rooms from which the wainscoting has been torn. But the solid strength of the antique walls, proof in days past against axe and fire, remains. You may wander up any of the many burns that flow from the green hills into Ettrick, Tweed, Teviot, Ail, or Yarrow, or Liddell, and the odds are that you will soon find the old peel standing in a sheltered nook, the forsaken home of Scotts, Elliots, Armstrongs, Johnstones, and Hendersons of the warlike ages. Occasionally (as at Buccleugh) the tower has long been destroyed, and only a little farmhouse marks the site. But the rule is to find the keep, with all its memories of forays and chieftains, feuds and wardens, and March Treason and Border laws. These towers and the graven slabs, which are all that remain from the chapels in the Wilderness, where a hunting mass was mumbled through when the laird went after the red deer, are not the only interesting remains of the past of the Borders. The history of the Catrail has still to be written, of that singular ditch which runs from north to south across the Border counties, and is the march of some forgotten kingdom, the defence of some race that has not even left a name or a legend.

With all this store of nature and of relic and legend to work upon, Mr. Armstrong, the author of the History of Liddesdale, might have made a very attractive book. He has made a very splendid and sumptuous book. Though the landscapes engraved in his work are poorly designed, the little woodcuts of carven slabs that now cover pigstyes, of seals, and the like, and the coloured coats of arms, and the reproduction of early maps, are all capitally executed. Most interesting, too, are some coloured copies of very old water-colour drawings representing certain castles on the Borders. Mr. Armstrong has found in the Cottonian MSS. in the British Museum a Military Report of the West March and Liddesdale, with reference to the possibility of their occupation by an English army. The paper was drawn up about 1563-66 by an English official. The illustrations are brilliantly coloured, and give most exact evidence as to the state of the great Border strengths three hundred years ago. We have, for example, Cardines standing in a green court on comically drawn rocks. Chains dropped from beams thrust out above the gates serve to draw up at need the bridge over the moat. The strong square outer walls are only pierced by arrow-slits.

Within the walls a round battlemented tower dominates white houses with high-pitched red roofs and crow steps. The red roofs are still as scarlet as ever on all the white houses of the fisher-folk on the Berwickshire coast. Behind is indicated "the watter Flete" with very conventional waves. The castle is said to be "xxvne foote thicke of the wall." Quainter still is the sketch of "Kirkcowbright," with the wide expanses of green fields and sand, through which the river, crowded with high-decked black ships, goes wandering. There is a lonely church in the fields, another in the little walled town, with its one long street of white red-roofed houses, and with its cross in the centre of the market-place. In those days, as we learn from the English official, "Kenmure was pertenyng to the larde of Lowghinwar"—namely, to young Lochinvar who came out of the west. Unluckily, there is no drawing of the very ancient castle of Kenmure, perched on its high green mound above Loch Ken. Carlaverock, however, is carefully drawn; it has four main walls, with towers at the corners, but no central tower. The town of Annan is as queer a landscape study as any of the rest, and represents a most singular dome-shaped building, like the "treasure-house of Atreus," between the river and the town. As to Annan, the English official seems to have received treacherous information from "Alexander Armestronge, Fargous Grahame, and others of my intelligence that the same towere may be wyn from them, getting there murder holes, which thei have beilded lowe."

In all material matters—paper, type, engraving—it is difficult to praise Mr. Armstrong's History of Liddesdale too highly. But it is not, we fear, an attractive or entertaining volume. Perhaps we ought not to complain that, in an age of picturesque historians, Mr. Armstrong has chosen a style and method of extreme demureness. His researches in manuscripts, whether kept in public offices or in private hands, are most creditable. His appendices and notes are exhaustive, and have all the appearance of minute exactness. But while Mr. Armstrong has collected and arranged materials for a history of Liddesdale, he has not done what most people now expect from an historian. He has not made the old aspects of Border life revive again, he is nothing less than pictorial. He treats all topics somewhat stiffly, each matter under its own heading. He follows so minutely the events on the Borders in the time when the Armstrongs were raiding, that one becomes almost lost in the minuteness of detail. A better idea, a more vivid idea of the air and vigour of old times in Liddesdale, may be got in a flash, as it were, and with delight, from Sir Walter's notes to poems and novels, than can be gathered with toil from Mr. Armstrong's history. We are not by any means blaming Mr. Armstrong for this steady laborious method. His beautiful book is not meant to compete with novels and popular histories. Only three hundred and eighty copies are printed. They will find their way into public libraries and into the houses of the great Border families, the modern representatives of Scotts, Elliots, Johnstons, Jardines, and the rest. Mr. Armstrong's book will always be a book to consult, an authority, a guide to documents, but a diverting or engaging book it cannot honestly be called.

Mr. Armstrong says nothing about the prehistoric Border, about Picts and Scots and Romans. His work begins with an account of the divisions of the Marches, the duties and powers, military and judicial, of wardens and lieutenants, the arrangements for truce days. Nobody ever gave a clearer account of the Borders (in spite of his doggrel) than Satchell in his History of the Name of Scott. Satchell saw very distinctly that the brigandage of the Border clans was really inevitable. You must have warlike men where the hostile kingdoms "marched," and it was not in nature but that these heroes should keep their hands in, even during time of truce, by raids, blood feuds, and private wars.

> Near to a border frontier in time of war,
> There's ne'er a man but he's a freebooter,
> Where fainting fazard dare not shew their face.
> And calls their offspring thieves to their disgrace.

Satchell keeps repeating (the poet of the Scotts could do no less) that a freebooter was not a thief.

> The freebooter ventures both life and limb,
> Good wife, and bairn, and every other thing;
> He must do so, or else must starve and die,
> For all his lively hood comes of the enemie.

These ideas made the rude morality of the Borderers on either side of the March. Though they lived so long before Mr. George and Mr. Hyndman, they had anticipated the theories of those sages. "They have a persuasion that all property is common by law of nature, and is therefore liable to be appropriated by them in their neces-ities." The "to-names," or nicknames, of the Borderers are themselves proof of their reckless, warlike spirit. We find such names as "Out with the Sword," "Ower the Moss," "Crak Speare," "Shake Bukler," "John with the Jak" (after the wearing of Jacks was prohibited), and so forth. They were good men at arms, as Froissart testifies, and courteous to their prisoners, whom they ransomed speedily. To all of them, Scotch and English, as to the New Zealanders, war was a game, and they played it without rancour or ill temper. From the "account of the Scots slain at Pinkie," it appears that they were poorly armed, and that the gentlemen went no braver clad than the common moss-troopers. "Their armour among them so little differing, and their apparail so base and beggarly, wherein the Lurdain was in a manner all one wyth the Lorde, and the Lounde wyth the Larde; all clad alyke in jackes coovered wyth whyte leather, dooblettes of the same or of fustian, and most commonly al white hosen. Not one with either cheine, brooch, ryng, or garment of silke that I coolde see, onless cheynes of latters drawn four or five times along the thighs of their hosen, and dooblet sleeves for outlyng, and of the sorte I saw many. This vilness of sport was the cans that so many of their great men and gentlemen were kyld, and so few saved." The Borderers, light horsemen, thought that

> Who fights in a cuirass.

These wild fellows, who were hunting or playing foot-ball when they were not fighting, and who planned revenges even at their foot-ball matches, had to be "managed" rather than governed. The greater part of Mr. Armstrong's book is occupied with an account of how they were managed. As there was not always war between England and Scotland, while war was always being made by every man for his own hand, truce-days were appointed; cases were tried by a kind of jury; price for stolen cattle was estimated, demanded, perhaps paid; challenges to single combat were shouted or "bawled"; arrangements were made for ending vendettas by joint pilgrimages to shrines, and by common prayers for heroes fallen on either side. As times drew near the date of James VI., the wild clans, as the Armstrongs, grew more and more out of hand. Finally, and reluctantly, but firmly, James V. had to hang John Armstrong; and thereafter times were comparatively peaceful. The story of Kilnockie's end is worth quoting once again. It is the most graphic passage in Mr. Armstrong's sober pages; and, in his pages, it is a quotation:—

> Efter this hunting the king hanged Johne Armstrange, laird of Kilnokie, quhilk monie Scottis man bewailie lamented, for he was ane doubtit man, and als guid ane chiftane as evir was upoun the borderis aither of Scotland or England. And albeit he was ane lous leivand man, and mustrand the number of xxiiij weill-horsed able gentlmen with him, yitt he nevir molested any Scottis man. But it is said, from the Scottis border to Newcastle of Ingland, thair was not ane of quhatsoevir estate bot payed to this John Armstrange ane tribut to be frie of his cumber, he was so doubtit in Ingland. So when he entred in befoir the king he cam verrie reverentlie, with his forsaid number verrie richlie apparelled, trusting that in respect he had cum to the kingis grace willinglie and voluntarlie, not being tain nor apprehendit be the king, he sould obtaine the mair favour. Bot when the king saw him and his men so gorgeous in thair apparrell, and so many braw men under ane tirrantis, commandement throwardlie he turned about his face, and bad tak that tirrant out of his sight, saying, "Quhat wantis yon knave that a king sould have?" But when Johne Armstrange perceaved that the king kindled in ane furie againes him, and had no hope of his lyff, notwithstanding of many great and fair offerris, quhilk he offerred to the king, that is, that he should sustene himself with fourtie gentlmen, ever readie to awaitt upoun his majestie's service, and nevir to tak a pennie of Scotland, nor Scottis man. Secondlie, that thair was not ane subject in Ingland, duik, earle, lord, or barroun, bot within ane certane day he sould bring ony of thame to his majestie, aither quick or dead. He takine no hope of the kingis favour towardis him, said verrie proudlie, "I am bot ane fooll to seik grace at ane graceles face. But had I knawin, sir, that yee would have takin my lyff this day, I sould have leyed upoun the borderis in disphyte of King Harie and yow baith, for I knaw King Harie wold doun weigh my best hors with gold to knaw that I wer condemned to die this dey." So he was led to the scaffold, and he and all his men hanged.

This was the beginning of the end of the system by which the Border clans were allowed, if not encouraged, to behave much like Klephts on the Turco-Greekish frontier, but more honourably, for the Armstrongs would not have held a rich Scot (if such a being had existed) to ransom. At least they would greatly have preferred an Englishman.

SPORT IN THE SOUDAN.*

THE excuse for the appearance of yet another book of African travel is the novelty of the district explored. Mr. James and his six companions, after two seasons in the more familiar regions of the Upper Nile, determined to seek their sport and adventure in a comparatively unknown tract, where, so far as they could ascertain, scarce a traveller had penetrated. The region thus selected was the Basé country, which lies between Massawa and Cassala, on the northern frontier of Abyssinia. Strictly speaking, this forms part of the territory included in the vague term Soudan: but it is not the part traversed by the luckless army of Hicks Pasha. Hicks, indeed, started from the same point—Sawakin or Souakim—but thence he struck nearly west to Berber, while Mr. James and his party journeyed south to Cassala, and then worked their way eastwards to the Red Sea again at Massawa. The route was, however, even longer than that to Berber; and the narrative of the journey over the three hundred miles of desert to Cassala forms an instructive supplement to Mr. O'Donovan's letters to the Daily News. The country is barren and desolate; there was scarcely any grass on the way to Cassala, and what there was at that season was burnt up and as brittle as spun glass. The greater part of the country was covered with sparse mimosa bushes, mostly leafless during the dry season, and yielding no shade. Here and there the monotony of the view was varied by rocky hills, and the commonest feature consisted in Khors, or torrent-beds, dry at that season, but where water could generally be obtained by digging a few feet below the surface. These Khors were lined with a fringe of bush-jungle and belts of dôm palms, which gave capital cover for large game, but added seriously to the risks of the sport, as it was impossible to tell where your quarry was till he rushed upon you. The record is full of hairbreadth escapes from wounded buffaloes, who take refuge in the thickest of the jungle, and then charge upon their tracker, who has barely time to get his rifle to his shoulder before the maddened beast is at the muzzle. Travelling through this jungle and long grass is tedious work, especially when you have to cut a path for the baggage camels. Even in the more open country a daily march of eight hours, or twenty miles, was as much as could be easily managed; but of course the hunters rode ahead on their hegeens, or riding camels, and horses, and thus got time for sport before the baggage came up to the camping place. Here is a specimen march:—

> We crossed several Khors, the country being as desolate as it is possible to imagine. The mountains we had left, and saw no more till we came in sight of the great mountain at the foot of which lies Cassala, and found ourselves in a wide and stony plain, with a few stunted mimosa bushes growing here and there. The heat, too, was very great, and we saw no game. The next two days' journeys, however, were even more trying. We had thought the country could not become uglier or more monotonous to traverse; we soon found that it could—a perfectly level stretch of country to our right terminating in the horizon to our left, and in front of us a range of hillocks at a distance of some ten or twelve miles. We occasionally crossed a Khor, bordered by a few bushes and sickly-looking dôm palms; the heat being intense, with a total absence of shade. For miles we passed over country without a bush, and covered with a perpetual mirage; then we would come to a spot on which grew a few dwarf mimosa bushes. In parts the desert was covered with loose stones; as we neared Cassala, however, this gave place to a fine, loamy soil, which no doubt with rain would be very fertile. Once we passed through what had been, after the rains, a durrah field. Of animal life we came across a few guinea-fowl, and saw a fine buck ariel, the first of the species we had seen since passing the herd near Sawakin.

Cassala, the largest town in the Soudan after Khartoum, with a population of 15,000 and a garrison, is situated in a very different kind of scenery, rich in trees which give it a park-like aspect, and possessing a wonderfully fertile soil, well watered, but shamefully neglected by the lazy inhabitants, who have no idea of the hard work of the Egyptian fellah, and who are so superstitious and foolish that they would not employ a flour-mill built by a European at Cassala, though it ground their durrah (the staple corn of the Soudan) at one-eighth the usual price, because they believed that it was worked by a demon. To judge from the sketches, the scenery along the wild, rocky bed of the Settite must be singularly picturesque; but the travellers seem to have found a good deal of it wearisome in its sameness:—

> A more monotonous journey than the one we made on the following day I never performed. The country became less and less mountainous, with occasional patches covered with kittar bushes—all, of course, leafless—and great grass plains. For miles we travelled through a thick forest of leafless trees, covered with thorns, and which we thought would never terminate; the trees were only twelve to eighteen feet high, and grew so thickly that we could only see a very short distance in front of us. It was more irksome than the most tedious desert, for there there is usually something, some hill or speck on the horizon, to look forward to arriving at; but here there was no object to fix one's eyes upon and to watch the distance gradually lessening. It was, moreover, impossible to say how long we should be in getting through this forest; there was the merest apology for a path, which we frequently lost for some time, and the hatchets were in constant requisition to fell branches in order to allow the camels to pass.

The travellers had, however, worse things to contend with than monotony of scene. They lost a tried servant at the beginning of their campaign by the scourge of African travel—dysentery; and they had to keep a sharp watch upon the tribes through whose land they passed, and who bore no very satisfactory character for honesty or friendliness. They proved, however, better than they had been painted, and Mr. James had no serious trouble with them as a rule; once, indeed, the party was attacked by Abyssinians, with the loss of a horse and some valuable rifles; but, with this exception, they went in no fear of their lives from man, whatever they may have risked from beasts. As far as game was concerned, they had certainly lighted upon a fine country, and one that had, so far, never been shot over:—

> A country may fairly lay claim to be considered to be a gamey one where elephants, rhinoceros, buffalo, giraffes, and ostriches, are all seen on the same day, and where, in addition, are found seven or eight varieties of antelopes, wild boar, or rather wart-hog, to say nothing of lions and panthers, which, though scarce at that particular part at the time of our visit, were nevertheless to be occasionally found. As for birds, there were swarms of guinea-fowl, partridges, pigeons and doves, and many birds of brilliant plumage, if any one cared to collect them.

On the Settite they had some excellent fishing, the fish being small but good eating. Buffalo and antelope, especially tétél, formed the staple game, but lion was, of course, the highest ambition of each of the party, and many long night-watches were devoted to this exciting quest. Sometimes the lions almost brushed against them in the dark without giving a chance; at others, they could be seen shaking the long jungle, where a shot would be wasted. Some measure of success attended these hunts, and the excitement by itself was worth some trouble. The hunters made small zaribas in which to sit, with a native holding a spare rifle at each side and a decoy sheep in front. Here each man waited patiently all night, hearing lions roaring around him, sometimes seeing five or six in the distance out of range, and now and then getting a shot at one at close quarters, and feeling the joy of bowling him over, only to see him crawl off into the jungle, where he might or might not be found next morning.

> It is difficult for any one who has not had personal experience of this kind of sport to realize adequately how exciting it is. Even buffalo hunting at night is sufficiently attractive, but the excitement is tenfold when the roar of the king of beasts is heard, growing louder as he approaches the hiding-place of the watchers. Then the rifle is grasped with firmer grip, as with beating heart and finger on trigger the sportsman watches the trembling sheep tugging and straining at its rope, in vain endeavour to escape from the shadowy form and gleaming eyes which, though hidden as yet from the eager gaze of the hunter by intervening bushes, are only too plainly visible to the intended victim. An instant of intense suspense, and then with a deep growl the lion bunches himself upon his prey. Now is the supreme moment! a quick shot, followed by a cloud of dust often rendering a second impossible, and for a moment it is difficult to determine how the game is going. Is he dead or mortally wounded? in full retreat, or blindly charging his assailant, separated from him by only a few feet?

We should say the sport was exciting in an even more intense degree to the hapless sheep.

The book is essentially a record of a sporting tour. There is little else that is interesting in it. Of the people—the Wild Tribes of the Soudan—who give the volume its title, we learn uncommonly little, except that they rest themselves (like the goose) on one leg, and are not fastidious as to food or raiment. We read of criminals being arraigned before a sacred tree, of which they must tear off the bark if innocent, and offerings are placed on the tombs of the dead; but this is all the folk-lore we have found in the book. There is a curious account of an Abyssinian monastery of twelve monks at the top of a mountain called Tchad Amba, to which the party ascended by an exceedingly unpleasant path, consisting for part of the way of a sharp ridge, on which they had to straddle with one leg hanging over the right hand precipice and the other over the left. They were the first visitors the old monks had ever received, and some of these had not been down the mountain for forty years. This is about the only interesting episode outside sport in the volume, which contains too much of the common incidents of travel, guides, theft, native lies, medicine, tent-pegs, experimental cooking, and the like. Nevertheless the book will be turned over with pleasure by the large class of readers who like to hear of adventures and the hunting of big game: and it is written in a quiet, unpretentious, businesslike way, that will recommend it to those who know the temptations to exaggeration to which a sportsman is exposed in relating the exploits of his own bow and spear. The illustrations, both woodcuts and etchings, add greatly to the value and attraction of the volume, and there is a useful map of the Basé country drawn from the observations of one of the party with the sextant and prismatic compass.

LIFE AND TIMES OF JOHN SKINNER.*

IN monographs like this very much depends on the manner of writing, for the interest at best is local or provincial. Mr. Skinner was, no doubt, a remarkable man, and he went through many remarkable experiences: but, as his biographer is compelled indirectly to admit, even his panegyrists must pronounce him one of the brilliant failures. At the same time, we may say that it was marvellous that he did so much, for the circumstances of his life and times were sorely against him. He filled a paltry cure in one of the bleakest and most storm-beaten districts of Northern Scotland; he lived in thoroughly apostolical poverty, and had in great measure to depend on the liberality of his kindly parishioners; and he lived remote from those centres of intellectual life which stimulate the energies of listless talent by offering rewards in one shape or another. It was much to the credit of the Rev. Mr. Skinner that he exerted his powers so industriously. He was more than a respectable Oriental scholar, as scholarship went in those days; he figured somewhat conspicuously in warm theological controversy; he contributed materials for articles in the Encyclopædia Britannica; and when he followed the natural bent of his genius, he could cover pages with Latin and Scottish verse. But seldom enjoying the advantages of cultivated society, not having the fear of the critics before his eyes, and being untempted by offers, even from the masters of the Grub Street hacks, his work seems to have been perfunctory, not to say slovenly. The writer of his memoirs, who heartily admires him, almost invariably bestows praise reservedly and apologetically: and no doubt he is right in crediting Mr. Skinner with reserves of power on which he scarcely drew. We may take his judgment to be concisely summed up in the definition of the divine as the popular "author of 'Tullochgorum.'" The learned scholar, the keen controversialist, the martyr for the sake of his persecuted sect, lives in the memories of his countrymen as the writer of a jovial song. Though it is but fair to add that Burns declared "Tullochgorum" to be the best Scotch song that Scotland ever saw; and writers of far wider popularity than Mr. Skinner might be content with a more questionable passport to immortality. We said that in a book like this much must depend on the manner of writing, and we may congratulate the biographer on having done his work well. It is true that his style has a savour of the North; there is a certain precision and formality about it: but he has made nearly all that was to be made of scanty materials, and he has thrown himself sympathetically yet impartially into the character of his subject. We may think that he rates Mr. Skinner rather high; but he is careful to give us all available means for coming to independent conclusions.

Great part of the little volume is occupied with matter which can be of no possible interest to the general reader. Few Southerns, or even Scotchmen, care to hear of the controversies that distracted the suffering remnant of the Episcopalian Church of Scotland in the latter half of the last century. But the pictures of contemporary life in a remote Scottish parish are both picturesque and curious; while as mere matter of history it is worth while being reminded of what the clergymen of the Episcopalian communion had to undergo. Every schoolboy, as Macaulay would have said, knows all about the Covenanters, how their conventicles were scattered by troops of dragoons; how their legs were crushed in the boots and their fingers in the thumbkins; how their women were tied to stakes in the rising tide, and their ministers sent from the Council Chamber through the Tolbooth to "glorify God in the Grass Market." But comparatively few educated people are aware of all that the nonjuring Episcopalian clergy had to suffer after the happy Revolution of 1688 had sent the persecuting Holofernes of the House of Stewart to the right-about. Mr. Skinner lived to enjoy the blessings of a tolerant dispensation, which indeed was due in some measure to his personal efforts. But in his time he had seen his chapel burned down, and had been sent, like St. Peter and St. Paul, to testify for the truth in a prison.

Even at this present day it may be held to be an inconsistency and a scandal that the clergymen of the Scottish Episcopalian Church should be left to semi-starvation by the wealthy members of their flocks. That communion in most of the Scotch counties includes the large majority of the landed proprietors, yet the man who ministers to those gentlemen in spiritual matters has every opportunity of mortifying the flesh in his struggles to keep body and soul together. Things were infinitely worse about the middle of last century, although then there was more excuse for it. Many of the lairds were poor enough; most of them held Jacobite opinions, and not a few had been stricken with confiscation and fines for their concern with the rising of '45. When young Skinner, who had been bred a Presbyterian, changed the form of his religion, it was assuredly not for the sake of the loaves and fishes. He had been a parochial schoolmaster with good hope of a Presbyterian kirk; as a convert to Episcopacy and a candidate for orders, there was little before him but lifelong privation. Obtaining a cure of souls was a practical certainty, because the pay was so small and the responsibilities so perilous that charges positively went a-begging. After accepting a tutorship in the Shetlands, he married the penniless daughter of a clergyman there, and coming back to his native county of Aberdeen, was appointed to the "benefice" of Longside, in Buchan, where he vegetated for the rest of his long life. There is rather a good story told about his speedy "preferment." A clergyman, consulted by the Bishop of the diocese as to an eligible man for the parish, mentioned Skinner. He highly commended the youth's talents and learning, but added that he seemed to be deficient in prudence, since he had married a portionless bride without having either income or home. Then, said the Bishop, "he is the very man for the place. He has had experience of poverty, he has learned to endure hardness, and with his abilities and experience he will be able to adapt himself to circumstances, whatever they may be." Skinner had every opportunity for continuing that discipline of resignation and self-denial. Having made up his mind to live from hand to mouth, and to minister to the altar literally for bread and cheese, he needed no ready money to start with. As Mr. Walker remarks, at that time "the Episcopalian clergyman, as a rule, had no home to furnish." When he did not live in lodgings he became the tenant of a humble cottage, divided into the couple of compartments which the Scotch call a "but and a ben." Very many years afterwards, and when at the height of his reputation, Skinner's well-selected little library of the fathers, &c., was stowed away in an antechamber of less than five feet square. Mr. Walker can only hint at his early privations, for he took them so much as matters of course that he has left no record of them. But if his life was retired and unobtrusive, it was by no means uneventful. He had settled into his parish about the time of the last Jacobite troubles; and after the battle of Culloden the country was under martial law. There were enactments in force, moreover, which made Episcopal assemblies penal, and if Sunday services were conducted by nonjurors, it was simply because the authorities winked at them. When any person of local influence chose to set the law in motion, the authorities had no option but to act. A lady in his parish was Mr. Skinner's personal enemy, and in consequence he saw his little chapel burned down. Coming home late one evening from parochial duty, he found his home in possession of a party of soldiers, who "pillaged the house of everything they could carry with them, hardly leaving a change of linen to father, mother, or child in the family." Regular places of worship were legally proscribed, and we have a curious account of various ways in which the prohibition was evaded. After his very primitive meeting-place had been burned down, Mr. Skinner used to assemble his little congregation in the open yard at the back of his cottage, praying and preaching from one of his windows. Elsewhere the clergyman with his own family and the regulation number of hearers assembled in one small room, while "the other apartments within earshot were occupied by other members of the congregation." Subsequently to being burned out and pillaged, Mr. Skinner, as we have said, had to suffer in person as well as in property. He was charged with non-conformity by some anonymous informer, probably the fair Presbyterian zealot who had set fire to his chapel, and the authorities, though apparently with considerable reluctance, had no alternative but to commit him to prison; and accordingly he was confined for some time in the gaol of old Aberdeen. Thither his character for benevolence and good-fellowship had preceded him, and the sympathy of even the Presbyterian citizens took comforting and practical shapes. They kept his table supplied, and gave him their company as well. It is satisfactory to know that, after all his early troubles and anxieties, the worthy clergyman lived to a good old age, and could look back on that time of persecution as on an evil dream of his manhood. He died peacefully under the roof of his favourite son, who, on Mr. Skinner's declining the office, had become the Bishop of the diocese, having survived his affectionate wife but a year or two.

To those who know the song of "Tullochgorum" we need scarcely say that the author was a "clergyman of the old school." He took his part in all kinds of social gatherings; he is said to have needed and been grateful for a word of friendly counsel, when he seemed to be in the way of carrying the practice of conviviality to excess; he was in the habit of keeping open house for his parishioners on certain Church festivals with the provisions which they had poured into the parsonage themselves; and it was significant that he would have neither blind nor curtain to the study window, because the midnight oil he was burning over his labours might serve as a beacon to some belated parishioner. So, as he said himself, his literary work was sure to be useful in one way if not in another. "He was the life and soul," writes Mr. Walker, "of every party at which he was present. And in the earlier days of his ministry he was probably present at rather many." Among the most interesting of the literary contents of the volume is the account of his intercourse with Burns. Burns met his son, the Bishop, by accident in Aberdeen, and insisted upon dragging him into a tavern to take a social glass with himself and a printer. Other times, other manners! Burns had expressed profound admiration for the genial author of "Tullochgorum" and "The Ewe wi' the Crookit Horn"; when Bishop Skinner told him that he must have passed in course of his Northern tour within four miles of the reverend author's parsonage. "Well," said he (Burns) at parting, and shaking me by the hand as if he had been really my brother, "I am happy in having seen you and thereby conveying my long-harboured sentiments of regard for your worthy sire; assure him of it in the heartiest manner, and that never did a devotee of the Virgin Mary go to Loretto with more fervour than I would have approached his dwelling and worshipped at his shrine." The Bishop wrote an account of the interview to his father at length, well knowing how the old man would be gratified by the praises of the poet.

"LOOKING back over the past year," says a well-known Italian critic, reviewing the literature of his country in the pages of one of the best of Italian literary journals, La Domenica Letteraria, "we can only call to mind a long and monotonous index of mediocre productions without any boldness of originality, without any new motives or any new forms. It is to us as though we came forth out of a carefully-sown, well-cultivated, and richly-wooded plain, but no recollection remains to us of those even fields, those fine trees, those square houses with their grey-tinted walls and their green shutters." The prospect would be far from encouraging if the writer did not go on to say that "perhaps this silence holds the obscure, unknown, and subterranean fermentation of the seeds of winter," and he confirms this hypothesis by affirming that criticism at least, and the prose of newspaper writing has grown stronger, more temperate, more serious, more honest; while the greater part of the Italian public show an improvement in taste and culture and a better intuition of the truth, inducing him to hope that perhaps a literary spring is about to burst upon his land in all freshness and beauty. Of the novelists of his time, however, Signor Lodi thinks, alas, but poorly. "The romance writers of to-day," he says, "strive for the most part too much to be naturalists; in truth, instead of being historians, they are but too often mere reporters. They have cast themselves upon the fields and amid the mountains of the South; they have filled their pages with carmine and with cobalt; they have even, in trying to give the precise note, reproduced the language of the peasant, so that not only the characters, but the authors, use the style and the words of Sicily or of Calabria."

We recognize in this description the best, and, according to this worthy critic, the worst also, of the books beneath our hand. The names of Giovanni Verga, Luigi Capuana, Camillo Boito will at once suggest themselves. One and all they have "cast themselves upon the fields and amid the mountains of the South"; not all with the same success as regards power of realization, but all with the same anxious search after simple truths and simple sentiments; all seeking emancipation from the "Manzonian mannerism," even though, according to the same authority, "they are precipitating themselves into the naturalistic mannerism—that scholastic prejudice which we have, unfortunately, imported from France, where it is, be it said, already played out." That much has been imported from France into the literature, and especially into the fiction, of Italy we must agree with the critic of the Domenica Letteraria. To glance down the new list of the publications of Fratelli Treves of Milan, and to note that two-thirds of them consist of translations from the French, chiefly from the works of Zola, Gaborian, and Daudet, is not of course, strictly speaking, to say that French influence has been imported into Italian fiction; but beyond this there is no lack of indications that assert beyond any question the influence in Italian fiction of the principles and prejudices of the contemporary French school. Something of course must be allowed, although the Italians would probably not be flattered by the concession, to the kindred tastes and kindred temperaments of the educated classes in both nations. In spite of many and important differences of a more serious kind, both the Italians and the French have the Southern love of harmless publicity, and the consequently natural dislike to the secretiveness of suburban English home life. Enjoying climates similar enough to foster the love of outdoor amusements, they naturally have a preference for the same pastimes, and with a code of social laws both of them differing in somewhat the same particulars from ours, they are likely to be the most lenient or the most severe towards the same range of offences. When Anton Barrili—the most fashionable of Italian novelists, and the most competent, according to the showing of one of his critics, to tell us of the customs of the great world—introduces the hero of his last novel upon the pavement of the chief street of the town, loitering there with apparently no better object than to pass the time, we feel that his critics are right in awarding to him the palm for vivid and realistic description of the manners of his world; and we remember that in these pleasant cities of the South, provincial to the core, even where they bear the names of capitals, to loiter at street corners, to wander aimlessly up and down a fashionable thoroughfare watching fashionable ladies driving past in fashionable equipages, to sip coffee or cool drinks in open places, smoking long cheap cigars and discussing the last bit of scandal and the past and future fortunes of friends and relatives, make up that recognized business and the accepted pleasure of the male portion of the followers of fashion. Signor Signorini, the hero of Fior di Mughetto, does not, however, properly speaking, belong to the upper classes. He is a perfectly colourless, uninteresting, uncultured, and commonplace "city" youth, and we cannot but feel he richly deserves the title of "idiot" bestowed upon him in the course of the story by the insolent husband of the lady to whom he has been persuaded to pay a mild and ridiculous court. So foolish is he that, because he is short-sighted, he does not even perceive the interest his pink and white face has excited in the childish breast of a young lady who drives past his special street corner every day with her mother, finding nothing better to do in her dulness than to weave a fairy tale around his most uninspiring personality. We admit, of course, that Signor Barrili intended to write a satire upon the nonentities who adorn the market-places of the provincial towns of his native land, and upon the empty-pated maidens who have nothing else to think of but a possible love affair; but in spite of many redeeming qualities in the work, we cannot think that such a subject deserved his attention for the space of 223 pages; nor can we agree with an Italian critic who finds in the heroine's affection for this unknown youth "all the freshness of an idyll." The book, it must be said, is written with all the purity and elegance of style peculiar to the versatile Genoese author, and the description of the wedding journey of Clelia Donati and the Baron is touched off with a light and happy hand; but it remains nevertheless an unedifying picture of Italian society—all the more unedifying by reason of its realism. Signor Barrili has also during the past year followed up his course of so-called sacred romances by an account of the loves of Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, in a book called L'Anello di Salomone; but it may be doubted whether even this most ambitious performance can save him from the reproach of a falling off since L'Olmo e l'Edera, and the Capitan Dodero.

Barrili is perhaps, of the more prominent among present Italian novelists, the one who best illustrates our theory that the similarity between French and Italian writers is not all due to imitation, but in some measure also to the natural affinity of taste and genius. He describes the cosmopolitan classes in all nations, but he describes them with something of a national flavour. His men, if they are blunter of wit and coarser of intellect than the Parisian hero, are a thought more chivalrous, a thought more tender-hearted, a thought less cynical; his women, if they are less vivacious, have the softer manners, the subtler grace, the warmer heart of the Italians. But in the much-admired work of Matilde Serao—in spite of a certain originality which makes itself felt as the story advances—we find a close adherence to the French realistic school, modified, however, by occasional reference to older and more classical models, and especially to the author of Consuelo; a fact which has, according to an Italian journal, earned for the authoress in Paris the rather exaggerated nickname of "La petite Sand italienne." Matilde Serao is evidently the petted writer of the day in her own land; and one critic declares that when once the true nature of the artist has broken the bonds of self-imposed æsthetic laws, her work swells into a "duet of love" worthy of antiquity. That something of the method of the famous French writer, and something too, in a very modern form, which recalls the pathetic story of Manon Lescaut, finds an echo in the work called Fantasia (3), is indubitable; but, despite the power and artistic taste that she possesses, we cannot agree with her compatriots that Matilde Serao has been quite able to rival the more classical achievements of French art. Her love-duet is not exactly cast in the idyllic mould that can take it out of the region of vulgar love-making and raise it into a poem overflowing with the most ennobling influences. It has but little of the pure and beautiful spirit of unparalleled devotion with which Manon Lescaut thrills our hearts; it throbs with no chivalry, no sacrifice; it is mere earthly love-making, and we cannot feel that it has ever reached higher. And yet the heroine—one of the type of feverishly-nervous, hysterical characters who seem to be the product of our present civilization—high-flown, ecstatic, sentimental, unhealthy, but with some sort of fascination which we feel justly entitles her to the love and homage of all who approach her, is always on the hunt for spiritual rapture. When we are first introduced to Lucia Altimare as a schoolgirl in the convent, she thinks she will find her ideal in ecstatic worship of the Blessed Virgin, and faints with excitement on the cold flags of the chapel before her image. She vows she will have nothing to do with earthly love, that she is born to be lonely and sad; vows it to her bosom friend, a quiet, simple, gentle girl, Caterina Spaccapietra, who is devoted to her strange comrade with all the strength of a fond and straightforward nature —so devoted that, one day, she saves her friend's life, little guessing to what end. Lucia, in her history exercise on the theme of the unfortunate Beatrice di Tenda, has given vent to such a rhapsody on wedded love that she meets with a stern reproof from the Professor, who is in love with her, as well as from the Lady Superior, from whom she has hitherto had only favouritism. Wounded in her morbid pride, she attempts suicide, and is only rescued from throwing herself off the convent terrace by the good little Caterina, with whom, in an impressive scene in the convent chapel at dead of night, she consequently exchanges half her lapis-lazuli rosary, in token that they two shall be true to their sacred friendship, each willing to sacrifice her happiness to the other, and even, if need be, to die for her. So the school life breaks up. Lucia at home loses herself in religious fervours and in studies conducted under the tuition of the poor Professor, whom she at last drives into a madhouse. Caterina marries a handsome, herculean, athletic cousin, to whom she has long been engaged, and who at first takes a violent dislike to her sickly, "æsthetic" friend; but one evening, on being maliciously left alone with her by his wife, who is anxious to coax the two beings she loves best into some kind of sympathy, he falls a prey to the subtle fascination, and, by a foolish word and kiss, incurs the wrath of his goddess at the same time that he sinks degraded in his own estimation. From this moment the love-duet begins. Lucia considers it a philanthropical duty to marry a despicably selfish, consumptive cousin, whose last years she wishes to brighten; but her elaborate display of pitying affection towards this wretched creature is rather repulsive than the reverse. Even in the last horribly realistic death-bed scene, when the mask has fallen, and the two who have been betrayed sit side by side looking at their fate, and one after the other turning over the leaves of the diary in which Lucia has written her ecstatic love-thoughts to her friend's husband—even in the vicinity of death, the wild and selfish ravings of a poor nature must fill us with disgust; and it is to the silent and patient grief of the outraged young wife that we give all the pathos, guessing what the lapis-lazuli rosary is to mean for her. The character of Lucia is a clever psychological study, but it is little Caterina who claims our tear as she orders her apartment in Naples, like the methodical little housewife that she is, and goes quietly off to the deserted country villa where they all four spent such pleasant summer days, and there lays herself down in the closed room with the smouldering charcoal to keep her part, according to her simple notion, of the bargain of the lapis-lazuli rosary. But Matilde Serao has a fine literary sense, and considerable poetical faculty; in spite of the glowing criticisms of the Italian papers on the work of Signor de Zerbi, her talent seems to us to be far more distinguished than that of the author of L'Avvelenatrice, another novel of the same order. The inevitable consumptive figure of Italian fiction, in the person of a fair, young heiress, is more pleasing, if less realistic, than hers; but Signor de Zerbi's intrigue is mere mechanism; it neither fascinates nor excites us; his characters have little beauty, his style is uninspired, the metaphysical and scientific discussions which he introduces by the way are out of place and wearisome, his psychological studies have but little of the pulsation of life. The cold temperament of Isenarda differs of course in type from the feverish impetuosity of Lucia, but the coldness is the coldness of a character too lifeless to be imposing, and her crime does not affect us, for we scarcely know whether it was committed, if committed at all, in a calculating spirit almost too horrible to be possible, or in jealousy of an innocent young girl so unwarrantable as to be equally repellent.

We cannot help it; in spite of the Italian reviewers, we are glad to return to the authors who "cast themselves upon the fields and amid the mountains of the South"; we can even welcome the Sicilian and Calabrian dialects, the carmine and cobalt with which the pages are filled, if they will but tell us of Italy and the Italians, if they will but sound their own national note. And in the instance of Signor Verga we are inclined to think that his critic, in reviewing the works of the last twelve months, was only taking account of the Novelle Rusticane published early in the year, and not of the Per le Vie which only appeared towards its close. In regard to the former collection of short rustic stories, the criticism is perhaps well founded. There is the same freshness of style and vivacity of thought as in the rare and powerful tales contained in the volume called Vita de' Campi, which first made Verga known for his pastoral studies, though he had already achieved a considerable degree of success—merited or unmerited—in his own country by such unpleasant and crude romances as Eva, Tigre Reale, &c.; but, though the hand that paints the pictures is the same, the composition of them is not so powerful. They are landscape sketches, with the figures only introduced to heighten the effect; they are not human studies, vibrating with human life. "Gli Orfani" and "Pane Nero" are the best in the volume of Novelle Rusticane, but they are nothing beside "La Lupa" or even beside "Jeli il Pastore" in the Vita de' Campi of 1880.

The author of "Jeli," and of the splendidly terrible Calabrian contadina with the poppies in her hand and the black eyes that burn like coals of fire, has not, however, lost his witchcraft. If in the Novelle Rusticane the glorious sun of Catania has but illumined the landscape, in the more recent Sicilian sketch of Nedda the beauty and pathos of that wild, fair land enters into the picture of the folk who people it, into the face and eyes and heart of the poor little luckless peasant heroine, with her lover dying of cruel labour, fatigue, and famine in the fever-stricken fields where pestilence marches hand in hand with the most daring splendours of nature, and human souls tramp daily to their death in the daily toil, resignedly, even ofttimes perfectly happy, in their quiet ignorance. In Per le Vie again, where Signor Verga does for the lower order of town life what he has so often done for the country, there are several instances of the deepest understanding of simple pathos. Let any one read "Il Canarino del No. 15," and judge for himself. The style is very simple, and, in spite of a word here and there adopted from the Milanese dialect, easily comprehensible to a foreign ear; the story is very short. Signor Verga gives us another patriotic tale of luckless love in this volume, "Semplice Storia"; another powerful, though unpleasant, study of low life in the sketch called "Gelosia," and another heart-rending story of betrayed womanhood in "Via Crucis," but none of them have all the beauty, to our minds, of "Il Canarino del No. 15." The simple human interest of those stories reminds us of the Vie de Bohème of Henry Murger, though Henry Murger never to our recollection attempted such unpleasant realism as in "Amore senza Benda" or in "Gelosia." The power of these two compositions scarcely atones for their ugliness, and we regret the ugliness all the more because the author knows so well what beauty is. We find this same fault in some of the stories which Signor Luigi Capuana gives us in his new volume entitled Homo. The picture of the bad wife in "Mostruosità," who betrays her husband so long as he adores her, and becomes his silent and loving slave after once he has beaten her, and trodden upon the last of her lovers; the horribly living description in "Povero Dottore"; the brutally powerful sketch, in "La Mula," of the countryman's rich but meek and wretched wife, to whom even the mule is preferred, and who might die of the fever, and welcome, when once she has willed her money aright, if only the beast be saved from the disease that is upon it—these will serve enough to show how careless of repose, or even of beauty, as we chiefly understand it, are these searchers after realism. Signor Capuana fascinates us more when we read his charming volume of fairy tales called C'era una Volta, in the course of which he admirably recalls without imitating all the pleasant "once upon a time" legends of our childhood. In his country stories Signor Capuana shows himself to be evidently one of those authors who lay themselves open to the censure of the critic of the Domenica Letteraria for using provincial colloquialisms inadmissible in pure style. His "Lo Sciancato" is, in its title first and afterwards in its relation, an example of the justice of the reproof. We have not this fault to find with the style of the last on our list of short story-tellers, Signor Camillo Boito. Perhaps he equally lays himself open to the charge of morbid realism, but it is in somewhat a gentler form; and in the matter of language, we cannot find the same tendency as in Capuana, and often in Verga. Perhaps Signor Boito—who, by the way, is the brother of Arrigo Boito, the great composer—being an art critic has been obliged to form his style to suit the stricter requirements of journalism. In his short stories, gathered together under the title of Senso, there is, as we have already intimated, much that is charming and a good deal that is original. In Italy we are told that this volume has far more success than its predecessor, published in the first days when the cause of realism had planted its standard in the land of Manzoni and of Salvatore Farina. The reason is evident. The taste for naturalistic effects had not yet ripened among a people used to academical heaviness of diction. But now it is a different matter. The taste for crude naturalism has run rampant, and perhaps Signor Boito is not even equal to the occasion with his fanciful subjects and his comparatively gentle style. He paints his landscapes straight from the "fields and mountains," it is true, but his people are ghosts of the older spirit of romanticism, only freshly coloured from nature by a bold and skilful hand. His "Vade retro, Satana," is a realistic study which perhaps has chiefly won for the book its success; for in the sad, fanciful sketch of the remorse of a man who has betrayed the honour of a young girl, the sole comfort and idolized divinity of an old grandfather, in the morbid dreaminess of such a mere idea as "Il Demonio Muto," whatever fascination there is does not seem to us to be of a kind to attract a general public; while the somewhat sickly cynicism of "Meno di un giorno," and of most of the remaining tales, would, we hope, only find an echo in sickly minds. The work of such men as Carducci and De Amicis—the former of whom is regarded as the growing light of the modern school—has much, however, to answer for, although its influence does not properly extend into the realm of fiction. We can scarcely think that such works as the long and coldly cynical essay on friendship lately published by Signor de Amicis can tend healthfully to influence any public or any school of young writers. The works that we have cited are, however, with their good and their bad points, those by which the Italy of to-day claims her place in literary fame. There are plenty of other novels, however, published and read by plenty of other folk—novels that we cannot quite pass over without a mention in a review of the recent fiction of Italy. There are the somewhat lengthy and uninspired romances of Antonio Caccianiga, an author who enjoys some fame in his own country, and was specially successful with a novel published in 1875 called Il Bacio della Contessa Savina. His latest work, entitled Il Convento, is the remonstrance of a Tory on the effort to suppress outworn religious fanaticism by modern Radical notions. The motive turns upon the suppression of the monasteries, and gives scope for a priggish young hero to save the ancient convent of his native village from destruction and to invent a new system of religious retreat, in accordance with the new laws of his country. Unfortunately, the mild social intrigues introduced on the way, by which the wickedness of other women is intended to act as a foil to the supreme goodness of the heroine, are not ingenious enough to relieve the tedium of the book. Another romance, written by one of the order of "False Manzonians," seems to us to be the Dal Primo Piano alla Soffitta of Enrico Castelnuovo. Although this author has long enjoyed enough popularity for his next work, Il Professor Romualdo, to be held forth, together with the third series of Giosuè Carducci's, so to speak, metaphysical and critical studies — Confessioni e Battaglie — as the reward to be given gratis to old subscribers to the journal, we are forced to confess that the style of this writer pleases us but scantly. Dal Primo Piano alla Soffitta is a Venetian story, and begins with a fairly picturesque description of a regatta on the Grand Canal in 1838. As its title suggests, it follows the fortunes of an ancient and noble family who, in the first chapter, look haughtily forth from the first-floor windows of their ancestral palace to applaud the family gondola as steered in the race by the scion of the house, and who in the last finish miserably, in the person of that very scion himself, beneath the attics of the same house, whose first-floor glories are let to a rich, insolent foreigner. That the sad fate of this arrogant but hopelessly commonplace family arises, not only from national disaster and unlucky speculations, but quite as much from the inherent profligacy of the male members of it, is of course the gist of the matter. The story is in Venice, with all her beauties, natural, architectural, historical; it tells of Italian people and Italian manners, and tells of them beneath the golden sunsets, the blue sky, and the blue air, and on the blue lagunes of Venice, and yet there is nothing Italian about it, nothing warm, nothing thrilling, nothing individual. In vain we look for individuality and national colour, and in vain again in the easily successful sentimentalities of the author of Casa Altrui. The story of the child of the people adopted by the lady of noble birth, and after many vicissitudes finally allowed to mate with the daughter of the house, has nothing new in the manner of the telling, and is neither better nor worse than hundreds of other stories of its kind; nor do the other tales in this volume aspire to any higher place in literature. Less pretentious, and certainly not less worthy of pretensions, is the somewhat involved and sentimental, but prettily written, little volume by Federiga Guerini, the daughter of the professor who for many years taught his language in London. The book has no great literary merit, but the style is pure, simple, and easy of understanding for beginners. L'Assassinio nel Vicolo della Luna, already casually mentioned, begins well as an imitation of Gaboriau, but falls off sadly towards the end.

READY-MADE ARCHITECTURAL DESIGN.*

ACROSS the Atlantic many business transactions are systematized in a manner unknown to us in England, and among them is house-building. The method employed there is, according to popular report, a simple one. The client enters the office of an architect, and turns over the leaves of a book containing lithographs of houses suited to various means and requirements. Having made his selection, he "guesses he will have one (or more) of the half-million dollar ones," and this preliminary being satisfactorily settled, awaits the execution of his order. Should some trifling error be apparent in the result, such as that his principal rooms face north instead of south, he has only to give a second order, and his house is promptly moved to the other side of the road.

In England up to the present moment we have left undeveloped the art of making buildings walk about until they have reached an appropriate position. Consequently, the person who wishes to build has a more complicated problem to deal with. He has to consider for himself, or to get his architect to consider for him, the conditions of aspect, site, levels, and views which affect his scheme. He will probably settle the position of his building before his plans are made, and in his comparative helplessness will have to abide by his decision. Inability to change the sites of our houses is not the only respect in which we are somewhat old-fashioned. In an essay of Lord Macaulay's which "every schoolboy" really does or did know almost by heart, it is asserted that we expect some degree of reticence and self-respect even in our tradesmen as regards their methods of advertisement. "We expect some reserve, some decent pride, in our hatter and our boot-maker." This, no doubt, was written many years ago, and much progress has been made meanwhile. Still, as regards the educated professions, we have not yet touched the high-water mark of modern progress. Architects (if we may for the moment except from the category one self-assertive amateur) are, on the whole, still haunted by some degree of mauvaise honte, and are so simple as to be content to be judged by their practice, leaving untried at least the more direct methods of advertisement which are open to them.

Though an Englishman, the author of the work under consideration is haunted by no such antiquated restrictions. Not only does he give us the opportunity of studying a great variety of his designs—mostly, alas! unexecuted—but is further very candid in expressing his opinion on their merits. All evince "skilful and ingenious planning, the result of many years' experience"; one is "a well-digested and clever plan"; another is "well worthy of careful study"; a third is "pleasing and picturesque"; while such terms as "well-matured," "leaving little to be desired in the way of good arrangement," are so liberally interlarded that the reader need be put to no trouble of exercising his own critical faculties. That he possesses the power of forming a just estimate on architectural questions is sufficiently indicated by the following passage. Speaking of a restoration which he has in hand, he informs us that "in the course of a few years the whole will appear as if it had been an entirely original conception." A very ordinary result of restorations in our experience is to produce "original" effects such as would startle the first designer could he be resuscitated.

A scheme such as the author's naturally requires great largeness of view. To trade successfully in ready-made designs one must be prepared at all points. Any prejudice in favour of a style may be fatal to our prospects. Moreover, orders must be anticipated from all sorts and conditions of men. Accordingly, we find in this work every style included, from the early Gothic, for the purity and accuracy of which the competent self-critic would be prepared to answer, to the ordinary square modern villa, which requires no endorsement from antiquity. On the other hand, all applicants, from the lowly vicar to the proud duke, will find their very diverse requirements thoughtfully anticipated. The accuracy with which the sumptuousness of the edifice varies with the titular rank of the prospective occupant is much to be commended. Let no one who cannot produce his patent of nobility aspire to one of those mansions in which "my Lord's office" and "her Ladyship's boudoir" are appropriately pourtrayed; nor let the humbler earl pretend to an edifice which is intrinsically "ducal." Even the horses must be content to be accommodated according to the rank of their owner. For the opulent commoner, however, there is still a chance. He may become the happy possessor of a "Mansion House" (No. XLIX.), and therein enjoy a reflection of civic dignity.

Nor does Mr. Birch limit his stock-in-trade to designs for houses and stables. He gives us further a suggestion for an ideal estate. Starting from a landscape which is free from all such embarrassing conditions as undulations or woods, and is endowed only with an accommodating river taking its course at no sweet will of its own, but strictly according to the exigencies of landscape gardening, he has succeeded in realizing an ensemble of enviable completeness. Every prospect pleases or should please the occupant of the ducal mansion. All is brand-new, created solely for the pleasure of his eye and for his honour and glory—church, schools, the cottages arranged symmetrically at his gates, "with a pump ('a pump is chaste practice,' said Mr. Peckniff) and sun-dial of old-fashioned design in the centre, making altogether a pleasing, varied, and picturesque effect. Here the tenants and villagers might turn out en masse and welcome their lord or any distinguished guest in a suitable fashion as they drive through the triumphal arch" and an avenue "of tall poplar-trees, in almost every case giving dignity and sometimes an amount of grandeur." A charming picture of Arcadian feudalism!

In such a scheme the imagination has free scope, and compasses even the human and social elements of interest. So it is, too, with the interior perspectives, one of which has caused us no small degree of respectful amazement. In a drawing-room of Jacobean character a number of ladies in Vandyck costume are playing with some dogs. In the centre of the group a page of infantile proportions, but with a well-developed beard, is seen feebly gesticulating. His costume is that of the reign of Elizabeth. Similarly attired is a man of gigantic proportions, who stands near a window. His mien is expressive of a morose severity. The ladies appear to be unconscious of his presence. Now here is a mystery of no ordinary complication, apparently involving visitants from the unseen world. The Psychical Society may unravel it; we cannot; nor does the author offer any clue.

As for the merits of the designs, we will not venture to differ from the one competent critic whose opinion has been so freely and candidly expressed. They may, indeed, be taken to indicate the standard which the new method of architectural practice may be expected to inaugurate. On one point only do we feel inclined to differ from him. The date 1565 does not at first sight appear to us to assign a building to "the latter end of the fifteenth century."

CAXTON'S GAME AND PLAYE OF THE CHESSE.*

THIS is, on antiquarian and historical grounds, an interesting book, and was quite worth reprinting; and Mr. Axon has prefixed to it an introductory essay which, though far from faultless, is on the whole interesting and instructive. But we must begin by taking exception to the title-page. The proper title of the work is, as given by Mr. Blades in his Life of Caxton (p. 173 of the second edition), The Game and Play of the Chess Moralized. The additional word conveys the whole force of the book. From Mr. Axon's title-page one would conclude that it was a treatise on chess; whereas the connexion of it with chess is of the most superficial nature, it being really a treatise on morality, freely interspersed with anecdotes. Previous editors have, it is true, not unfrequently left out the important word on which we have laid stress, so that Mr. Axon does not stand alone; but the omission

* The Architecture of the Stables and Country Mansions. By John Birch, Architect. London and Edinburgh: Blackwood & Sons. 1883.

* Caxton's Game and Playe of the Chesse, 1474. A Verbatim Reprint of the First Edition. With an Introduction by William E. A. Axon, M.R.S.L. London: Elliot Stock. 1883.

is not the less misleading. Again, it is a very minor point, but, since Mr. Axon adopts Mr. Blades's conclusion that the book was published, not in 1474, but at the earliest in 1475, why does he insert the word 1474 in the title-page? To prevent misconception, we must observe that Caxton's original work has no title-page, so that on technical grounds Mr. Axon was free to choose his own title to the book he was editing; but we submit that a title ought to be as correct as it can reasonably be made.

The chief interest of the work before us lies in the fact that it is one of the very earliest works with which the name of Caxton can be connected. Caxton's connexion with it is double, as translator (from the French) and as printer; and it used to be styled "the first book ever printed in England." But Mr. Blades has made it probable that it was really not printed in England at all, but that it came from the press of the Bruges printer, Colard Mansion, and that Caxton merely assisted in the printing. The only point that, as we think, might be urged against this view of Mr. Blades is, that from an expression in the Recuyell it would appear as if Caxton possessed a printing-press and types a year or two before the printing of the Game of Chess Moralised. Caxton himself says of the Recuyell, "I have learned to ordain this book in printe at my great charge and expense." It would be a natural interpretation of this "great charge and expense" to suppose that it referred to the setting up of a printing-press. If so, then it would be hardly possible to avoid the conclusion that Caxton was the sole printer of the Game of Chess Moralised: for the Game of Chess was printed with the same types as the Recuyell, and almost certainly at a later date than that work. However, the words "great charge and expense" may perhaps fairly be explained as referring to the expense incurred for receiving instruction in printing, for at that early date the art must have been almost a secret to the few initiated into it, and it would not be imparted except at a considerable price. The difficulties in the way of the old view, that Caxton was the sole printer of the Game of Chess Moralised, are two; first, if Caxton was the sole printer of the Recuyell and of the Game of Chess, he was in that case the printer of three French works in which the same type is used, and Caxton is never known to have printed in French. Yet this difficulty might be got over by the consideration that Caxton was at this time resident in Bruges, and therefore much more likely to print French works than at a later period of his life, when he was resident in England. The other difficulty is more serious. The terms used by Caxton in the preface to his second edition of the Game of Chess certainly sound as if he was then printing it, himself, for the first time; and the terms in which he speaks of the first edition, "I did do set in imprint a certain number of them" (i.e. copies of the work) imply, according to the usual meaning of that phrase, not "I printed," but "I caused to be printed," in which case another person would seem to have been the printer.

However, after all, we cannot look upon the matter as quite certain. The exact connexion of Caxton with Colard Mansion is too far lost in the depths of past time to be made out with certain accuracy now. It is probable, indeed, on all grounds that Colard Mansion was the instructor, Caxton the instructed, in the new art. Nor have we any quarrel with Mr. Axon for accepting Mr. Blades's views in their entirety. But in accepting them he was bound to take one of two courses. He might very well have abstained from argument, have stated Mr. Blades's conclusions simply, and for their proof have referred his readers to Mr. Blades's work. Or he might have given the arguments which lead to those conclusions with substantial fulness. But what he has done is to give just half of Mr. Blades's arguments, and then to say that the opposite opinion is "clearly erroneous." Now this is a careless and inaccurate mode of procedure; and throughout Mr. Axon's introductory essay we are impressed with a sense of want of exactness. Our space does not allow us to go through the essay seriatim; we can only comment on a few incidental points. Mr. Axon quotes the passage to which we have referred from the preface to the second edition; it runs as follows:—

> There was an excellent doctor of divinity in the realm of France, of the order of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, which intended the same and hath made a book of the chess moralized, which at such time as I was resident in Bruges in the county of Flanders came into my hands; which, when I had read and overseen, me seemed full necessary for to be had in English. And in eschewing of idleness, and to the end that some which have not seen it nor understand French nor Latin, I deliberated in myself to translate it into my maternal tongue. And when I so had achieved the said translation, I did do set in imprint a certain number of them, which anon were dispersed and sold. Wherefore because this said book is full of wholesome wisdom and requisite unto every estate and degree, I have purposed to imprint it.

Upon this passage Mr. Axon comments thus:—

> It is clear from this that both the translation and printing belong to the period of Caxton's residence in Bruges.

It is, we submit, by no means clear. All that the passage says is that the Book of Chess first came into Caxton's hands when he was residing at Bruges. As far as this passage goes, it would be a perfectly tenable supposition that Caxton took the book with him to England, and translated and got it printed there. Nay, as far as Mr. Axon's argument is concerned, Caxton may himself have printed the book in England; for Mr. Axon gives up the argument founded on the words "did do." Or why should not the book have been printed in Cologne? for we have no record of Caxton's movements during these years, and the precise year in which he left Bruges is very uncertain. As a matter of fact, the statement made by Mr. Axon in the sentence above-quoted is most likely correct; as an inference, in the way in which he draws it, it is wholly insecure. Again, when Mr. Axon tells us that "there are various indications that confirm Mr. Blades's theory that the book came from the press of Colard Mansion," we feel impelled to ask whether Mr. Axon means that he has discovered new indications of this conclusion, or whether he is merely referring to Mr. Blades's own arguments? The words ought to imply the former; but in that case it would have been better if he had told us what these new indications are. Nor is Mr. Axon's grammar always immaculate; as, for instance, in the following sentences:—"Caxton, we have seen, translated the 'Game of the Chesse' from the French. There were in effect two, if not three, from which he may have taken his version" (p. xix.) Two or three what? If the reader studies the succeeding paragraph attentively, he will discover that Mr. Axon means "two or three French versions." But the words themselves imply nothing of the kind; nor does anything that has gone before. The Glossary, let us add, at the end of the book, is by no means faultless. It certainly was not necessary for a glossary to inform us that "tutours" meant "tutors," or that "mortifyed" meant "mortified," or that "lecherye" meant "lechery," or that "musyque" meant "music"; while, on the other hand, such words as "sourdre" (p. 57), "amolishith" (p. 62), "sortisith" (p. 169), receive no explanation; and we have noted others.

Caxton's book itself is the translation of a translation, or rather (in its different parts) of several translations. The original work was composed in Latin by Jacques de Cessoles, a Dominican monk, who lived (Mr. Axon tells us) towards the end of the thirteenth or beginning of the fourteenth century. The work of Cessoles was translated into French by two contemporaneous writers, Jean de Ferron and Jehan de Vignay; these both lived about the middle of the fourteenth century. Caxton knew and used both these versions. What, then, is the character of the original work, which Caxton esteemed so highly? It is not, as we have already said, a treatise on chess, in spite of its title and form; indeed, it may be doubted whether the author had any more than a very superficial acquaintance with the game. Though the moves of some of the pieces, especially the queen and the bishop, were very different at the end of the thirteenth century from what they are now, we find it hard to believe that the king ever had so portentous a power of motion as that ascribed to him in p. 165, where it is said that he can move from his own square to his queen's knight's second square; and we have observed other moves equally strange. However, it would be out of place to insist on this too much, for the real subject of the book is morality and order in a state. But it must not be supposed that it contains anything very powerful either in sentiment or in thought. There is in it undoubtedly the feeling of duty, and much of the chivalrous sentiment; but it is impossible to believe that it ever stirred any man deeply. Mr. Axon says that the book belonged in its own day to the "literature of power." We should rather say to the "literature of pleasure." It is a storehouse of anecdote, and on the whole of good anecdote; for, though many of the stories told have become familiar to us now, this is not the fault of De Cessoles. Some, again, as may be expected, are coarse. But others are very curious, and none more so than that which gives an account of the origin of chess; it is traced back to the reign of Evilmerodach, son of Nebuchadnezzar (who had previously been described as "a jolly man without justice, and so cruel that he did do hew his father's body in three hundred pieces and gave it to eat and devour to these hundred birds that men call vultures"). We will quote the passage in the original spelling:—

> Thys playe fonde a phylosopher of Thoryent whiche was named in Caldee Exerses or in greke philemetor. . . . The causes wherfore this playe was founden ben thre/ the first was for to correcte and repreue the kynge. For whan this kynge Evilmerodach sawe this playe And the barons knyghtes and gentillmen of his court playe wyth the philosopher/ he merueylled gretly of the beaulte and nouelte of the playe/ And desired to playe agaynst ye philosopher/ The philosopher answerd and sayd to hym that hit myght not be doon. But yf he first lerned the playe/ The kynge said hit was reson and that he wold put him to the payne to lerne hit. Than the philosophre began to teche hym and to shewe hym the maner of the table of the chesse bords and the chesse meyne/ And also the maners and condicions of a kynge of the nobles and of the comun peple and of theyr offices and how they shold be touchid and drawn. And how he shold amende hymself & become vertuous. . . . The seconde cause wherfore this playe was founden and mand/ was for to kepe hym from ydlenesse/. . . . The thirde cause is that euery man naturelly desireth to knowe and to here nouelltes and tydynges.—Pp. 11, 13, 14, 15.

The naïveté of the words "and how he shold amende hymself and become vertuous" is incomparable.

Here is a quaint little passage about Cæsar (who is always mentioned with great respect):—

> And also we rede of Julius Cesar that he neuer saide in alle his lyue to his knyghtes goo oon but all way he sayde come come/ For I loue allway to be in youre companye/ And he knewe well that hit was lasse payne & trauayll to the knyghtes whan the prynce is in her companye that touch hem & coforted hem.—P. 71.

Something more must be said about Caxton's share in the work. Caxton's style is, as will be seen, racy; and he is not so slavish a translator but that he will now and then throw in a passage expressive of his own mind, and specially adapted to England. Such is his lament over the good old times, in pp. 161, 162; be it observed that Caxton, whose life had lain in the calamitous era of the Wars of the Roses, had a reason for looking regretfully on the past which many other people who use similar words have not. Still more curious is his complaint (on p. 95) of the over-abundance of lawyers. But we must stop; only further observing that Caxton's illustrations to the work are quaint and forcible. The picture of the rook—the sage counsellor of the king, with lines of thought marked on his face—especially pleases us. Despite the criticisms we have made, we can thank Mr. Axon for having introduced this work in a popular form to the notice of the public.

RECENT MUSIC.

If any doubt still exists as to the English public's love, or at least partiality, for music of a light and not unwholesome kind, it would be sufficient to convince the unbeliever with a present of the sheet music published during any month of the year by any of our larger music publishers. It is true that not much perhaps of a very high order might be found among the publications, but at any rate very few positively bad, and a fair sprinkling of decidedly good, songs and ballads would be the result of the search. The demand for drawing-room music seems to be unlimited, and the supply, we must say, endeavours to keep pace with the demand. Originality or high artistic excellence, we fear, is not much in request, even if it is not resented as impertinent, among those who support this class of music, and this makes the task of saying something new doubly difficult to the composer who is dependent on their suffrages. The consequence is that it is safest to steer a middle course, and to produce that which has already stood the test with success. At the same time the excellence or mediocrity —which shall we call it?—is of so level a nature that it makes it difficult for a critic to distinguish the work unless it happen to be strangely bad or remarkably good. Nevertheless there is some comfort in the reflection that, as we said before, the positively bad is the exception. After some experience we have, however, come to the conclusion that as a rule the writers of the words to which this kind of music is adapted are perhaps more responsible for the scant amount of originality displayed than even the musical composers themselves. We deeply sympathize with those who have to find pleasing melodies for the undisguised rubbish that serves as poetry for drawing-room songs. The better the words the better the music is a fact that any rate asserts itself emphatically in the works which Messrs. Metzler & Co. have sent us; for the "Six Songs" by Blanche Gore, five of which are written to words by acknowledged poets, are by far the best of the whole collection we have to pass in review. Among the "Six Songs," "Aubade," "Elaine's Song," "Sigh no more, Ladies," "Und bist du Fern," "Shall I like a Hermit dwell," and "The Better Land," though all give evidence of high artistic skill, the palm, we think, should be given to "Und bist du Fern," a song full of deep feeling, and almost Schumannesque in treatment. The next best of the series to our mind are "Elaine's Song" and that to Sir Walter Raleigh's words, "Shall I like a Hermit dwell"; but each of the others is far above the average. "My Heart's Beloved," by Hugh Clendon, to words by Mary Mark Lemon, is a pleasing and effective song; and Mr. G. A. Osborne's "May Joy come to greet thee" is bright and melodious; while the three songs by Arthur Hervey—named respectively "To Thee," "A Message to My Love," and "Only a Dream"—the first of which, we see, is dedicated to the Ranee of Sarawak, are the production of a musician who, working with the best intentions, is hampered with words which can hardly be called poetry. "There let us dream," by Andrew Levey, is sparkling enough; but the verses defy the ordinary understanding. In the refrain the singer is made to exclaim:—

> Wandering hand in hand
> Far into love's own land,
> Safe from the stream,
> There let us dream.

What stream they are safe from, and why they should wander hand in hand in order to dream, the writer does not think it necessary to inform us. It is doubtless pretty jingle, this sort of thing, and, probably in the opinion of the verse-maker, will do for music. The composer, with some humour, makes the pair wander "in waltz time," which is certainly a happy thought. Of a very different kind is Maria E. H. Stested's setting of Arthur Clough's words, "O Stream descending to the Sea"—another piece of evidence in favour of our theory that good words inspire good music. We have before noticed this composer's artistic talent, and we may say that this song shows her to be a practical musician who values her art and will not descend to mere platitude for the sake of pleasing. "Reflection," a trio for soprano, contralto, and tenor, by Henry Guy, which will fully repay the trouble of study, for it has its difficulties, although they do not arise from want of musical knowledge, closes the list of vocal music from Messrs. Metzler & Co. Of instrumental sheet music from the same publishers we have the "Rigaudon" from Joachim Raff's Suite in B flat arranged for violin and pianoforte by Johann Lauterbach, whose name alone carries a sufficient recommendation to all violin amateurs. The ninth number of The American Organ Journal, edited by J. Munro Coward, contains an arrangement of "The church scene in Faust"—a piece well suited for this increasingly popular instrument, for which also Louis Engel has adapted Schubert's "Ave Maria" with much skill and intelligence. Walter A. Slaughter's "Stephanotis," a dance, is a sprightly and effective little piece for young people, and No. 13 of "Little Treasures," a selection of popular melodies arranged by Michael Watson, is a filtered version of Gounod's charming song "Au Printemps," through the medium of Emile Waldteufel, who set it as a waltz, and under whose name it oddly enough now appears as a piece for beginners. "The Dance at a Forge," a descriptive piece by E. H. Sugg, and "L'Immensité," a waltz by Louis Gregh, are also sent to us by these publishers.

From Messrs. Keith, Prowse, & Co. we have received three songs by John Collett—"Lily's Shadow," "Forget Thee," and "Farewell, if ever fondest prayer"—the last of which is perhaps the most to our liking, although the others show the composer to be a musician who is capable of producing melodious and graceful ballads. "True for Aye," by James J. Monk, is an effective song with harmonium accompaniment, published by Messrs. J. B. Cramer & Co.; but the writer of the words seems to become somewhat "mixed," as the Americans say, when he asks, "Do old memories haunt thee ever, Doth some sad remain?" but perhaps the song will not suffer for this slip. "Shadows," by Edith Cooke, and published by W. Reeves, appears to be already a popular song, judging by the fact that the title-page announces that it is sung by four vocalists; and "A Nice Little Girl," by Arthur Saville Long, from the same publisher, which is described as a "lady's humorous song," is perhaps appropriate for leap-year, but seems a little too long, and the humour is not of the highest order. The first part of a collection of songs, published by H. Vickers under the title "Songs with Words," by James Castle, seems a somewhat eccentric and disjointed production; but as we understand that a second part is in preparation, we hope that it will meet with the success which the composer evidently anticipates. We are pleased to see that the excellent and rational little violin instruction-book, published by Messrs. Kohler & Son, of Edinburgh, under the name of "The Young Violinist's Tutor and Duet-Book," has met with so much success as to make the issue of a second edition necessary.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

Almost every political act is susceptible of two interpretations; and the attitude of the authorities in Berlin towards "Comte Vasili's" spiteful comments on Berlin society (1), if it is not evidence of great weakness, is evidence of profound and Machiavellian calculation. For there is little in the book that is not in reality complimentary to Germany. On every page, in every personality, there appear beneath the surface, but not far beneath, two feelings only—Hatred and Fear. Now it is generally admitted by plain-speaking (some call them cynical) moralists that to be hated and to be feared are not degrading or, on the whole, unpleasant experiences when they are combined. It is very unpleasant to be despised or to be simply neglected; it is not nice to be hated without being feared. But here the fear is even more prominent than the hatred, and Germans of any but the thinnest skin can only take "Comte Vasili's" book as a compliment to the success with which, after centuries of comparative effacement, Germany has asserted herself in Europe. Per contra, this characteristic is a defect in the book itself. But it is for all that a clever book, and written by a person well informed, if not quite so well informed as he or she would like to seem. The author, moreover, it should be said in justice to him, confines his accusations of immorality exclusively to the higher society of Berlin, and does ample, and even elaborate, justice to the sound-heartedness and wholesome morals of the middle class both there and throughout Germany. It must also be granted that the satire on the German Parliament is, except, perhaps, in reference to Herr Windthorst and the Centre, fully justified. The general political ideas, moreover, are far from unintelligent, and the small but frantic sect of Austrophobes in England may note how "Comte Vasili," with evident unwillingness, admits that the one alliance which could almost certainly prevent a great European war is the alliance of England and Austria. That of course all real political students know, but unfortunately power is in England by no means always in the hands of real political students. As for the points in the book which have made most noise, it must be a very guileless reader who takes "Comte Vasili's" Juvenalesque picture of Berlin society without a considerable allowance of salt. But there is no doubt some, and not a little, truth in it.

The papers which M. Philippe Daryl has reprinted from the Temps (2) contain yet another picture of a European nation as others see it. To a great extent M. Daryl deserves the high praise of being absolutely the most faithful reporter—more faithful even than Esquiros or M. Taine, and far more so than Louis Blanc—who has ever held up a French mirror to England. His papers on the present state of English literature and journalism contain none but the most insignificant blunders, and his general attitude is not only free alike from Anglomania and Anglophobia, but also from that subtler and unnamed disease which makes all men, and Frenchmen more than any other men, insist on looking through glasses which they have not taken the trouble to make achromatic. In the political and social part (it should be understood that, except in reference to the Queen—for there M. Daryl becomes somewhat more personal than severe good taste would allow—the book is strictly confined to public affairs) the accuracy of fact is also very commendable, though occasionally it fails. But in this division prejudice, in no bad sense, is a little more apparent. The remarks on the "choquante inégalité des citoyens devant la loi," with which

(1) La société de Berlin. Par le comte Paul Vasili. Paris: Nouvelle Revue.

(2) La vie publique en Angleterre. Par Philippe Daryl. Paris: Hetzel.

M. Daryl terminates his book, are among these exceptions; and, to justify them, he has unfortunately cited a case in which, if he had been more correctly informed, he would have found that the inequality was very much the other way. We do not, however, quarrel with him seriously on this account; for, when la manie égalitaire once fixes its hold, as it has done on most Frenchmen for generations, the sufferer is not responsible. On the whole, M. Daryl has written a most careful, judicious, and remarkable book, a book which ought to go some way towards relieving his countrymen of the charge of adjusting everything to Boulevard standards and troubling themselves no further.

La Syrie d'aujourd'hui (3) is one of those vast and splendidly illustrated books of travel of which Parisian publishers have the monopoly, a monopoly which is still further monopolized, or nearly so, by M. Hachette. The five years which Dr. Lortet spent in Palestine and the adjacent districts do not seem to have been employed in any special researches (except perhaps in botany and zoology); the traveller did not go very far afield, and his account, though agreeably enough written and perfectly readable, has little that is very striking, and consists in great part of compilation. But the feature of the book—a feature made all the more prominent by its great size, which is the largest quarto—is the abundance of engravings, admirably executed, of large size, and giving almost every possible kind of illustration of races, buildings, and scenery.

We have received from M. Rothschild a magnificent album of naval architecture (4), with an accompanying treatise by Admiral Paris; and from MM. Firmin Didot an abundantly-illustrated work on Arab civilization (5). Neither of these can be conveniently or fairly noticed in brief, and we shall hope to return to them shortly.

The story which gives the title to M. Feuillet's (6) latest volume may sustain, but will hardly increase, his reputation. It is brief, but with a brevity which is exposed to the charge of being either too long or too short. Again, it is an attempt in that region of strong passion of which Julia de Trécœur showed the author to have the entry, but in which he has hardly in this instance shown himself equally at home. The plot is very simple. One of two bosom friends, mortally wounded in battle, charges the other to carry to his widow the expression of her husband's curse if she marries again. The friend and the lady have never met, and the youngest novel-reader of course foresees the situation. It is complicated for a time by the widow's engagement to her cousin, but from this she frees herself in a manner which may be frankly pronounced disagreeable. Then the catastrophe is no longer to be retarded. Maurice de Frémeuse succumbs to the enchantment, and the pair are married. But, before the wedding-day closes, the words of his dead friend come back to him, and he shoots himself to avoid at the last moment the treason and the curse. This theme is powerful enough, no doubt; but it is not quite adequately handled. Marianne de la Pave, the heroine, is not fully comprehensible; and Frémeuse's weakness, though perfectly intelligible per se, is not sufficiently explained in the actual case. M. Feuillet has wisely added the pleasant dramatic trifle we noticed a week or two ago to this sombre story, and most readers will turn to it with some relief.

THIRD AND CHEAPER EDITION, 1 vol. 6s.

From the ATHENÆUM.

"'The Brandreths' is a pleasant book to read. It is an unusual treat to the reader to find himself in the company of a man of the world who is also a man of knowledge and culture, and who possesses the power of writing with ease and with point. Mr. Hope's pictures of society and his analyses of character are excellent. The practical sketches and aphorisms are made with a good deal of humour."

From the SPECTATOR.

"'The Brandreths' has all the charm of its predecessor. The great attraction of the novel is the easy, conversational, knowledgeable tone of it; the shortcomings from the point of view of plot do not seem to the reader to be shortcomings, because, in point, and in truth, to tell such a story as great readers can put a name. The political and social sketch is naturally the most salient interest among readers who will be attracted by the author's name, and experience."

From the ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE

"'The Brandreths' is a clever and entertaining book. It contains much clever and picturesque writing. There is considerable skill, also, in the distribution of characters, and the dialogue is natural and easy, pointed and witty. Mr. Beresford Hope draws largely upon his experience of political and social life; and as a society novel the book naturally has a great advantage over ordinary fictions of the class which may be derived from familiarity with the conventional people described."

From the STANDARD.

"There are many sayings in this work many wise, many witty, many clever ones. We are saying one that we should wish to cite to our readers; and doubtless they will have pleasure in finding them out for themselves. It is a well planned and ably written story. The whole is full of clever epigrams."

"Compared with other books having the same aim, these books deserve very favourable mention. For the notes are well selected; they never commit the capital fault of trespassing on the province of the grammar or the dictionary, and so pandering to the pupil's laziness, and they are, moreover, generally well expressed and to the point."—Saturday Review.

ALARIC WATTS: a Narrative of his Life.

By His Son.

Mr. Watts was associated for half a century with all the leading literary and artistic celebrities of his time—Coleridge, Wordsworth, Southey, Rogers, Leslie, Constable, Lilly, Delaroche, Ary Scheffer, Devéria.

"These volumes are full of that sort of writing which has recently made reminiscences deservedly popular. Mr Watts's sketch of Wordsworth is one of the best we have ever read, and all bear comparison favourably with Cyrlyle's graphic etching. The passages in Mr Watts's book which we should like to quote are so numerous that we are fairly at a loss where to select."—St. James's Gazette.

"Upon the pages which we may, some unexpected, allusion, or illustration of character is sure to arrest attention."—Observer.

"A very pleasant book, and portrays a character of a good deal of charm."—Spectator.

ALTIORA PETO.

By LAURENCE OLIPHANT,

Author of "Piccadilly," "Traits and Travesties," &c.

"Brilliant and delightful.....The book is one which everybody will gratefully read and greatly admire. It is the outcome of singular originality and independence . . . It contains enough to equip a score of ordinary novelists for the production of a score of extraordinary novels."—Athenæum.

"May be characterised as a novel of a thousand, if only for the fact that it may be read through consecutively twice, or even thrice, with augmented pleasure to the reader with every fresh perusal.....It is not as a story that 'Altiora Peto' challenges warm admiration, but as a brilliant picture of life and manners."—Spectator.

"The whole book sparkles with brilliant dialogue. It is rich in characters.....It is intricate and ingenious in plot."—London Guardian.

"It is impossible to exaggerate the sense of infinite refreshment inspired by this work of genuine wit, of strong good sense, of sharp insight, and of scholarly style."—Graphic.

"The book is full of humour and drollery."—Saturday Review.

GRANITE CRAGS.

By C. F. GORDON CUMMING.

8vo. illustrated with 8 Engravings, 16s.

"She gracefully does the honours of this strange world of giant waterfalls and trees, depicts with graphic pen and brush the savage grandeur of the granite precipices, with the gleaming teeth of the snowy Sierras as background of the picture, and introduces us to some of the grim humours of the digger's camp and the ranchman's station."—Athenæum.

"As fascinating as any of her former works."—Whitehall Review.

THE PHILOSOPHER'S PENDULUM.

By RUDOLPH LINDAU.

Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"These are excellent specimens of the kind of short story for which Blackwood's Magazine has long been famous."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"A collection of five very clever stories by an undoubtedly clever writer."—Standard.

NORFOLK BROADS and RIVERS.

By C. CHRISTOPHER DAVIES.

Post 8vo. illustrated with 12 Full-page Plates, 14s.

"Mr. Davies gives us a succession of charming pictures of the Broads, all tinged with personal adventure. In fact, he describes them with all the living details that make up the varied 'Life on the Broads.'"—Ibid.

"It is doubtless the handsomest as well as the most interesting of all descriptions of the Broads, and will preserve the memory of a paradise for naturalists and sportsmen."—Land and Water.

SECOND EDITION.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

By ANTHONY TROLLOPE.

2 vols. post 8vo. with Portrait, 21s.

"Mr. Trollope never wrote anything more vivid or more graphic than the Autobiography which has just been issued."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"In the extremely frank autobiography of Anthony Trollope there is more of the sensational than in any of his novels . . . . The whole of the volumes are of extreme interest, and we have had no little difficulty in making selections for comments."—Times.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

THE QUEEN'S Speech was expected without curiosity, and it has been read without satisfaction. Mr. GLADSTONE had, after his own fashion, taken the opportunity of explaining his intentions more fully to three Club deputations than he has since communicated them to the two Houses. He perhaps preferred a declaration in his own name and that of his colleagues to the conventional disclosure of the intentions of the QUEEN. It is true that in the more formal document which he has still to present in accordance with ancient custom, he has made statements as to foreign politics which would not have interested delegates of party organizations. Only old-fashioned politicians belonging to the governing classes of former times still concern themselves for the honour of the country. It was not the business of the Radical deputations to inquire whether the intention of the Government to evacuate the Soudan or the wanton announcement of the decision involved national disgrace and probable sacrifice of life. The House of Commons even in its present condition will not be quite as easily satisfied; but the minority has been warned that it must not directly or indirectly obstruct beneficent domestic legislation. Direct obstruction means debate on the Franchise Bill, and indirect obstruction means debate on any other subject. Mr. GLADSTONE, who never misses an occasion of inflaming party animosities, has of late seldom spoken in public without addressing an implied threat to independent members. With a certain infelicity, he lately complained that new modes of opposition had been devised in recent years. He might, if it had suited his purpose, have explained that the first and best example of the practice was furnished by himself in outdoor agitation and by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and Sir CHARLES DILKE in direct Parliamentary obstruction.

The announcement of a satisfactory termination of the untoward incidents in Madagascar would have been more satisfactory if a similar statement had not been erroneously made at the Mansion House a year and a half ago. The French Government may perhaps have expressed regret for the interruption of English commerce and the wholesale destruction of English property; but Mr. GLADSTONE's estimate of the sacrifices which it is worth while to undergo for the sake of retaining the good will of France differs widely from that of his countrymen. It will appear hereafter whether the Convention concluded with Portugal as to the Congo is acceptable to France. The Ministers are well advised in making no mention of Tonquin, though still larger interests are affected by the hostile relations of France and China. There is no diplomatic ground for interfering in a quarrel which nevertheless concerns England more materially than either of the belligerents or litigants. The customary declaration that the QUEEN is on friendly terms with all foreign Powers is for once approximately true. If any exception were made it would apply to the French Government; but when there is no probability of an open quarrel it is perhaps politic to assume goodwill on both sides. Mr. GLADSTONE perhaps agrees with an able and remarkably candid French writer who has recommended in the pages of the Fortnightly Review a good understanding between the two countries. The principal argument of the editor of the République Française is founded on the supposed designs of Austria on Salonica and the neighbouring territory. It seems that, with the establishment of an Austrian naval station on the coast of the Ægean, the naval supremacy of England and the safety of the Suez Canal would be fatally compromised. It was unluckily impossible to include France in the list of Governments which are negotiating, or which have concluded, commercial treaties with England. The treaty to which the late Spanish Government had agreed is still exposed to hostile agitation which may perhaps be fatal. The treaty with Turkey is at present in a rudimentary or inchoate state; on the treaty with Corea few persons are qualified to form an opinion.

The SECRETARY for the COLONIES has contributed a paragraph on South Africa which ought not to pass without notice. There will be little disposition to reopen the dispute with the Transvaal, which is now approaching a settlement. The re-establishment of an Imperial Protectorate over the Basutos will be generally approved; but the renewal of anarchy and civil war in Zululand ought to receive a well-deserved censure. Of many errors committed by the present Government, the most wanton, though not the most important, was Lord KIMBERLEY's capricious and sentimental restoration of CETEWAYO. Lord DERBY may probably regret the blunder of his predecessor, but it is not known that he has taken any step towards the restoration of order. According to the latest accounts the ex-King had, from his refuge in the Reserve, organized an expedition against USIBEPU, which resulted in a defeat of the Royal troops. Between two barbarous chieftains there is probably not much to choose, but they ought not to be allowed to prosecute their feud. The most important colonial transaction which has occurred during a long period is not perhaps yet sufficiently complete to be mentioned in a Speech from the Throne, yet it is possible that the Australians may be disappointed by the absence of reference to a matter which is to them of paramount importance. The Colonial Legislatures have not discussed, and some of them may perhaps not approve, the draft of a Federal Constitution which was drawn up by the delegates at Sydney, but they are unanimous in the desire that parts of New Guinea and perhaps other islands should be occupied in the name of the Crown before they are claimed by some foreign Power. The Australian version of the MONROE doctrine, which would have excluded all foreign settlers from the region south of the Equator, has probably not been taken into consideration by the Government.

That there would be a simple Franchise Bill extending to all parts of the United Kingdom was long since known. The managers of the Leeds Conference had probably divined the intentions of the Government, or perhaps they had reason to know that their dictation would be accepted by the Cabinet through the pressure of its extreme members. Lord HARTINGTON soon afterwards uttered a faint protest against the Leeds policy: but his scruples were easily overcome. Mr. GLADSTONE, though he probably from the first shared the policy of the Caucus, made several efforts at the Mansion House and elsewhere to maintain a decent reticence; but Mr. CHAMBERLAIN again and again blurted out the secret; and Sir CHARLES DILKE, coming fresh from a Cabinet meeting, confirmed the statement of his sympathetic colleague. The extension of household suffrage to the counties with or without a change in other forms of franchise is intelligible, if neither wise nor patriotic; but the phrases in which it is formally communicated to Parliament would indicate a love of mystification, if they could not be attributed to simple awkwardness. In all England there is but one accomplished scholar who is capable of describing the scheme as "an enlargement of the occupation franchise in Parliamentary constituencies." If all the world had not known what Mr. GLADSTONE was about to do, his intentions could scarcely have been deduced from his language. In more than half the Parliamentary constituencies, consisting of the boroughs, the occupation franchise will not be altered. In the counties it will be reduced from a 12*l.* rating to an occupation of any value by a process which would not ordinarily be described as enlargement. Whether it is proposed to tamper with the property qualification may be conjectured from Mr. GLADSTONE's democratic tendencies, but not from his official language. The argumentative flourish about the experience derived from former extensions of the suffrage is of questionable accuracy, and in any case it is out of place. The QUEEN is not supposed to give reasons in support of the legislation which she recommends to Parliament.

The London Municipal Reform League, which indulged in a meeting on the previous day, may, perhaps, be dissatisfied by the cold language in which their favourite measure is mentioned only as a branch of improved local government; but there is no doubt that a scheme tending so directly to increase the power of the multitude will be actively pressed. Sir W. HARCOURT will, perhaps, through respect for the House of Commons and for his own character as a statesman, discuss a great innovation in a more instructive manner than Lord DALHOUSIE or even Mr. BRYCE. A Liberal peer condescending to share in a Radical agitation ought to make himself acquainted with notorious facts. Among other statements, Lord DALHOUSIE boldly declared that the supply of water to the metropolis is, among other defects, scanty in quantity. The most superficial inquiry would have taught him that the supply is at least double the possible wants of the consumers. The fault of the speakers in favour of the Bill is not so much that their statistics are loose as that they never attempt to answer the arguments of their opponents. Sir W. HARCOURT will have to explain away the grave danger of investing the representatives of a population of four millions with vast powers, including the control of enormous funds. The agitators—who are, with few exceptions, politicians rather than local reformers—have not concealed the purpose, which they will certainly accomplish, of converting the municipality into a great party organization. It is probable that in London, as in Birmingham, the majority of the upper and middle classes will be excluded from municipal office. Little interest attaches to the elegantly-expressed statement that "the preparation under this (the "municipal) head which has been made by HER MAJESTY'S "directions is not limited to London." The contest within the House and the agitation without will for this year be practically limited to London. The terms of the Speech scarcely require further criticism, for the paragraphs which deal with the Egyptian question require separate consideration.

THE EGYPTIAN MASSACRE.

"TO despatch them [Egyptian troops] on any such errand is little short of deliberate murder." That is the verdict of the chief supporter of the Government in the London press on the rout of BAKER PASHA's force; and it is one which every impartial person acquainted with the history of the last few months will very heartily endorse. But if it be so, who is it that is little short of a deliberate murderer? The supporters of the Government here lose their candour. To despatch Egyptian troops to do the work attempted on Monday was little short of deliberate murder; but to make Mr. GLADSTONE's Ministry responsible for their despatch is "a reckless abuse of political invective." It is all very well for Lord GRANVILLE in the recently published despatch of January 4 (a month before BAKER PASHA started on his forlorn hope from Trinkitat) to announce that "HER MAJESTY'S Government insist on the adoption "of the policy they recommend." This apparently implies no responsibility for what followed. It does not matter that the Egyptian Prime Minister was changed under the direct action of England weeks ago. England has nothing to do with the acts of the Egyptian Government. It is irrelevant even that an English Admiral co-operated in BAKER PASHA's advance. Doubtless the sending of BAKER PASHA's troops on their errand was little short of deliberate murder, but to call the Government little short of murderers would be horrible. This is the argument of Government partisans, and this is their comment on the colourless sentences regarding Egypt which had been read by the LORD CHANCELLOR shortly before the news of the disaster arrived. To that disaster Lord GRANVILLE, the only member of the Government who condescended to speak on Tuesday, made no attempt to refer. He will have an opportunity of repairing his omission on Lord SALISBURY'S formal motion of censure next week.

It is not too much to assert that hardly a single Englishman can have read the hideous narrative of the rout at Teb furnished by the Correspondents of the Daily News and the Standard without an instinctive feeling that the conduct of the Government had been inexcusable. The adroit fashion in which debate was burked while the news was fresh, and the growing habit of subordinating independent judgment to party allegiance may have blunted this feeling later, though even this appears very dubious. But there is sufficient evidence in the comments of the press, provincial as well as metropolitan, that the feeling itself, at the moment when feeling is most genuine and for the most part most trustworthy, was unanimous. It would, indeed, have been surprising if it had been otherwise. Suppose that Lord BEACONSFIELD had taken Egypt under his protection, that he had sent troops there, that he had interfered and meddled with the administration of the country to such a point that the whole gear of government was hopelessly thrown out, that he had at last roused himself to more decided action and insisted on the ruler of the country doing this and not doing that. Suppose further that in a maritime district, and within a day's march of English ships which had been ordered or allowed to take part in the operations, there were garrisons to relieve, and that, without protest of the English Government, a native force had been sent to relieve them. Suppose that over and over again the absolute inadequacy of that force, the certainty of its defeat, if not its annihilation, had been pointed out by every competent authority and foreshadowed by a long course of actual disasters. Suppose that ample time had elapsed in which either to do the work or to forbid all attempt to do it; that ample means existed for carrying out either decision; and that, finally, such a catastrophe as that of Monday had occurred. Is any one's imagination so weak and any one's experience so defective that the thunders and lightnings of Radical eloquence cannot be conceived by him? Yet every one of the suppositions just put forth has turned out to be fact in reference to Mr. GLADSTONE's Government. Against warning, against experience, against the plainest dictates of common sense, they allowed BAKER PASHA to attempt an impossible task with troops for whose shortcomings they are responsible before Egypt, England, and the world. They did not insist that Sinkat and Tokkar should be left to their fate—that would have been a comparatively humane, if still a cowardly, variety of cruelty. They did not take the easy means which were open to them of relieving Sinkat and Tokkar. They pushed the principle of limited liability to the utmost extent of pusillanimous folly, and the result is the massacre of Monday. And, in face of this incident, the crime of which exceeds the disaster, it is said that "controversy may well be hushed." Certainly it may, on one side. The most courageous controversialist would be hard put to it to show that the blood of every man killed on Monday is not on the head of those who have placed Egypt in statu pupillari, and then refused to undertake the responsibility of guardianship.

Against all this the defenders of the Ministry have practically nothing to urge. The plea that it is easy to be wise after the event would be feeble in any case, for it is the business of the governors of a vast empire to be wise before the event. But in the present instance it is worse than feeble. For the danger, or rather the certainty, of what has now happened has been pressed on the Government for weeks and months by those who did not wait for the event to be wise. Still feebler and still more unfortunate is the demand for an alternative policy. For there is no need here even of the famous and final rejoinder as to not prescribing before being called in. The head and front of the Government offending is not that Ministers have done the wrong thing, but that they have, save in their heroic step of despatching General GORDON, whose task is now rendered more hopeless than ever, steadfastly refused to do anything at all. As to what ought to be done now, the accumulated blunders of months have made it a less pressing question than what can be done. The general object which any rational Government would have before it remains, however, the same, though it may have been rendered infinitely more difficult of attainment. Sinkat and Tokkar, if their fate is not already decided, are probably doomed. But Souakim has to be held and its neighbourhood cleared; and it seems to be now evident even to the Government that this can only be done by an English or an Anglo-Indian force. The same, in a less degree, is the case with Massowah. If General GORDON reaches Khartoum, the next thing to do is to stretch out a hand to assist him in carrying off the garrison and inhabitants, or in maintaining the position, as the case may be. This may be done from the coast, or it may be done from Assouan, but here also English or Anglo-Indian troops will have to do it, if it is done at all. This was perfectly well known, and was clearly pointed out months ago, and nothing that has occurred has altered the necessity of it, though it has greatly increased the difficulty and danger. Alternative there is none, except the continuance of the recent system of doing nothing until the rebels have speared the last Egyptian whom they may take it into their heads to spear. Some intelligent Ministerialists have indeed hinted that it would be a great relief if the rebels would do this spearing out of hand, and if that is Mr. GLADSTONE's opinion, there is nothing more to be said. That stone-dead hath no fellow is in this case quite true. But if this is the policy of HER MAJESTY'S advisers it might as well be openly avowed. Englishmen, if not English officers, led those hapless sheep to the slaughter. Not in the Soudan, but in Egypt proper, they were driven by force into the trains on the way to Suez. English sailors, though no doubt with orders to remain at a safe distance, co-operated with them at their base, and are now covering their flight. This unpleasant state of things would at least be put an end to by a proclamation that every Egyptian subject beyond such and such degrees of latitude and longitude must fight for his own hand, that he is not bound to take the side of his Government, and that England will absolutely prohibit any attempts on the part of that Government to rescue or to coerce beyond the limits. But, if this is done, what becomes of General GORDON? If it is not done, how can England escape the responsibility of every life lost? These questions, and others like them, will have to be formally asked and answered in the debates on Lord SALISBURY'S and Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE'S motions next week. It is probable that they have been informally answered by the vast majority of Englishmen already. Even if the field of inquiry were confined to Parliament, the vacillation of the Government could be proved sufficiently. The contrast between Mr. GLADSTONE'S first answers as to his intentions of doing nothing, and the subsequent announcement of the strengthening of Admiral HEWETT'S force, and the pitiable confusion of Lord HARTINGTON in his attempts to define General GORDON'S status, are enough.

COMMUNES AND CORPORATIONS.

IT would be unjust to suspect that the Government will yield to one of the latest demands of Mr. PARNELL'S supporters. It appears that the irreconcilable Irish members have determined to oppose the Metropolitan Municipal Bill, unless the privileges which are offered to London are extended to Dublin. Those who disapprove of the experiment which is about to be tried on a gigantic scale will not welcome the aid of their volunteer allies. The enemies of loyalty and good order discredit any cause with which they may find it their interest to associate themselves: and, if they attempt to effect their object by Parliamentary obstruction, all other sections of the House of Commons will be tempted to concur in baffling their efforts. Municipal institutions have not appeared to advantage in Ireland. In the days of Lord GREY and Lord MELBOURNE Irish Municipal Bills were opposed on the ground that the powers of Corporations would be employed for factious purposes. It was in one of the debates on the subject that Lord LYNDHURST was accused by his opponents of having called the Irish "aliens in blood, language, and religion." What he really said, though it might not be altogether prudent, was much less offensive. In substance he argued that a large section of the Irish neither felt nor professed community of interest and purpose with the nation which was asked to confer upon them equal rights.

The Whig Government was nevertheless right in prosecuting its Liberal policy. It would at that time have been premature to assume that Irish Corporations might not be conciliated by the trust which was to be reposed in their competence and good faith. In Dublin, where the Catholic and Protestant communities were almost equal in strength, the Corporation fairly represented the balance of parties. For many years there was an understanding by which the Lord Mayor was alternately chosen from the two sections; and the Conservatives acquiesced, though not perhaps without misgivings, in the election of O'CONNELL to the office. Recently the enemies of the English connexion have obtained control of the municipality, and demagogues chosen on account of their political opinions have used the dignity of Lord Mayor to promote agitation. It is not forgotten that the assassin CAREY was a member of the Town Council. It is true that his constituents were not aware that he was a murderer, but they probably knew that he was a conspirator and a possible rebel. It would be in the highest degree absurd to confer any new powers on the Dublin Corporation; but it is not surprising that agitators should claim for it fuller independence when the Ministers are voluntarily promising to extend local government in Ireland. It is certain that every elected body which may be established in the disaffected provinces will be virtually a centre of the Land League, the National League, or some similar organization, or that its funds will be misapplied to political objects.

The main object of the local demagogues of Dublin and of their Parliamentary confederates is probably to obtain the control of the police. It is impossible to believe that even the weakest and most unscrupulous of Governments would transfer the only agency for the repression of crime into the hands of a body which might sympathize with some classes of offences. If the preservation of order in Dublin had been entrusted to the Corporation, it is not impossible that JAMES CAREY might have been a member of the Police Committee. The reasons against pursuing a similar course in London, though in some degree different, are almost equally conclusive. A Metropolitan Corporation might, in conceivable contingencies, be disposed to coerce Parliament or the Government, and the command of an army of policemen would make its physical force irresistible. An authorized communication to a Ministerial newspaper shows that the Government will for the present retain the disposal of the Metropolitan Police, but the terms of the statement are not free from ambiguity. The Bill will, according to the official announcement, not effect any change in the control of the Metropolitan or of the City Police. There is, therefore, no immediate danger as far as the larger part of the police force is concerned; but it is difficult to understand the intentions of the Government as to the small and highly disciplined body of the police which is now in the service of the Corporation. If no change is to be made, it seems to follow that the condition of the City of London is to be nominally maintained, while its jurisdiction is widely extended and its mode of election fundamentally altered. The substitution for the actual governing body of a new Lord Mayor and Town Council having nothing in common with their predecessors but a name would furnish but a lame and fictitious excuse for extending to the whole metropolis the organization of the City Police. Such a force would exercise its functions in all parts of the metropolitan area, and it would evidently clash with the larger body which will still be under the orders of the Government. The only remaining supposition, that the City Corporation is still to subsist with a restricted authority, is inconsistent with all the statements which have been made by the promoters of the new Municipality.

But for the special circumstances of the case, the demand which is preferred on behalf of Dublin might well seem reasonable, and even modest. If Dublin were well affected, and if the respectable part of the population possessed a fair share of influence, there would be no reason why the Corporation of Dublin should not be as fully trusted as the Corporation of Edinburgh. The conscientious discharge of difficult and dangerous duties by Dublin jurors proves that moral and political unsoundness is confined to the rabble. The reasons against the proposed incorporation of London are of a different kind. The most instructive precedent which can be studied by those who are interested in the question is that of the Paris Municipality. The Republican Legislature is constantly obliged to check its encroachments, though it neither elects a Mayor of Paris nor exercises any control over the police. The same revolutionary and destructive tendencies which discredited the Commune of 1794 and the Commune of 1871 still prevail in the municipality of the present day. The good sense with which the ratepayers of London have held aloof from the municipal agitation is not a little remarkable. The Municipal Reform League has no difficulty in assembling meetings in ostensible support of the Ministerial measure, but they consist of Radicals, who would be equally ready to support any democratic project. It is imprudent to insist on the indifference of non-electors to the extension of the franchise, because the challenge at once evokes agitation, as when Mr. BRIGHT appealed, in 1866, to the multitude which afterwards broke down the Hyde Park railings. It would be more difficult to excite popular enthusiasm in favour of a London Municipality. The metropolitan members have, with the exception of Mr. FIRTH, Mr. BRYCE, and Sir CHARLES DILKE, exhibited no interest in the measure, though several of them will vote with their party in its favour.

It is, of course, not impossible that Sir W. HARCOURT's project may be so skilfully devised as to conciliate an amount of popular approval which has not attended the vague and indefinite scheme of the political agitators; but no argument for organic changes has yet been deduced from experience. Unity of civil government in great towns which are virtually single communities has never been suggested as expedient in Salford, which is separated by an imaginary line from Manchester, or in Birkenhead, which is an overgrown suburb of Liverpool. Yet in either case the larger and the smaller city have all their interests in common; while Tottenham and Greenwich only know of one another's existence by reference to the map. Plymouth and Devonport have retained that reciprocal independence from the days when they were divided by a local feud which is now obsolete. It is only on the vast region which has been described as a province covered with buildings that a few theorists, backed by many agitators, think it necessary to enforce compulsory union. In answer to a Society which had asked him for an interview, Sir W. HARCOURT lately stated that he had fully considered the necessity of securing local control over the administration of separate districts. It remains to be seen whether the duty will be entrusted to Committees of the Central Council or reserved to bodies directly elected by the inhabitants. In one case the Common Council will, for administrative purposes, have only a factitious unity; in the other, it will have too much leisure to employ in political agitation. The frequent assertion that the central Municipality is needed to supply motive force is a mere figure of speech; and it has been again and again shown that in dealing with sewerage or with gas and water supply it will, unless it is invested with abnormal powers, have no advantage over existing bodies. The scheme would perhaps be comparatively innocuous if it were not certain that the municipal organization will be applied to political objects. The metropolitan members, largely increased in number, will be compelled to ally themselves with the Corporation for purposes of faction in the first instance, to degenerate perhaps ultimately into corruption.

THE GOVERNMENT REVOKE AND ITS PENALTY.

THAT in old jokes there is much new wisdom is a proposition which would doubtless shock Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD and Mr. JESSE COLLINGS. Its value has been practically illustrated on the first night of the Session of 1884 by a greater than they. No presence of mind could have availed the Government as Sir CHARLES DILKE's absence of body availed it then. In face of the telegram which announced the slaughter of not a few Englishmen, and of Turks, negroes, and Egyptians by the hundred or thousand, as a direct result of the laches of the English Ministry, it would have indeed needed a HORATIUS of debate to save Ministers. The PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD was wiser than COCLES, and was fortunately able to attain the same result by the more prudent policy of HERMINIUS. He "darted back," and the stalwart workmen of the Caucus cut the bridge not the less effectually. But no fair politician can refuse compassion to Sir CHARLES DILKE for having so frequently to play these very ambiguous parts. It is scarcely just that a single person should be constantly selected by fortune to be the exécuteur des basses œuvres of Mr. GLADSTONE's Cabinet. Is it necessary to reassure the House of Commons by declaring the intentions, which turn out to be no intentions at all, of the CZAR? Sir CHARLES DILKE is the knight of the post who goes bail for them. Must somebody come forward and profess ignorance of facts known to every telegraph clerk, or every reader of a Continental newspaper? The member for Chelsea is at Mr. GLADSTONE's service. Is it judged convenient to give an account of the sentiments of General GORDON and of Sir EVELYN BARING, which a fortnight will show in the unchallengeable print of Blue-books to be misleading? Still it is the author of Greater Britain who is equal to the occasion. Has Redistribution to be treated with a kind of variation on the old game of the Knights, the Nuns, and the Abbess? The PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD can do it. And, lastly, must an awkward, or rather an impossible, debate be prevented? Sir CHARLES DILKE undertakes to continue it, leaves strict orders that nobody else is to take his place, and then disappears. It is heroism, but is it politics? Sir CHARLES DILKE may be reminded of the verdict which was passed on Miss JUDITH MACAN, "Clever old woman! but "revokes too often." For the penalties of undiscovered revoking are considerable, and the motion of censure which Tuesday's proceedings have brought about is in far more awkward terms for the Government than Mr. BOURKE's amendment.

The word was of course passed to set down the collapse of Tuesday's debate as the fault of the Conservatives, which, considering that two Conservatives spoke consecutively, and that not a single member on the Government benches attempted to open his lips, may be said to be a defence necessitating a good deal of modest assurance in those who employ it. It is true that there is an agreeable double-edgedness about it which is highly characteristic of the quarters from which it comes. Had many Conservatives spoken, their number would undoubtedly have been held up as a proof of the way in which the Opposition wastes the time of the House. As many did not speak, they are accused of being responsible for the break-down of this remarkable discussion, which as far as parties are concerned was apparently expected to be a monologue. Unfortunately for the Government this is by no means the first occasion when something very similar has occurred, and Mr. GLADSTONE, to do him justice, has a greater variety of excuse than that which seems to suggest itself to his followers. He asked where was the evidence against the Government? The evidence happened to be in the possession of everybody, but this Mr. GLADSTONE seems to have thought it safe to ignore. However, he did not merely meet the accusation of designing or conniving at the collapse with contempt. Mr. GLADSTONE, it seems, was extremely anxious that the debate should continue, but somehow or other, though he has over three hundred followers in the House, pledged to do and die for him, nobody could be got to open his mouth. And then Mr. GLADSTONE proceeded to make some observations still more unfortunate in tenor. He himself was very anxious to speak, but he thought it a great misfortune that there should be any occasion for speaking. It was no fault of his that the debate was not kept up, but that there should be a debate at all was "a pernicious innovation." The Government "would re-"fuse to be a party to such proceedings" as lengthened debates on the Address. After this, is it not rather unreasonable of Mr. GLADSTONE to be so angry when Mr. CHAPLIN and other people point out that that was exactly what the Government did refuse to be on Tuesday night? And then Mr. GLADSTONE said that Lord PALMERSTON had once been very angry with him because he spoke early. This would have been a very effectual reply if the Opposition had insisted that some particular person should have spoken at some particular time. But, as it happens, they did nothing of the kind. Finally, Mr. GLADSTONE explained Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE's silence by saying that he himself had bidden Lord EDMOND reserve himself. This is a theory of reserves which has occasionally been carried out in actual warfare, but there it is not generally approved. In Parliamentary tactics, however, the conditions are different, and the fortunate possessor of an obedient majority is pretty sure of victory if he holds back his reserves long enough. Once more Mr. GLADSTONE can hardly blame his opponents if they explain his conduct in one or other of the only two possible ways in which it can be explained. If the collapse of debate was an accident, the discipline or the management or the spirits of the Ministerialists must be in a very bad way. If it was not an accident, why (this is, perhaps, the best way of sparing tender sensibilities) it was something else.

There is, indeed, no great difficulty in explaining the actual event. That the Government deliberately planned the postponement of an exceedingly awkward discussion till the first and worst moment was past no one need suppose, and a very charitable person may even grant that they did not deliberately take advantage of the chance of postponement when it presented itself. But their arrangements were somehow unaccountably slack; and, in the absence of arrangement, no Ministerialist cared to take upon himself the task of speaking while the news of the Tel massacre was buzzing in everybody's ears. Mr. GLADSTONE, in one of the curious flashes of ingenuousness which lit up his apology, confessed that "he found great "reluctance on the part of members on his side of the "House to take part in the debate." It is not at all surprising. Voting is one thing; speaking is another. It would have been an interesting experience if the seventy-seven honourable gentlemen who voted against Mr. BOURKE's amendment could have been put on their oath and asked what their opinion as to the responsibility of the Government for the bloodshed near Tokkar was. It would be paying them a very bad compliment to think that even the odd seven would have pronounced Mr. GLADSTONE blameless. So things explain themselves very well. The Government did not arrange for the stifling of the debate; did not even deliberately avail themselves of it. But nobody had been told to speak, and one man had been told not to speak, and another who might have thought it his duty to speak was unluckily out of the House, and the rank and file were in no humour to speak, and could have found nothing not damaging to the Government to say, and so, doubtless to the great relief of that Government, the debate fell through. But discreditable as this way of playing the political game is to Ministers (and on the most favourable hypothesis it is very discreditable to them), it would have been impossible to acquit the Opposition of all blame had the affair ended there, or even with the wrangle of Wednesday. They were certainly not bound, as is absurdly pretended, to go on speaking, one up and another down, till it was the good pleasure of somebody to answer. But it might well seem that one or other of them should surely have risen to protest against the manner in which the Government was behaving, and to draw the obvious moral from the Tokkar butchery. Unfortunately this kind of speaking requires qualities which are very rare on either side of the House of Commons at this moment. The modern debater appears to be a kind of safety match, and will only go off on his own box—the occasion which has been carefully prepared and arranged for him by his lawful chiefs. It is a commonplace that speaking has ceased to have any influence on votes, and for this there are, no doubt, more reasons than one. But one of those reasons is to be found in the cut and-dried character of the modern "great debate," in its enormous length, in the frequency with which it is repeated. Such an occasion as that of Monday would have been a godsend to an orator, and it is not entirely impossible that an orator might have worked it into something very far from a godsend to the Government. But it did not appear that the orator was forthcoming. This slackness of attack, though it certainly does not justify, goes some way to explain the shabby, shirking fashions of defence which have become habitual with the present Ministry. Their own placemen and Caucusseers care very little whether they show fight or not, and are quite as well satisfied with a silent retirement to the safe stronghold of the division lobby. Their opponents fail to take them on the raw places, and carry the traditional dulness of defensive war into what should be the lively and exciting business of attack. Meanwhile the interests of the country suffer by the constant evasions which the mismanagers of those interests are able and are not ashamed to execute. Fortunately in the present instance matters have not been left in this unsatisfactory position. With new weapons furnished by the very papers on which Mr. GLADSTONE relied for exculpation, the battle will be fought again next week, and, it may be trusted, fought out.

THE BURDEN OF ACTUALITY.

THE time spoken of by Mr. MATTHEW ARNOLD, the prophet, when we shall all yawn in each other's faces and the whole air shall be filled with the roarings of journalistic young (and veteran) lions, seems to have arrived. We are suffering from the burden of a prodigious dreary earnestness which is quite capable, unluckily, of occupying itself with the most trivial things. What, for example, can be more trivial than Mr. BARNUM's white elephant? What in the world does it matter to any mortal whether white elephants are so called because they are slate coloured and have pink spots? Who cares (except the student of the comparative science of religion) whether the Burmese worship white elephants or not? Yet these weighty topics are daily treated with irreproachable solemnity and dreariness by a cloud of correspondents in the newspapers. Zoologists, showmen, Siamese ambassadors, linguists, travellers, archæologists, Buddhists, they are all hard at it, every man sadder and more resolute than his neighbours. An authority on Buddhism writes to complain that Buddhists don't adore this particular Jumbo, whether he is white or not. The cultivated Buddhists shed bitter tears when they hear of the antics of Mr. BARNUM's priests. "This joke they do not understand, it hurts them "very much." As contending specialists in Buddhism have not yet made up their minds whether Buddhists do or do not believe in a future life, there is probably something to be said yet in favour of adoring the elephant. That something will be said with leaden earnestness, and so the "solemn loquacity" of the age lingers on, till some new Mumbo takes the place of Jumbo.

The consequence of our excessive devotion to solemn inquiries and mature or even over-ripe consideration is expressed in the modern cry for "actuality." Ever since PIERRE LEROUX proposed to write an article in the Revue des Deux Mondes, and ever since BULOZ replied that the subject "lacked actuality," editors have been determined to have actuality at any price. The public, too, has clamorously demanded actuality.

As a result of this demand for actuality, it follows that the only truly actual literature of the period is in the newspapers. They can project themselves, in the modern fashion, into the news and the interests of the day after to-morrow. Thus it is thought desirable to have articles on the Boat-race before the crews are made up; on the Twelfth before the birds are hatched; on speeches before they are spoken; on events of every kind before they occur. The weak point of this craze for actuality, this outrunning of the constable Time, is that the events thus feverishly anticipated may never occur, may never be actual at all. However, the demand of the moment for an indulgence in paulo-post future excitement is satisfied, and there is something very actual in that.

The newspapers, as we have said, are the prophets of actuality. They have naturally no time, space, or inclination, to waste on literature and art, and the leisurely essay in which our idle ancestors contemplated life and plucked the flower of humorous meditation. A book may get a hasty half column while the appearance of the book is an "actuality" or an item of news. A picture gallery is actual till people have had time to see it, after which it falls back into the dust-bin of forgetfulness. The iniquity of oblivion blindly scattereth his poppy over every play after the first night, unless, perchance, a quarrel full of very pretty actuality can be got up on a charge of plagiarism or on a trifle of costume. In this anxious chase after the actual, the British newspaper easily outstrips the American journal. The daily papers in America, though not deficient in smartness and "sensational "headings," actually supply their readers with long and apparently "thoughtful" notices of books, music, pictures, and plays. Things of that sort seem to retain their actuality much longer in America than in England. Here the actual varies from moment to moment, and what is a matter for heavy platitudes to-day is neglected to-morrow.

The worst of this state of things is that all literary organs and their editors seem as athirst for actuality as the evening newspapers themselves. The result is that the roaring of the most majestic lions fills the larger monthly magazines. Instead of being devoted to literature, art, fiction, and general entertainment, with a dash of lively politics, as in the old days of the Quarterly, the Edinburgh, and Blackwood, the monthly magazines have become bulky collections of signed and, if we may say so, stodgy leading articles on topics thrilling with the actual. It is difficult for any one to read the mere list of contents of the Fortnightly Review for this month without feeling the need of some literary pick-me-up. First, Sir JOHN LUBBOCK writes on Party Finance, an affair of figures. Then we have an engaging diatribe on the Anglo-French Alliance, which is followed by a treatise on Parliamentary Reform by Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD. Nothing can be more actual just now than Parliamentary Reform, and if Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD be not brimming over with actuality, why does he come so often and so wistfully before the public? Still his reflections are not calculated to increase the gaiety of nations. Turkish Arabia is very much en évidence, so Mr. TREVOR PLOWDEN chooses this topic as "something craggy to break his "mind upon," to quote BYRON. An article by Mr. O'BRIEN on Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH is sure to have at least one anxiously interested reader. Mr. LABOUCHERE is one of the most actual men of our country, but his remarks on Whigs and Radicals may be regarded as a sort of concession to human weakness. We cannot, all of us, be always on the level of Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD and Parliamentary Reform. After another concession to lovers of music, we fall back into the abysmal depths of "Our Colonial Policy," only to sink deeper and deeper into the slough of actuality where Mr. JESSE COLLINGS guides the trembling inquirer through the gloomy yet necessary topic of "Occupying Ownership." The Contemporary, meanwhile, cheers our drooping spirits and refreshes our fatigued eyes with the result of Mr. SLAGG's musings on Parliament and India. "The Outlook "in Egypt," though actual enough, perhaps, the day before yesterday, has already ceased to be actual. This is another proof of the mistaken nature of the policy which turns monthly magazines into specimens of the Higher (and drier) journalism. The outlook in Egypt gets blacker every day, and the writer who was an optimist in the middle of last month may be a pessimist in the beginning of this. The Contemporary then falls back and folds its hands over the Irish Land Act, as if enough ink had not been spilt over that business. The House of Peers next occupies the muse of actuality, and out of all this mass of printed matter who, except the proud authors, will be able to read a page next month? This kind of literature dies with its actuality, while old Blackwoods and old Quarterlies are capital reading even to-day, because they are full of humour, and deal with matters of permanent and lively interest. The literature of actuality dies after a brief and not intoxicating span of hurried existence. The Nineteenth Century is as actual and ponderous as its neighbours. The record of a "Walk to Coomassie" may not lose its interest, and there is permanent stuff in what Cardinal NEWMAN has to say about the "Inspiration of Scripture." But then come such topics as "The House of Lords"—unfortunate House—on "The Universities and the Poor," on "Cramming in "Elementary Schools" (by Lord NORTON, too), on "Pro-"portional Representation," and the Genesis of Zymotic Disease, and Christian Agnosticism, whatever that may mean—something, perhaps, like Gnostic Buddhism.

While the topics of the day are thrashed out by these heavy and thundering flails, how pleasant it is to turn to Mr. RUSKIN talking in a manner wholly devoid of actuality, on a topic which is not actual at all. Mr. RUSKIN leaves this solid earth, with all its newspapers, daily and monthly, and soars into cloud-land. He is at home with the winds and vapours that walk and weep and laugh through the comedy of ARISTOPHANES. He reminds us of what the clouds were like that HOMER beheld, when the son of CRONUS set them to hang motionless above the mountains. And then Mr. RUSKIN discovers that our sins have poisoned even the upper air; that a plague-wind made of dead men's souls sweeps over us, till all the air is darkened and all the twilight and the sunset soiled, and the grass is white, and the leaves shiver in anger and dread, and the blessed sun himself is more like a bad half-crown in a basin full of soapy water than a fair, hot wench in flame coloured taffeta. Of course all this is not actual. Of course our sins, which are very much what human sins always have been and will be, do not affect the atmosphere. The Icelanders are not sinners above all men, though their climate has changed to a barren winter since GUNNAR saw the fair fields of Lithend white unto harvest. It is not so, Mr. RUSKIN does not think it is so, his hearers do not believe that it is so. But how eagerly they listen; how far more eagerly than they would listen to Mr. JESSE COLLINGS on Occupying Ownership, or to Mr. SLAGG on Parliament and India, or to Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD on Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD, or to any one (except, perhaps, Mr. RUSKIN himself) on Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH. The reason is that Mr. RUSKIN can see with his eyes and speak with his tongue on a matter no more actual than the aspects of the world, the light and air, the shadow and sunshine and cloud. These things are always with us, and therefore are not actual at all, except when Science patronizes them through the spectroscope. But the human heart by which we live does not feed on actuality alone, but wants nourishment of a kind which an eminent and floral man of science calls "radiant." Mr. RUSKIN can give the radiance, and before it Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD and Mr. JESSE COLLINGS pale their actual but ineffectual fires.

IMPORTATION OF CATTLE DISEASE.

UNTIL the Bill for further restricting the importation of cattle from countries in which the foot and mouth disease exists has been actually introduced in the House of Lords, it may be taken for granted that the Government has, at least partly, conceded the principle contended for by Mr. CHAPLIN. The concession has been made at the eleventh hour, and in an undignified way. It is now more than six months since a majority of the House of Commons condemned the existing system. When Mr. CHAPLIN's motion was carried it was opposed by Ministerial speakers, and the vote of the House was practically ignored by the Cabinet. Nothing was said during the recess to show that Government had any intention of dealing with the question. It had no place in the QUEEN's Speech, though the defence of agricultural industry is, in the opinion of everybody except a little knot of fadmongers, incomparably more important than the Municipality Bill to which a great part of the Session is to be devoted. The Ministry has, however, at last recognized the fact that something must be done, or at least promised, if an important body of voters is not to be permanently alienated. How far what it is proposed to do will satisfy Mr. CHAPLIN, it is as yet impossible to say. The Ministry has promised to do something effectual, and if Mr. HENEAGE is right, they are honest gentlemen, and will keep their word. The terms of their undertaking are, however, studiously vague. The powers of the Privy Council are to be extended, and that is all. In a question of this kind the spirit in which the Ministry will act is of far more importance than the terms of the measure they are going to bring in. It is at least probable that the Cabinet is by no means prepared to go as far as will satisfy the agricultural interest. Mr. CHAPLIN will accept nothing short of an almost complete prohibition of the importation of foreign cattle. Such a drastic policy, though there is much to be said in its favour as a measure of reasonable protection for cattle-farmers, would undoubtedly arouse serious opposition among large bodies of voters whom the Government cannot afford to offend; and we must be prepared to see the Bill declared wholly insufficient when it is at last drafted. For the present, however, discussion is useless. The Ministry having announced its intention of doing something, the farmers' friends can only wait to see what it is to be. Mr. CHAPLIN will probably find that he must make a compromise of some sort.

The question on Thursday night was, not what will the Government do, but when will it do it? The tardy Ministerial promise was not calculated to satisfy the Opposition. It had a disagreeable resemblance to the impecunious debtor's eager undertaking to pay something some day soon in order to avoid being dunned for the moment. The assurance usually fails to satisfy the impatient tradesman. When Mr. CHAPLIN tried, however, to bring the Cabinet to book, he learnt, probably with no great surprise, that a coalition majority is one of the least trustworthy of all supports. Nothing could be vaguer than Mr. GLADSTONE's promises, or more audacious than his excuses for their vagueness. He could not be got to say when the Bill would be dealt with in the House of Commons, and his sense of the fitness of things was shocked at the mere idea of giving precedence to a measure not named in the QUEEN's Speech over others which had enjoyed that honour. To a House which has had less than a year to forget the story of the BRADLAUGH Relief Bill, this came within a measurable distance of being impertinent. But, little as the Cabinet have promised, they have contrived to satisfy many of Mr. CHAPLIN's supporters for the time being at least. The Liberal country members who voted for him last Session, and would doubtless do so again under similar circumstances, were not unnaturally glad to find some means of reconciling their duty to their constituents with their loyalty to their party. The attitude of these gentlemen was well defined by Mr. HENEAGE in the devoted confession of faith referred to above. He rejected the amendment intended to bind the Cabinet down as a party measure, and an insult to "statesmen who were also gentlemen," and who "would "fulfil the promises which they had made." If broken promises are to deprive the Cabinet of the right to be called gentlemen, which of that honourable body can consider himself safe? To be sure there is a degree of pressure by adverse circumstances which affords the most honourable man a fair excuse for failing to keep his word. If, therefore, at some future period in a Session which is yet but four days old, and has already seen the beginning of collapse and confusion, the Bill for extending the powers of the Privy Council has to go the way of so many Bills, the excuse will be ready, and the promise will remain on record to show the good intention. So will "the states-"men who are also gentlemen" avoid the unpleasant task of trying to do something for the farmers without offending Birmingham, and yet preserve their character, at least in the opinion of supporters so trusty as Mr. Illingworth. The defeat of Mr. Chaplin's amendment was inevitable. A Ministry which has any majority at all has only to make a promise, and it can rely on being trusted for a time, at any rate in countries which have advanced far enough in Parliamentary practice to understand the necessity of discipline. Meanwhile Mr. Chaplin may be fairly content. Whether the Bill is properly pushed or not, it must assuredly be drafted; and it will be no small addition to the already considerable difficulties of the Cabinet that it must be so drawn up as to satisfy the country members among their supporters, and yet not offend the Radicals of the towns. If the Ministry contrives to sit upon those two stools, it will almost have proved its capacity to settle the affairs of Egypt. It has already seriously damaged its character by postponing the attempt to protect the greatest of English industries to mere party measures.

SOCIALISM IN VIENNA.

MORE than a quarter of a century has passed since the mob of Vienna stormed the Ministry of War, dragged the unhappy Minister Latour from his hiding-place, and, after barbarously murdering him, hung up his corpse on a lamp-post. The events of the years 1848 and 1849 showed that in no capital of Europe, not even with the exception of Paris, were the forces of anarchy stronger or more active. There was a fierceness and audacity in the Viennese rabble which was wanting in the more civilized populace of Berlin or Dresden. The superior education and, perhaps, the more stolid temperament of the North Germans gave a somewhat different character to the revolutionary movements which took place at the same period among them. Even the purely Socialistic party in the German Empire now relies on argument rather than on force; and the higher education of the German Socialist enables him to master books on the subjects at issue which a Parisian anarchist would not have the patience to read or the training to understand. But to the Viennese, as to the Parisian revolutionist, force is not only the best, but the only remedy. Since the time when Jellachich and Windisch-Grätz put an end to the short-lived dominion of the Viennese mob, force, however, has been on the side of the Government. But in Vienna, as in Paris, the snake has been scotched but not killed. By meetings, when they are permitted, and by murders when they are not, the anarchical party keeps the Government alive to the fact of its existence. And within the last few weeks it appears to have shown so much activity that it has become necessary to suspend in Vienna the laws which guarantee personal freedom to all Austrian subjects.

A large number of arrests have already been made, and the prompt action of the Government will probably have the effect of checking, for the moment, the efforts of the anarchists. The Government claims to have in its possession information which it is at present unable to publish, but which justifies it in resorting to exceptional measures. This information is said to point to a conspiracy of a more dangerous character than any which has hitherto been discovered. The measures proposed for the defence of public order were on Tuesday last brought before the Reichsrath, and passed their first reading. It is obvious that in cases of this kind, when a Government is tracking out a dangerous conspiracy, it cannot prudently tell all it knows. It may have more than ample information on which to act; but a mere hint as to the sources from which its information is derived may be sufficient to give the alarm, and enable all the leading conspirators to effect their escape. The most common way in which such plots are detected is by the treason of some of those implicated in them; and the longer the informers retain the confidence of their companions, the better for the Government. The Democratic Opposition in the Reichsrath has, however, attacked the Government for its reticence, and demanded fuller explanations, but the Government carried the day. A Committee of twenty-four members, all of whom are pledged to secrecy, has been appointed, before whom Count Taaffe will lay the evidence on which he and his colleagues have acted. In the course of a few days the result of their deliberations may be looked for, and if, as is to be hoped, the Government succeeds in laying hands on the ringleaders of the conspiracy, a trial hardly inferior in interest to that which followed the Phœnix Park murders may be looked for.

It is not, however, by repressive measures only that the Austrian Government proposes to deal with the present crisis. Necessary as these are, they do not remove the causes of the evils from which the working classes in Vienna, as in many other cities on the Continent, are now suffering. The Government and the Opposition alike agree that legislation for the benefit of the poor is necessary. For many years the English Factory Acts have been quoted abroad both by Socialists and by their opponents as examples of what the State may legitimately do for those among the poor who are unable to take proper care of their own interests. It is not, however, surprising that, when once it is recognized that the State has duties of a more or less paternal nature towards its poorer and more helpless members, those duties should be construed in the widest sense in those countries where the State, and not the effort of individuals, has been looked to as the source of all improvement. There is thus a marked difference between legislation on behalf of the poor in England and on the Continent. The initiative in such legislation belongs to this country; but, when first proposed in our times in England, it ran counter to the theories and prejudices of many even of those who had the interests of the working classes sincerely at heart. The general principle that the labour market, like every other market, is best left to regulate itself had been treated in England as a law which admitted of no exceptions. The party, then rapidly gaining the ascendent, which believed in free trade in all other things believed also in free trade in labour. There was, nevertheless, this consideration to be taken into account. The employer of labour is nearly always able to take care of himself; a large number of those whom he employs are able to take care of themselves; but there still remains a considerable number of the latter whose sex and age put them at the mercy, on the one hand, of those who wish to employ them, and, on the other, of the husbands or fathers who wish them to add to the family earnings. The unregulated employment, therefore, of such labour is not free trade at all in the true sense of the word; and the laws which now regulate the employment of such labour only express what the individuals themselves, if they had a fair chance, would naturally bargain for on their own account. It is only lately that ideas have become current in England the drift of which is to extend the protection of the State to people who are perfectly well able to protect themselves. But in countries where obedience to the State is hereditary and natural, and self-government new and strange, the first instinct of the people when times are bad is to distrust their own powers and to look for help to the Government. In France, in Germany, and in Austria the State counts for more, and the individual for less, than in England; and in all three countries the State has assumed, or is asked to assume, functions with regard to the working classes which, at least at present, have never been seriously contemplated in England.

Prince Bismarck's scheme of State Socialism is combated in Germany by that school of politicians which has most in common with orthodox economists in England. Perhaps it is for this reason that the scheme has been too hastily condemned in the English press. A measure which would be both needless and impracticable here may possibly be advantageous in a country where the State requires so much more from the individual, and where the individual looks so much more to the State. What measures the Austrian Government will propose with a view to improve the condition of the poor we have yet to learn; but it is by no means improbable that they will have points in common with those of Prince Bismarck. Meanwhile the Democratic party in the Austrian Reichsrath has made a proposal which has a similar object in view, though the means by which it is to be obtained are somewhat different. According to the plan proposed by Herr Schönerer, a Democratic member of the Reichsrath, and supported by the more moderate section of the Left, a sum of ten million florins is to be added to the next Budget and devoted to the support of labourers who are sick or past work. It is obvious that this proposal, if carried into effect, would act simply as a temporary palliative, and would in the long run tend to pauperize and degrade the recipients of public charity. A scheme for bettering the condition of the poor, according to which the poor themselves exercise no thrift or self-denial, but merely passively take what comes out of other people's pockets, must of course break down on trial. But that it should be seriously proposed and discussed in the Reichsrath is proof that the distress which it aims at relieving must be acute and widespread. The Austrian Government has thus one more difficulty added to the many which beset it already. Nor is the Socialistic movement confined to the capital. The troubles and disturbances last autumn in Croatia were in no small part due to the spread of Socialistic ideas among the peasantry, though other causes also contributed to produce discontent. There is, however, no reason to suppose that the present Socialistic movement in Austria will have better fortune than any that have preceded it. The Government is strong, is on the alert, and is on the track of its enemies. Of these some are already in prison, and some have fled. But it is evident that in Austria, as elsewhere, the influence of Socialistic ideas cannot be permanently destroyed, except by a permanent improvement in the condition of the mass of the people.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

THE massacre between Trinkitat and Tokkar, and the Parliamentary incidents thereto appertaining, have naturally occupied the attention of the public to the exclusion of other aspects of the Egyptian question during the present week. This is not merely natural, it is unavoidable. The more glaring instances of mismanagement necessarily obscure the lesser. Consequently the publication of Lord GRANVILLE's letter to the British Suez Canal Directors has passed with comparatively little comment. Yet it is a matter of very considerable importance—of importance by no means limited to the actual and immediate subject. How closely the Suez Canal touches England, both commercially and politically, need not be said. But it is sometimes forgotten—it is indeed the object of a whole party to cause it to be forgotten—that Egypt is not important because of the Suez Canal, but the Suez Canal is important because of Egypt. The one is an accidental, and, it may be, temporary, fashion of utilizing the highway to the East, the key of three continents; the other is the highway and the key. Weighty, therefore, as is the question of maintaining and making the best of the control over the Canal which the wise policy of the late Government gave to England, the question of maintaining and making the best of the hold on Egypt itself which the bounty of fortune has given to the present reluctant and unthankful Ministers is weightier still. The attitude of the Government towards the Canal is intrinsically a matter of interest; it is a matter of greater interest insomuch as it indicates their attitude towards the windfall which they have hitherto abused, apparently through sheer fear of using it.

Practically speaking, the Government have accepted the agreement between M. DE LESSEPS and the Steamship Owners' Association en bloc, and have thus given the former something like the "six lines" he wished for. Lord GRANVILLE indeed makes the very proper but somewhat trivial suggestion that England should appoint some nautical men on the Commission for recommending improvements in the means of transit; and he is of opinion that the present official Directors should be added to the London Consultative Committee. It is not quite clear whether this hints at a further increase of the total proportion of English Directors. If it does, so far so good; though it is not easy to say that the services to commerce or to England of the present official Directors have hitherto been of such a distinguished kind that either commerce or England need greatly care whether they are on the Committee or not. But the suggested alterations are really trivial; and thus it may be repeated that Lord GRANVILLE has practically endorsed the agreement as it stood. Certainly it is, as was pointed out at the time of its conclusion, an infinitely better agreement than that which he and his colleagues projected. But that it is not wholly satisfactory, even from the point of view of commerce, the grave objections which Mr. MAGNIAC brought against it the other day sufficiently show. It is certain that the administration of the Canal by M. DE LESSEPS and his nominees in times past has by no means been such as to inspire any extraordinary confidence in the administration of the Canal by M. DE LESSEPS and his nominees in future. It is certain that, although the projected alterations limit and temper his autocracy, they by no means put an end to it. It is certain, further, that the failure of the Canal Company to provide the accommodation which they originally undertook to provide, if it does not go to the full extent of vitiating their title altogether, at least supplies a reason for enlarging and continuing that title only with very great caution. And, lastly, there are some points very interesting indeed to commerce and quite untouched in the agreement. How is the money for the improvements to be raised? How is the permission, if required, for the execution of those improvements to be granted, and by whom, and on what terms? What is to be the status of the furnishers of the new capital, and how are those furnishers to be selected? These, we say, are questions very interesting to commerce merely as such, and they are as yet by no means answered. Perhaps the approaching meeting of the Canal shareholders (except the largest) in Paris may give some hints upon them; but this perhaps is merely a perhaps. So also the expounding of the last paragraph of Lord GRANVILLE's letter gives occasion for a good many more perhapses. Lord GRANVILLE remembers (it is well that he at last does so) that HER MAJESTY'S Government "possess as shareholders a very large in-"terest in the undertaking." This might be thought to be a useful reminder to M. DE LESSEPS, but the hopes which it awakens are dashed by the subsequent remark that the agreement "puts an end to the differences which have arisen." Now there is one difference which has arisen to which the agreement notoriously does not put an end, and it is the most important of all. Englishmen, shipowners and non-shipowners, are profoundly dissatisfied with the present absurd arrangement, whereby their own millions' worth of shares give them no more direct influence in the concern than any Parisian shopkeeper's thousands' worth. Moreover, though the question of monopoly is hung up by the agreement, it is most assuredly not put an end to. Now these are exactly the two most important differences in the whole affair.

It would therefore appear that in civil as in military matters HER MAJESTY'S Government had, up to the middle of last month, at any rate, which is the date of Lord GRANVILLE's letter, learnt nothing and forgotten everything. And as in such affairs there is hardly any possibility of a massacre at the Wells of Teb coming to rouse them, there is no knowing how long they may be able to continue in the same course. The authors of the most restless, meddling, and mischievous domestic legislation that any Government has attempted in England persevere, as regards foreign affairs, in obeying the maxim "Can't you let it alone," thereby exactly reversing the conduct which political wisdom dictates. M. DE LESSEPS's monopoly and M. DE LESSEPS's ingenious by-laws for neutralizing the power of capitalist shareholders are to be let alone, notwithstanding the obvious seeds of future trouble which lie in them and notwithstanding the fresh experience of the immediate past. Lord GRANVILLE at his desk, like Mr. GLADSTONE in Parliament, speaks innocently of shareholders, of the customers of the Company, and so forth, exactly as if the bombardment of Alexandria, and the battle of Tel-el-Kebir, and the English occupation, and the peremptory order to Egypt to abandon vast tracts of territory were all dreams. England is a shareholder and a customer—that is all; just as when BAKER PASHA's wretched policemen were hustled to their death, England was a looker-on and an adviser merely. It is true that this last illustration was not complete when Lord GRANVILLE wrote his letter; but the jaunty carelessness with which he treated it on Tuesday night shows that he has learnt nothing since that time. Now no good ever came in this world of refusing to acknowledge facts, and no good ever will come of it. M. DE LESSEPS's imperium in imperio may at any moment produce the gravest inconvenience while England is sovereign (as, despite Mr. GLADSTONE and Lord GRANVILLE, she is sovereign) in Egypt. When, if ever, England is unwise enough to renounce this virtual, if not titular, sovereignty, then M. DE LESSEPS's imperium in imperio will produce graver inconveniences still. It is not at the moment when the second naval Power in the world is resuming projects of naval and colonial aggrandizement and aggression that the most important naval communication on the globe can be left under the sway of a Frenchman. This is the plain truth, and it is simply silly to mince the matter about it.

By leaving M. de Lesseps's anomalous position practically untouched (and, as far as political matters go, the agreement so leaves it) the Government prepares for itself and its successors a thorn in the side as long as England is in Egypt, and something much worse than a thorn if England goes out of Egypt. As has been repeatedly shown, there is no slighting of the great commercial interests involved in thus handling the matter from the point of view of politics first. For, if the Suez Canal is made politically safe, all commercial advantages are safeguarded by one and the same operation; whereas the merely commercial advantages depend entirely on the political, which in their turn they do nothing to secure. Both can be made safe by a very simple plan, which has been again and again explained. The creation for the purposes of the projected enlargement of new capital, to be held exclusively by the British Government in addition to the actual English shares, and the assignment of proportionate voting powers to the representatives of the British Government, would secure the whole matter, without wrong or umbrage to any one. No other plan will, in the long run, prevent friction, either commercial or political, and no other will secure what England may in justice, and must in reason, demand.

THE PERSISTENCE OF VANDALISM.

If Robert Bruce were again alive and in difficulties, he would have no need to go to the spider for encouragement. All that can be taught in the way of perseverance would be supplied him by a Railway Company which has an eye on some bit of yet unspoiled scenery. Patience, determination, indifference to obstacles, unbroken courage under defeat—all the qualities, in fact, that go to make up the hero—are exhibited on this confined stage. When a Railway Bill has been brought in, exposed, and rejected, the unthinking bystander supposes that it is done with, and throws up his hat accordingly. Really it is only postponed to another opportunity. The Company hope that by that time its true character will have been forgotten, or that the member who led the opposition will be dead, or that in some way or other those that have resisted its passing once will not resist it a second time. At the earliest moment the necessary papers are deposited and the necessary notices given: and, before the Session is many days old, the victory of the previous year has gone for nothing, and the battle has to be fought over again. At the end of last summer all reasonable people were congratulating themselves upon the rescue of the Lake District from the hand of the railway spoiler. The Borrowdale Bill had been rejected, and the Ennerdale Bill had been dropped, owing to the decision of a Select Committee; and it hardly seemed credible that when February came round either of them would again come to the front. Those who thus thought grievously underrated the zeal that is evoked by the prospect of floating a new Company. The Ennerdale Railway Bill is as lively as though its predecessor had never been upset. Rightly or wrongly, its promoters are of opinion that they can now convince Parliament that the line will do good to many and injure no one. It is hard on the defenders of the Lake scenery that they should have to remain constantly on the watch. But for the present this seems to be the only condition on which the most characteristic and beautiful scenery in England can be preserved from destruction. There may come a time when Parliament will speak its mind so unmistakably and unreservedly as to convince even prospective railway directors that they are only throwing away their money in useless efforts. But until this is done there is always a chance that persistence may at length meet with its reward. For the moment, therefore, it is necessary to forget that an Ennerdale Railway Bill came to nothing in 1883, and to fight as stoutly as last year to ensure that it shall come to nothing in 1884.

The arguments for and against the Bill have in no way changed their character. The promoters, as before, appear not in the character of men of business who want to open up a new industry, and now in that of philanthropists anxious to bring one of the loveliest portions of England within reach of a larger number of visitors. Neither contention will really hold water. Even if the mines which it is desired to open in Ennerdale proved much more productive than seems at all likely, it would still be true that Ennerdale is not the place in which mining ought to be encouraged. Iron is an excellent metal, but it may be bought too dearly, and when the price asked for it is the destruction of one of the finest of the Lake valleys, it certainly would be bought too dearly. If a coal-bed were discovered under Westminster Abbey, and the only way of working it were to open a shaft in the nave, the majority of Englishmen would choose to go without that particular addition to their coal supply. Great Gable is in its way as valuable a possession as Westminster Abbey, and the fact that we owe it to nature instead of to art is no reason for treating it with less consideration. Nor is there, so far as appears, any great reason to believe that the Ennerdale mines would repay working for more than a few years. The destruction of the valley might put a little money into the pockets of a few local landowners; but it would not appreciably cheapen the metal. We do not lay much stress upon this consideration, because, however rich the mines might be, it would be equally improper to give them any encouragement that can possibly be withheld. But it may, perhaps, influence a member here and there whose head would be turned by the prospect of a large output and large profits; and for this reason it is worth while to mention it.

The argument derived from the supposed convenience of tourists is quite as worthless as that derived from the supposed development of mining industry. What is it that a visitor goes to Ennerdale to enjoy? Not merely a pretty view from the windows of a railway carriage—that can be had in abundance on the railways already existing in the district. Not merely the pleasure of leaving Manchester or Leeds behind, and tasting the clear mountain air of Cumberland—there are already routes without number on which this pleasure may be experienced to the full. The merit of the finer Lake scenery lies in its remoteness and difficulty of access. The "tripper" is amply provided for already. All that he really cares to see is brought well within his reach. No doubt if a railway were carried up Ennerdale he would be able to add one more valley to the list already brought within the compass of a tourist ticket. But he will gain nothing by doing this. The pleasure he will derive from going along the Ennerdale railway will be identical with that which he derives from going along the existing railways in the neighbourhood. On the other hand, the pleasure of which those who already know and love Ennerdale will be deprived is one which cannot be replaced. The solitude that belongs to the head of a mountain valley which has been left in its original wildness is something distinct and characteristic. Can there be any interference with human enjoyment more gratuitous than the destruction of a charm which has no fellow in order to multiply others which are already to be had for the asking?

The rejection of the Ennerdale Railway Bill will probably be tantamount to the preservation of the valley in its present condition. Cheap transport is the one thing that can make mining pay there, and cheap transport is not to be had without the use of steam. Accidentally, therefore, all that the lovers of Ennerdale can desire seems likely to be secured if the House of Commons will but do its duty and refuse to read the Bill a second time. But, when this end has been gained—and we will not suppose that the House will shrink from confirming the resolution at which the Committee of last year arrived—there will still be something for the defenders of the Lakes to struggle for. So long as the law remains in its present state, we can never be sure that the work of many Sessions will not be undone by the negligence of one. What is wanted is an Act of Parliament which, without interfering with private rights as they now exist, shall prevent them from being pushed to an extreme which would conflict directly with the public interest. In this respect the Bill for the protection of the Malvern Hills, of which we spoke the other day, might supply a convenient model.

One further remark may be usefully made. A year or so back one of the opponents of the Braithwaite and Buttermere Railway wrote that he would rather see a railway through Hyde Park than through Borrowdale. Borrowdale has for the time been saved; but how about Hyde Park? If it were only to prevent the establishment of a most dangerous precedent, the Parks Railway deserves to be most strenuously opposed.

FRANCE.

THE debate in the French Chamber on the state of the working classes in Paris and the provinces ended in a fashion which is highly characteristic of that remarkable legislative body. M. LANGLOIS made a motion, and various members made speeches calling upon the Government to do something heroic in the cause of the poor. M. FERRY and his colleagues proved to demonstration that nothing but mischief could come of any interference by the State with the working of economic laws. After a discussion prolonged over eight days, the deputies decided by a large majority that M. FERRY was perfectly right. They accepted the motion, which was in the most explicit terms a vote of confidence in the Ministry. It would seem to follow, as a natural consequence, that here was an end of the whole matter. The deputies, however, that is to say, a majority of them, thought otherwise. Having safeguarded the nation against a sudden increase of the Budget, and having given the middle class a proof that they were not disposed to play with Socialism, they felt at liberty to show a kindly consideration for the troubles of the workmen. They therefore proceeded to follow up their vote of confidence in M. FERRY by another of a wholly contradictory character. A motion of M. CLÉMENCEAU'S for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the state of the poor was carried by a small majority. The PRIME MINISTER pointed out that the Committee could discover nothing that was not already perfectly well known, and that the Chamber had quite enough to do without making an inquiry into things in general. A little reflection, if the deputies had thought it worth while to reflect, would have shown them that they had already voted any further inquiry useless. But some among the numerous subdivisions of the Republican majority which felt that they had done enough to prove their sense now apparently considered themselves at liberty to show a little safe generosity. The pleasure of reminding M. FERRY that, after all, they are the masters doubtless counts for something. Accordingly, when M. CLÉMENCEAU'S motion was put to the vote, a majority was found to agree that a Committee should sit to inquire whether a remedy could not be found for a state of things which had just been declared beyond all cure by any action on the part of the Government.

The Republican deputies who left M. FERRY so suddenly in the lurch are probably of opinion that a Committee of inquiry is a thing of no particular importance, and voted for it simply because they wished to show their constituents of the working classes that the elect of the people are not unmindful of the interests of the poor. These gentlemen may plausibly argue that the decisions of a Committee of inquiry bind nobody to anything. It can go on inquiring for ever, and listening to the rambling talk of witnesses, without coming to any decision. Even if it does make its mind up to propose something dangerous, it will still be in the power of the Chamber to reject its suggestions. The Republican deputies who voted for it, in company with a curious mixture of Radicals and reactionaries, can always vote against their own Committee as easily as they voted against the Ministry. In the meantime they will have the credit of having shown an enlightened sympathy with the "nouvelles couches." It is only by supposing that the semi-Ministerial deputies who gave the victory to the Opposition acted on some such calculation as this that it is possible to account for their alliance with the enemies of the Republic and the more dangerous enemies of all social order. This is exactly the kind of smartness which has at all times seemed admirable to most sections of the French Chamber. They are always ready to vote for anything likely to please the workmen of Paris, provided that it will also embarrass a Ministry not formed by themselves, even at the risk of damaging their own cause by violating their avowed principles. The fact that the manœuvre is almost uniformly a failure never seems to diminish a Frenchman's faith in its wisdom. It is beyond doubt that in the present case it may have the most serious consequences. It is no small misfortune that the Chamber is unable to rid itself of its old weakness for treating a Ministry as if it was a species of skittle to be set up and knocked down at the caprice of the deputies. The patience of M. FERRY and his colleagues is not a little wonderful; but it is quite in keeping with French Parliamentary practice. The Chamber voted directly against him on a matter of the first importance, and he has not resigned. The previous vote in his favour was considered a fair set-off to the second against him, and nobody has been honestly surprised that he has chosen to ignore the fact that his majority cannot be trusted. It is hard to understand how any sincere Republican who is not a Radical—and there were several in M. CLÉMENCEAU'S majority—can fail to see that caprice of this kind must keep the Republic weak. The Royalist and Bonapartist parties are so feeble for the present that there is perhaps no great risk in giving them another chance of saying that no Republican Ministry can possess the stability needed to govern France. It is, however, the height of folly to encourage the Radicals, who have ruined every attempt to establish the Republic. That they are greatly encouraged by the defeat of M. FERRY admits of no question. The deputies may flatter themselves that the vote for a Committee binds them to nothing, and is only a cheap way of showing their philanthropy; but in the opinion of the Radicals it is a recognition by the Chamber of their favourite doctrine that the State is bound to find work and wages for the workman who is left in difficulties by the fluctuations of trade. If the Committee ends by reaffirming the Chamber's approval of M. FERRY'S attitude, which is doubtless what many of those who voted for it hope, the extreme parties will only be angered by what they will consider as a deception. If it, or even a considerable part of it, makes any suggestion of a definite and dangerous kind, which is highly probable, the Republic will have at once to deal with the Socialists of various kinds, who are by much its most formidable enemies. The conduct of the section of Republicans who have inflicted this check on M. FERRY can, at least, scarcely fail to strengthen the hands of the politicians who wish to see the electoral system modified so as to make it possible for a Minister to secure a steady majority. A mechanical majority is, no doubt, a very bad thing; but it is better than a temporary coalition of little cliques which is liable to fall to pieces at any moment.

So many years have passed, and so many things have happened, since M. ROUHER held office, that his death cannot be considered as a political event. The Government which he served has been decisively condemned. It ended in a shameful disaster which France is not likely to forget, and the statesmen of the Empire were necessarily buried in the ruin of their cause. Foreigners have no reason to recognize the distinction which the victorious Republicans and the Royalists are wont to draw between the Government of NAPOLEON III. and the country. The Second Empire represented the nation as faithfully as any Government which has existed since the fall of the old Monarchy. It served the narrow ideas of the shopkeeper and peasant classes, and was steadily supported by them. Its Chauvinism and the vein of maudlin sentimentality which it partly owed to the personal character of the EMPEROR were thoroughly French. But, though it was in many ways an ignoble form of government, it had some administrative virtues which its successor has certainly not surpassed. It can fairly be said of M. ROUHER that he was closely associated with all that was best in the Empire. He did France good service in its own despite when he devoted his great powers of work and undoubted administrative ability to carrying out the intelligent commercial policy which was begun by the EMPEROR. If he served his master with servility, he was at least loyal, and he kept aloof from the intrigues which French politicians have covered with so much fluent rhetoric. His countrymen who do not belong to his party cannot be expected to forgive him his share in the shameful conspiracy of 1852. It is, however, a kind of shame not monopolized by any one French party. The conduct of NAPOLEON III. and his fellow-conspirators can stand a comparison with that of the men who saw in the disasters of their country first of all a good opportunity for rising to power with the help of mob violence. M. ROUHER'S share in the foundation of the Second Empire was comparatively innocent. If he helped to put all the intellect and culture of France under lock and key, it must not be forgotten that they had already proved their inability to govern. He was not among the worst specimens of the "attorney species" which has generally shared the government of France with soldiers since the Great Revolution.

THE FIESTA DE TOROS.

THE bull-fight or, as the Spaniards call it, the bull-feast, cannot be called a national game in the strict sense of the word. In its fully developed form it is not an amusement in which anybody can share, but a performance by highly trained professionals. It is, however, a national game in so far that nothing else is so characteristic or so popular. No other thing of Spain is so thoroughly Spanish. In the Northern provinces it is not the custom for ladies to be present, but their husbands and brothers go to a man. Spaniards who do not smoke are few, but they are far more numerous than those who do not visit the ring at least occasionally. The great majority of foreign visitors see at least one fight during their stay, and of those who have once gone, not a few go again, and keep on going. It is needless at this time of day to speak of its barbarity, especially as it has been made the subject of not a little cant, more particularly, as is only natural, in England. The bull, the horses, and at times the men, suffer, it is true, yet it may very well be doubted whether the pursuit is more cruel than coursing bagged hares or pigeon-shooting. In a world which is so rich in barbarity of a very sordid kind, some allowance may be made for the brilliant bull-fight.

Elaborate descriptions of the show have been given quite often enough. Foreigners who have visited Spain for centuries past have mostly written accounts of it more or less fully, and it may be taken for granted that our readers are already familiar with the main features of the fight. They know that it takes place in an open amphitheatre; that the bull is first worried by men on horseback, then maddened by men on foot armed with various instruments of torture, then mortally wounded by the chief performer, who uses a sword; and, finally, when it has fallen, put out of its pain by a blow with a species of dagger on the spine. Some six or seven bulls are disposed of one after another in this way, and then the "fiesta" is at an end. The internal organization of the game is less known, and we will endeavour to explain how a fight is got up, and how the work is divided among the various combatants. Firstly, then, as to place. Most towns of any importance in Spain have a regular "Plaza de Toros." It is an open amphitheatre, which in some cases is very large. The ring at Valencia will hold twelve thousand persons. According to amateurs of severe taste, a fight cannot be seen to full advantage in a large ring, because the men have too much room to avoid the bull, and are therefore never called upon to show their utmost skill. When he has plenty of space to run in, a banderillero is tempted to trust to his legs rather than to the accuracy of his eye and the neatness of his dodging. Besides, the bull gets tired too soon. In small towns, which can only afford one fight or so a year, the market-place, or principal square (plaza), is temporarily fitted up. This was at one time the universal practice, and hence the name of the ring, to which the title of plaza has descended, just as the pit of the theatre is called the patio, or courtyard—the comedies having been originally given in that part of the houses of the nobles, or in large inns. A strong stockade (la barrera) runs round the ring. It is about six feet high, and has a ledge about two feet from the ground, for the convenience of the men who have to jump over. Inside the barrier there is a passage rather higher than the level of the ring, then another barrier. The seats rise from the top of this second barrier, so that even if the bull gets out of the ring, he cannot reach the spectators. These seats, mere rough benches without a back, rise in tiers, and above them are the boxes. As the fiesta is given in the afternoon, one side of the plaza is in shadow, and the seats here cost rather more than those in the sun. In the middle of the boxes in this half of the amphitheatre is the seat of the president. Right under him is a passage from the ring, with which it communicates by heavy folding doors. Wounded men can be taken out by this way into the room where the doctor waits. Similar doors on one side lead to the stable for the horses. Opposite the president's box, and on a level with him, is the seat of the bugler, and under it another passage with other folding doors, which leads to the torral—the yard where the bulls are kept. All these doors open back from the ring, and for a very intelligible reason. When the bull has got over the barrier and sets off trotting round in the narrow passage, he must be turned back into the plaza. One of the attendants, therefore, runs to the door, towards which he is moving, and shuts the further flap back across the passage. The bull, finding his road barred, makes a halt. Then a second attendant gets nimbly on the top of the barrier, and begins to shut the nearer flap. The bull turns instinctively towards the open space on one side of him—namely, the ring—and plunges into it. Instantly the doors are slammed to behind him, and the poor "toro" is back on his fatal field of battle.

Such is the place, and now for the persons, who may be divided into the organizers of the fight, the four-footed and the two-footed combatants. A fiesta may be given by a Town Council, or a politician in search of popularity, or by charitable persons to raise money for the poor, or by an impresario in the way of business. The ring is hired from the company or municipal authority to which it belongs. There are two classes of tickets, first for the "entradas," which cost five or six reales—a shilling or fifteenpence—and merely give the right of entry, and then for the seats, which range from tenpence or so for a place on a bench in the sun to four or five pounds, or even more, for a box. You need not buy a seat if you do not object to standing about, but you cannot get in without an entrada. The usual division of the spoils is that the owners of the ring get the entradas, and the givers of the fight the money for the seats. There must be a president, whose function it is to give the signal for the beginning or ending of each part of the fiesta and decide all disputes as to the behaviour of the bull-fighters. He is commonly the chief local authority, civil or military, and his post is not always a pleasant one. If his generalship does not please the people, they are considered entitled to howl unlimited abuse at him, and they use their privilege to the fullest extent. A president who is not learned in the niceties of bull-fighting, and who lacks the fine tact which tells a true "aficionado" when anything has lasted long enough, does wisely to have a more experienced friend at his elbow. We have seen an unlucky and bungling civil governor reduced to putting himself into the diminutive hands of a charming Andalusian lady, the wife of a distinguished Alphonist general. By the universal consent of a Republican audience, she discharged the arduous duties of the post in a masterly manner. The horses and bulls are provided by the empresa—i.e. the managing committee or impresario, as the case may be. As for the horses, little need be said of them. They are all the broken-down animals which are only fit for the knacker, and no words can be too strong for the brutal cruelty with which they are treated. Of late years it has been the custom to kill them as soon as they are badly wounded, which shows some sort of beginning of a feeling of humanity to animals in the Spanish mind. The bulls come, for the most part, from Navarre, Castile, and Andalusia. It would require a treatise of some length to specify and explain the many terms used in Spain to describe the varying characters of these animals. They range from the bravo pure and simple, the courageous beast which charges with blind fury, to the cabrito or kid, which skips about the ring and does nothing effectual. One name may be quoted for its exquisite absurdity—it is the bull of bad intentions, the beast which will not be deluded by flags and cloaks, but charges straight for the man. Such bulls are dangerous. As a rule, the bulls are not big; but they are remarkably fierce and active, and, coming from the vast pasture-grounds, are always in good training.

When the empresa has secured the ring, the horses, and the bulls, the next step is to find the fighters. The usual way of doing so is to hire the troop of some well-known espada, or those of two espadas. Bull-fighters are divided, as everybody knows, into several classes, all called toreros. The old word toreador means an amateur who kills the bull from horseback with a short, broad-headed spear, weighted at the handle, and called a rejon. It is held like a dagger, and the blow is struck downwards. The toreador only appears now at royal feasts in Madrid, and is always accompanied by a troop of professionals, who advise him and get him out of scrapes. The great man among the toreros is the espada, or sword, also called the diestro, the fencer. He is the manager of the troop (la cuadrilla), and pays its subordinate members out of the lump-sum advanced him by the empresa. There are always two espadas at every fight, who kill alternate bulls; and, as a rule, the wage-fund is divided between them, each paying his own troop. Next in dignity come the banderilleros, who worry the bulls with barbs called banderillas—which is, being interpreted, little flags. There are generally two banderilleros in a troop—that is so say, four in all in the ring. One of them is selected to be sobresaliente de espada, or third man to the chiefs. If either of them is killed or disabled, he takes his place, and it is his function to kill the extra bull, or "toro de gracia," which is generally given to the spectators at the end. Then come the capeadores, the smart lads with cloaks (capas), who draw the bull off from the fallen picadores, and otherwise make themselves useful. All these toreros fight on foot, and stand on different rungs of the same professional ladder. The espada has always begun by being a capeador. The picador, the horseman who fights with the long spear called garrocha, comes after all. He has the roughest work, the poorest pay, and he remains a picador all his life. By the rules of the ring he is compelled to cover the head of his spear with a sheath which leaves only about an inch of steel exposed. He must hold the weapon so that when his arm is hanging straight down the point comes four inches in front of his horse's breast. By another rule he must never turn the point on the bone of the bull's shoulder. In fact, he is hampered in every way, and stands in constant need of the armour he wears on the right leg and thigh, the gregoriana, as they are called from the Christian name of the illustrious Don Gregorio Gurri, who invented them in the last century. Calderon, one of the few picadores who has enjoyed much personal reputation in our time, has always said that he could bring any decent horse untouched through a fight if he was only allowed to do as he pleased with his garrocha. But even he could only do it by crippling the bull and spoiling sport for the banderillero and the espada, and so he has to take his share of tumbles with other picadores. There is also in every troop a cachotero, who, when the bull has fallen after the fatal thrust, divides the spine with the short dagger, also called the cachetero. This is the man whom the Spaniards now call the matador, or killer, and he is a mere butcher. A miscellaneous crowd of chulos—knaves in the old sense—is employed to rake and water the ring, spread fresh sand over the blood, and tend the gaily caparisoned mules which gallop off with the dead horses and bulls. The pay given to these different classes of men varies from two pounds or so for an ordinary picador up to twenty or thirty for the sobresaliente de espada. They are paid by the fight. All that remains after paying them goes to the espadas. As the lump-sum provided for paying the toreros is sometimes as much as five hundred pounds, of which one-half will cover the wages and travelling expenses of the troop or troops, an espada may make as much as a hundred and fifty pounds. When it is remembered that he may take part in thirty or forty fights during the season, it requires very little arithmetic to show that his gains may amount to thousands. With ordinary prudence in money matters and good luck in escaping "bulls of bad intentions" he may rely on spending an honoured old age in the enjoyment of a pleasant little fortune.
